DOUGLAS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.★

WHITE v. SAME.

Rehearing Denied March 12, 1928.

1. Trial 🔑296(1)—Formula instruction should contain elements essential to recovery, and absence of one element is not cured by reference in other correct instructions.

The so-called "formula" instruction should contain all elements essential to recovery, and absence of any one element may not be compensated for nor cured by reference thereto in other instructions correctly and fully stating law.

2. Trial 🔑228(1)—Instruction constituting only expression of doctrine of respondeat superior was not required to state further elements essential to recovery by plaintiffs.

In action against railroad for injuries and death alleged to have resulted when car, being switched, struck pile of ties on which decedents were sitting, since instruction that it was admitted by defendant that named employees were acting within scope of employment, and, if their negligence caused plaintiff's death, verdict should be for plaintiff, since employer was bound by employees' acts in scope of employment, and their negligence is employer's negligence, constituted only expression of doctrine of respondeat superior, it was not erroneous because it did contain all elements essential to recovery, especially where ten separate instructions informed fully as to proximate cause and contributory negligence.

3. Appeal and error 🔑930(2)—Jurors are presumed to have common intelligence and capable of comprehending ordinary language, as applied to issues.

Jurors are presumed to be persons of common intelligence and capable of comprehending ordinary use of language as applied to particular proposition under consideration, and in reference to which it is employed.

4. Trial 🔑295(1)—Instructions must be considered in entirety, and are unobjectionable, if as a whole they state law fairly and clearly.

Instructions must be considered in their entirety, and, if as so considered they state law fairly and clearly, then they are as a whole unobjectionable, even though isolated passages therefrom are objectionable.

5. Railroads 🔑274(2)—Railroad could not claim that decedent and plaintiff were trespassers on private loading platform where they had right to be, as against every one except owner.

In action against railroad for death and injury resulting when part of car being switched struck pile of ties on which decedent and plaintiff were sitting, railroad could not claim that they were trespassers or mere licensees on privately owned loading platform at time of accident relieving it from everything except gross and willful negligence, since they had right to be on platform as against every one, except lessor or possessor thereof.

6. Appeal and error 🔑173(13)—Contention that decedent and plaintiff were trespassers on platform, being urged first on appeal, does not merit consideration.

In action against railroad for death and injury resulting when part of car being switched struck pile of ties on which decedent and plaintiff were sitting, contention that they were trespassers on platform does not merit consideration, where it was first urged in the Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Burnell, Judge.

Separate actions by Louise Marie Douglas, as administratrix of the estate of Dean Cheney Douglas, and by Jennie H. White, substituted in place of S. I. White, against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed. Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal (255 P. 230).

W. I. Gilbert, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. This appeal is from each of two judgments entered against the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, in actions instituted to recover damages. The complaints allege, in substance, that the negligence of the defendant's employees was the proximate cause of the death of Douglas and the serious injury of White. Defendant denied the charge of negligence, and urged the defense of contributory negligence. As the two causes of action arose out of the identical accident, they were joined for trial, and were brought here by way of a single appeal. The facts are sufficiently stated in the decision of the District Court of Appeal, the following portion of which is adopted as the opinion of this court:

"On May 7, 1921, the defendant and appellant was switching a steel gondola type car at the Los Angeles Harbor, when some part of the car struck a pile of ties which were stacked alongside of the tracks and upon which Dean Cheney Douglas and the original plaintiff, S. I. White, were sitting, and resulting in the death of Douglas and the injury of White. The exact cause of the accident is very much in doubt. There was testimony, which was also positively denied, that a piece of iron extended out from the side of the car a couple of feet and that the whole pile of ties was knocked out of place about one foot. There is other testimony that, [while] the ties were of the same length and stacked so as to clear the edge of the car by six or eight inches, one of them, about 15 minutes prior to the accident, was observed to be shorter than the others as the witness saw it from the end away from the tracks. This would authorize the inference under the circumstances, especially as several witnesses testified that only one tie had been knocked off the pile, that it had been pushed over and protruded sufficiently far to be struck. The engine and car were traveling, according to the prevailing testimony, under 6 miles an hour, although one witness testified that he had told plaintiff's counsel that they were running between 20 and 25 miles an hour. The lookout was not on the forward end of the car, but on the rear of the gondola near the top, from which point he claimed vantage in ability to see. * * *

"The appellant complains that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdicts, and in support of this contention recites a stipulation that the defendant had no control of the platform upon which the ties were piled or over the ties, but that the platform was under lease to the Banning Company, a stranger to the defendant; hence that the defendant was only charged with operating its cars over and along the tracks with ordinary care. Aside from the fact that the jury were entitled to say from the evidence already recited that the crew in charge of this car failed to use ordinary care if they failed to observe a protruding tie, there was the other evidence of a piece of iron which stuck out two feet from the side of the car, which would also be sufficient to justify the verdicts."

[1] We are unable to accept the remaining portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, wherein the giving of the following instruction by the trial court is declared to have constituted prejudicial error:

"It is admitted by defendant in this case that A. J. Beck, E. L. Carr, G. J. Clouth, D. Frazer, and Leslie Straight were employees of defendant and were acting within the scope of their employment at the time of the accident. If you should find that the injury to one plaintiff and the death of the other were caused by the negligence of these employees, or either of them, while operating defendant's engine and car, at the time of or immediately prior to the accident, your verdict should be for plaintiffs and against the defendant, since an employer is bound by the acts of his employee while acting within the scope of their employment, and their negligence is, in law, deemed to be the employer's negligence."

The authorities are legion to the effect that a so-called "formula" instruction must contain all the elements essential to a recovery, and the absence of any one of such elements may not be compensated for nor cured by a reference thereto in other instructions correctly and fully stating the law. This principle is well stated in Beyerle v. Clift, 59 Cal. App. 7. 9. 209 P. 1015, 1016, wherein it is held that:

"If an instruction by its terms purports to state the conditions necessary to a verdict, it must state all those conditions and must not overlook pleaded defenses on which substantial evidence has been introduced. 'It is clear that an instruction directing a verdict for the plaintiff in the event that the jury finds certain facts to be true must embrace all the things necessary to show the legal liability of the defendant and to warrant the direction or conclusion contained therein that plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, and such is the rule in this state.' * * * The court gave other instructions on the subject of contributory negligence, the correctness of which is not challenged. But this is not sufficient to overcome the prejudicial character of the erroneous instructions. 'It is true that other instructions were given at the request of defendant that stated the law in these respects as favorably to defendant as was warranted, if not more favorably. But the giving of these other instructions simply produced a clear conflict in the instructions given the jury by the court, and it is impossible for us to say which instruction the jury followed in arriving at a verdict in favor of plaintiff.' * * *"

Other cases announcing a substantially similar rule are: Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 248, 253, 107 P. 309; Pierce v. United G. & E. Co., 161 Cal. 176, 184, 118 P. 700; Killelea v. Cal. H. Co., 140 Cal. 602, 604, 74 P. 157; Sterne v. Mariposa, 153 Cal. 516, 521, 97 P. 66; Starr v. L. A. Ry. Co., 187 Cal. 270, 275, 201 P. 599; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Paraffine Co., 188 Cal. 184, 192, 204 P. 1076; Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 319, 237 P. 1066; Sappenfield v. Main St. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 59, 27 P. 590; Estate of Cunningham, 52 Cal. 465. 466; Zolkoske v. U. S. F. & L. Co., 72 Cal. App. 63, 67, 236 P. 344; Keena v. U. R. R. of S. F., 57 Cal. App. 124, 126, 207 P. 35; Dunne v. Hines, 50 Cal. App. 345, 350, 195 P. 276; Tognazzini v. Freeman, 18 Cal. App. 468, 473, 123 P. 540.

[2] At first blush the instruction complained of upon this appeal might seem to be fatally defective, in the light of the foregoing authorities, because of its failure to touch upon the subjects of contributory negligence and proximate cause. We are not prepared to say, however, that said instruction was given to, or accepted by, the jury as a "formula" instruction. It does not purport to be a complete statement of the law upon which the plaintiffs might recover, but served merely to inform the jury that responsibility attaches to a principal for the negligent acts of his servant committed within the scope of the latter's employment. The concluding language thereof supports this view, for, following the direction that verdicts be brought in for the plaintiffs, if the jury be of the opinion the accident resulted from the negligent operation of the train by defendant's employees, the instruction states:

"Since an employer is bound by the acts of his employees while acting within the scope of their employment, and their negligence is, in law, deemed to be the employer's negligence."

In our opinion, the instruction constitutes nothing more than an expression of the doctrine of respondeat superior. This being so, the instruction need not have set forth all of the elements essential to recovery by the plaintiffs. Our examination of the record discloses that these several elements were fully and properly expressed to the jury in the many other instructions given by the lower court.

In the case of Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 154, 232 P. 1010, 1012, it was admitted, as here, that the person whose negligence was alleged to have caused the plaintiff's injuries was in the employ of the defendant at the time of the accident. Upon the trial the court there instructed the jury, in part, as follows:

> "If you are satisfied from the evidence that at the time of the collision the defendant J. B. Beauregard was acting within the scope of his employment and doing what his employer had directed, and any damage resulted therefrom, J. S. Godeau is responsible therefor, whether the damage be occasioned by negligence or by a wanton or reckless purpose to accomplish the master's business in an unlawful manner."

The defendant urged upon appeal that the foregoing instruction was erroneous, in that it "ignores the essential ingredient, in that doing of the thing in an unlawful manner must be (1) the approximate cause of the injury, and (2) the plaintiff must not be guilty of contributory negligence." This contention was held to be without merit; the appellate court therein declaring:

> "It is apparent that the instruction was not intended as a statement of the elements necessary to a recovery, but of the employer's liability for the acts of his employee within the scope of the employment. Other instructions very fully and clearly cover the questions of proximate cause and contributory negligence, and, in view thereof, it does not appear possible that the jury could have been misled by the one of which complaint is made."

We think this reasoning is peculiarly applicable to the case now before us. As intimated above, the jury in no less than ten separate and distinct instructions were fully and correctly informed upon the subjects of proximate cause and contributory negligence. An attempt will not be made herein to set forth each of these several instructions. The following excerpt from one will suffice to illustrate their context:

> "You are instructed * * * if at said time and place they [plaintiffs] were guilty of any negligence directly and proximately contributing to their accident, in any degree, however slight, your verdict will be for the defendant, notwithstanding you may believe that the defendant itself was guilty of negligence."

In the light of the trial court's exposition of the law in other instructions, it is inconceivable that the jury could have been misled by the instruction complained of. But, even if it be said that the instruction was erroneous, the following from Alloggi v. Southern Pacific Co., 37 Cal. App. 72, 78, 173 P. 1117, 1119, quoted with approval in Saltzen v. Associated Oil Co., 198 Cal. 157, 161, 244 P. 338, 339, would seem to be pertinent:

> "We are not unmindful of the rule that conflicting and contradictory instructions upon a material phase of the case require a reversal where it cannot be ascertained from the record before us which instruction prevailed, or was likely to prevail with the jury. While it is true that the instruction complained of in the present case is erroneous, and in a measure in conflict with several other instructions which correctly stated the rule of law relative to contributory negligence, nevertheless the correct rule of law was so specifically stated and restated to the jury that we feel that the idea in the several correct instructions must have preponderated in the consideration of the jury, and that as a consequence the erroneous instruction neither contributed to nor controlled the verdict."

In passing it may also be said that the Saltzen Case, supra, concludes:

> "That this court ought not to adopt or give application to a rule that the positive effect of an express instruction upon a specific subject which is admittedly correct will be overcome by a general though erroneous instruction not expressly dealing with that subject in the absence of a very clear showing that the jury have been misled thereby."

[3, 4] Jurors are presumed to be persons of common intelligence and capable of comprehending the ordinary use of language as applied to the particular proposition under consideration and in reference to which it is employed. We will not assume that they may not have understood the charge as we understand it. The instructions must be considered in their entirety, and if, as so considered, they state the law of the case fairly and clearly, then they are, as a whole, unobjectionable, even though by selecting isolated passages from single instructions they may in some respects be amenable to just criticism.

[5, 6] We find no merit in appellant's further contention that Douglas and White were trespassers, or, at the most, mere licensees, upon the platform of the Banning Company at the time of the accident, thus relieving the appellant of responsibility for any injuries sustained by them, "except through gross and willful negligence." It is elementary that Douglas and White had the legal right to be upon the platform as against every one except the Banning Company, the lessor and possessor thereof. The decisions relied upon by the appellant in support of this contention are not in point, for each presented a situation wherein the asserted trespasser or licensee had instituted an action for damages against the one in lawful possession of the property wrongfully entered and upon which the injury was received. Moreover, the contention does not merit consideration, for it is apparently now being urged for the first time. Throughout the trial, and before the District Court of Appeal, the appellant confined itself to the contention that its servants, at the time of the accident, had not negligently operated the train. This is borne out by the statement in the appellant's original reply brief that it was "only charged with operating a train over and upon the track with ordinary care. * * *"

For the foregoing reasons, the judgments appealed from are, and each is, affirmed.

VOINICH v. ROLLERI. (Sac. 3907.)★

Rehearing Denied March 8, 1928.

1. Judgment ⚿461(5)—Evidence held to support finding that judgment was not obtained by fraud, as against contention that party was not served and did not appear nor participate in action.

In action to annul judgment quieting title in defendant as against plaintiff's claims, evidence held sufficient to support finding that previous judgment was not obtained by fraud or collusion and was not void, as against plaintiff's contention that former judgment was procured without service on her and without her appearance or participation.

2. Attorney and client ⚿70—Attorney's act in entering defendant's appearance carries presumption of authority to so act.

Act of attorney in entering appearance of defendant carries with it presumption of due authority on his part to do so.

3. Judgment ⚿410—Validity of prior judgment quieting title held complete defense to action to set it aside and to quiet plaintiff's title.

In action to annul judgment quieting title in defendant and to quiet plaintiff's title to certain land of which she was deprived by such judgment, validity of prior judgment held complete answer to plaintiff's cause of action, justifying judgment for defendant, irrespective of any other issues made by pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action by Pave Voinich against Rose Rolleri. From a judgment for the defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Chas. P. Snyder and Snyder & Snyder, all of San Andreas, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was brought to annul and set aside a judgment in the superior court of the county of Calaveras, and to quiet plaintiff's title to certain lands of which she was deprived by said judgment. The action in which said judgment was rendered, which it is sought by this action to annul and set aside, was entitled Rose Rolleri v. Martin Voinich et al., and was numbered 951 in said superior court. The grounds set forth in the complaint in this action, upon which plaintiff herein bases her right to an annulment of said judgment, are that the same was procured against her without the service of any process upon her and without her appearance or participation in said action. In support of these grounds plaintiff alleges that no summons or other notice was ever served upon her in said prior action; that she never appeared in said action; that an attorney at law by the name of Will A. Dower purported to represent her in said action; that said attorney prepared and filed in said action an answer in her name, and appeared and conducted the trial of said action representing himself as the attorney of plaintiff; that plaintiff never authorized the said attorney to appear for her in said action, nor to file said answer, nor to represent her or act as her attorney in any manner in said action; that the verification to said answer purported to be sworn to by her; that it was neither signed nor sworn to by her, and she had no knowledge of it until long after the judgment in said action had been rendered; that she did not authorize any person to sign her name to the said verification to said answer, nor to make the same, nor to file said answer in said action; that judgment was thereafter rendered in said action against plaintiff, and that said judgment was "obtained by means of fraud and deceit on the part of said defendants and other persons to plaintiff unknown." The answer denied the allegations of the complaint, and with it the defendant filed a cross-complaint setting up that she was the owner of said real property, and asking that her title thereto be quieted as against all claims of plaintiff. The court found in favor of the defendant on all contested issues and rendered judgment that defendant was the owner of said real property and for costs of the action. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed under the alternative method provided for by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] While appellant assigns fourteen particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings, we consider it necessary to discuss only one of said assignments, which is as follows:

> "There is absolutely no evidence in the record herein to sustain or support the decision or findings of the court to the effect that the judgment in the case of Rose Rolleri v. Martin Voinich et al. was not obtained by fraud or collusion and was not void."

If the finding of the court that this judgment in action No. 951 was in full force and effect and was not obtained by means of fraud or deceit, then all other issues in the case become immaterial, and the findings thereon are not of any consequence in determining the ownership of the real property involved in this action. This judgment in action No. 951 was rendered on the 8th day of October, 1919, and the present action was instituted on June 4, 1923, and defendant's cross-complaint was filed on September 30, 1924. At the time of the commencement of this action, or at the time of filing said cross-complaint, sufficient time had not elapsed, therefore, since the rendition of the judgment in action No. 951 for the plaintiff in this action to have obtained title to said real property by adverse possession, even if she had been in the open and notorious possession thereof and had paid all taxes thereon during the time intervening between the date of said judgment and the commencement of this action or the filing of defendant's cross-complaint.

By the evidence in this case it appears that said action No. 951 was instituted by the defendant in this action, the said Rose Rolleri, against Martin Voinich, the husband of Pave Voinich, the plaintiff in the present action, Nick Voinich, Mitchell Voinich, and First Doe, Second Doe, etc., as defendants. The plaintiff, Pave Voinich, was not in her own proper name made a party thereto. An attorney by the name of Will A. Dower, who, it was admitted at the trial of this action, was regularly admitted to practice law in the state of California, appeared in said action and filed a demurrer to the complaint in said action on behalf only of the defendants designated by their true names in the said complaint. This demurrer was overruled, but, nevertheless, the plaintiff therein filed an amended complaint in said action, in which the name of the said Pave Voinich was inserted among the names of the defendants therein as follows: "Pave Voinich, sued herein as First Doe." This amended complaint was not personally served on Pave Voinich, but was served on the said Will A. Dower, who admitted service thereof in writing as "attorney for defendants." Later on the said Will A. Dower filed a separate answer in said action on behalf of Mitchell Voinich, and also a separate answer therein on behalf of Pave Voinich, signing his name to this last-named answer as "attorney for defendant Pave Voinich." Martin Voinich, one of said defendants and the husband of Pave Voinich, and Nick Voinich, another of said defendants, through their said attorney, Will A. Dower, filed a joint disclaimer to any interest in the real property involved in said action. The verification to the answer of Pave Voinich purported to be signed by her and sworn to before Will A. Dower, a notary public.

[2] At the trial, Pave Voinich testified that the signature to said verification was not her own. In this testimony she was corroborated by others. And as we have before said, she testified that she never authorized the said Will A. Dower or anybody else to appear for her in said action, or to file any answer therein, and that she knew nothing of said answer being filed, or that she was a party to said action until after judgment had been rendered in said action. There was no evidence, however, that the said attorney did not act in perfectly good faith in filing said answer for the said Pave Voinich, nor that he did not honestly believe he was authorized to defend said action in behalf of the said Pave Voinich. "The act of the attorney in entering the appearance of a defendant, carries with it a presumption of due authority upon his part to do so." Garrison v. McGowan, 48 Cal. 592, 600. After judgment was entered in said action No. 951 the said attorney served and filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial. This notice was filed October 20, 1919. Thereafter, and on February 9, 1920, the said attorney Will A. Dower died. After his death Pave Voinich joined with her codefendants in said action in the substitution of Joe Huberty as their attorney in said action instead of Will A. Dower, deceased. This substitution was signed by each of said defendants, including the said Pave Voinich. Later on the said Joe Huberty, as attorney for said defendants Mitchell Voinich and Pave Voinich, filed notice of appeal from the judgment in said action, and notice to the clerk for a reporter's transcript and also for a clerk's transcript in said action. These two defendants also filed a bond on appeal. For some reason the clerk of the court refused to prepare and file a transcript as notified so to do by said defendants, and they instituted an action in the superior court of said county of Calaveras for a writ of mandate to compel said officer to prepare such a transcript. The petition for said writ was signed and sworn to by said Pave Voinich, as well as by her codefendant, Mitchell Voinich, who were the petitioners therein. In said petition it is alleged:

> "That on the 1st day of February, 1917, a complaint wherein Rose Rolleri was plaintiff and petitioners herein were defendants, was filed. * * * That under said complaint process was duly issued and served upon the petitioners hereto; that the cause in which Rose Rolleri was plaintiff and petitioners herein were defendants came on for trial * * * and Will A. Dower, Esq., now deceased, appearing as attorney for defendants, petitioners herein."

In the fourth paragraph of said petition it is alleged that the notice of entry of judgment was served "on Will A. Dower, Esq., now deceased, who was then attorney in the aforesaid action for the petitioners herein." Similar allegations are made throughout said petition, including one stating that nothing was done in said action after the death of Will A. Dower "until the 8th day of June, 1920, when Joe Huberty, Esq., accepted the substitution of himself as attorney for petitioners herein, in the place and stead of Will A. Dower, deceased."

[3] This evidence on behalf of the verity of said judgment and to refute the testimony of the plaintiff herein that the attorney appearing and acting for her in action No. 951 had no authority to represent her in said action, was proof of the highest character and offered ample justification for the trial court's decision adverse to the contention of plaintiff. The allegations of the petition for a writ of review were not only deliberately made by the plaintiff herein in a pleading filed in a judicial proceeding, but they were verified by her oath, and were entitled to be given great weight by the trial court. They were made only a few months after the trial of said action, and when the events to which they relate were fresh in the mind of plaintiff, and under circumstances that afforded little if any chance of mistake or misunderstanding. The allegations of this petition in themselves afforded ample evidence to support the finding of the court of plaintiff's appearance in said action No. 951, and of the validity and binding effect of the judgment rendered therein. By said judgment the defendant herein, the said Rose Rolleri's title to the real property described in the complaint in the present action, was quieted against all interest or claims of the plaintiff herein. This judgment therefore was a complete answer to plaintiff's cause of action and justified the decision and judgment in the present action, irrespective of any other issues made by the pleadings.

Judgment affirmed.

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 6, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑715(1)—Opinion that accounting to testator's estate by deceased executor's representative cannot be had on distribution held not res judicata in surviving executor's proceeding for accounting (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1447, 1639).

Opinion of Court of Appeal that accounting for moneys due testator's estate from estate of deceased executor, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1447, by latter's personal representative, cannot be had on distribution of testator's estate, nor in suit in equity, but that proceeding by surviving executor, under section 1639, is exclusive remedy, held not res judicata in such proceeding.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑513(9)—Personal representative's account is final only as to matters adjudicated.

Account of deceased's personal representative, adjudicated on appeal, or not appealed from, becomes final as to all matters adjudicated, but not as to nonadjudicated items.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑75—One qualifying as executor becomes voluntary trustee for devisees and legatees.

One qualifying as executor of will becomes voluntary trustee of property and assets of testator's estate, and holds them for benefit of devisees and legatees under terms of will.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑102(2)—Limitations do not run while parties occupy fiduciary relationship, as of executor and heirs.

The statute of limitations does not run where parties occupy a fiduciary relationship toward each other, as in case of executor and heirs, so long as such relationship is not repudiated.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑102(4)—Executor's duty to account is continuing one, never barred by limitations.

Executor's duty to account is a continuing one, never barred by statute of limitations, irrespective of whether such statute may be pleaded as against an action on the debt itself.

6. Executors and administrators 🔑294—Deceased executor's distributive share of testator's estate may be retained or set off against moneys due latter from executor's estate; his heirs taking residue only after payment of debts (Code Civ. Proc. § 1447).

As heirs of deceased executor would take residue of his estate only after administration thereon, payment of debts, etc., his distributive share of testator's estate can be retained or set off against moneys due from his estate to that of testator, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1447.

7. Executors and administrators 🔑464—Filing of claim against deceased executor's estate by surviving executor is not prerequisite to proceedings for accounting (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1447, 1639).

Filing of claim against deceased executor's estate by surviving executor is not prerequisite to institution of proceedings by latter for accounting by deceased executor's personal representative, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1639, for amount due testator's estate under section 1447.

8. Executors and administrators 🔑463—Each executor must account for all moneys in their hands, irrespective of coexecutor's like obligation (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1622–1639).

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1622–1639, it is duty of each executor to account for all moneys coming into their hands and all moneys and property with which they are chargeable, irrespective of like obligation on coexecutor.

9. Executors and administrators 🔑88—Probate court must charge executors with their debts to estate, irrespective of cause of their omission from account or method of bringing them to court's notice (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1447, 1639).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1639, it is duty of probate court, which is guardian of decedent's estates, and controls person appointed to administer it, subject to review, as provided by law, to charge either or both executors with debts owed estate under section 1447, and omitted from account, irrespective of causes of omission of method of bringing indebtedness to court's notice.

10. Executors and administrators ⚷464—Executor owed duty to apply commissions to payment of his indebtedness to estate, failing in which his personal representative, on his death, became liable therefor (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1447, 1639).

It was executor's duty to report to probate court his indebtedness to estate, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1447, and apply commissions earned to payment thereof, failing in which his personal representative, on his death, became liable to testator's estate for such commissions under section 1639.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Proceeding by E. F. Clary, executor, to enforce an accounting by the representative of the estate of Charles M. Clary, deceased, for property and moneys belonging to the estate of Abraham Everstine Clary, deceased. From an order fixing the indebtedness, the representative appeals. Affirmed.

Griffin & Boone and Edward T. Taylor, all of Modesto, for appellant.

Grant & Bailey, of Woodland, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. Upon the petition of appellant for a hearing by this court of this cause after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, Plummer, J., writing the opinion (253 P. 778), an order of transfer was duly made, and the cause is now before us for decision. We have given further consideration to the opinion and decision rendered by said District Court of Appeal, and have become satisfied that its decision correctly interprets and applies the law by which cases of this character must be ruled. We therefore adopt practically the entire opinion as prepared by the said District Court of Appeal as our opinion, adding thereto brief observations which seem pertinent in view of the arguments contained in the petition for a hearing filed in this court. The opinion follows:

"This matter is before us upon an appeal from an order of the superior court, made and entered in the matter of a proceeding had and taken in said estate, as authorized and provided for in section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring the personal representative of Charles M. Clary, deceased, to account to the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, for the balance due upon a promissory note made and executed by Charles M. Clary to Abraham E. Clary.

"It appears from the record that on or about the first day of August, 1918, Charles M. Clary made, executed and delivered to Abraham E. Clary his promissory note for the sum of $3,000, due one day after date; thereafter, and while this note was uncollected, the said Abraham E. Clary died testate in the county of Yolo, and Charles M. Clary and E. F. Clary, pursuant to the last will and testament of said Abraham E. Clary, were appointed, and on the 6th day of December, 1920, qualified as the executors of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased; thereafter, and on or about the 4th day of April, 1921, the said Charles M. Clary died intestate in the county of Monterey, state of California. Certain payments were made upon said promissory note by the said Charles M. Clary, and, upon the accounting taken and had in the superior court of Yolo county, the sum of $2,965.91 was found to be the remainder due upon said note, against which sum, the distributive share of $1,257.50 otherwise coming to the estate of Charles M. Clary, deceased, from Abraham E. Clary, deceased, was ordered retained as an offset and payment pro tanto of the moneys due from the estate of Charles M. Clary, deceased, to Abraham E. Clary, deceased.

[1] "This matter was before this court upon a previous appeal, wherein it was sought to adjudicate questions relative to the indebtedness of the estate of Charles M. Clary to Abraham E. Clary, upon distribution in the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased. Estate of Clary, 71 Cal. App. 22, 234 P. 851. Upon that appeal it was held by this court that the court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter of an accounting on the part of the personal representative of the estate of Charles M. Clary, deceased, for moneys due the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, upon distribution, and thereupon to order a set-off or retainer of the distributive share of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, which would otherwise be due and payable to the estate of Charles M. Clary, deceased, as payment pro tanto of the indebtedness of Charles M. Clary, deceased, to the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased; that section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure specified the procedure which must be taken in such cases, and that such procedure is now the exclusive remedy; that such an accounting cannot be had upon distribution, nor can such an accounting be had in a suit in equity. The portion of the decree of the superior court sitting as a court of probate purporting to adjudicate these matters was reversed. As we read the opinion of the Estate of Clary, supra, no other questions were adjudicated and determined upon the former hearing of this cause, and therefore there is no basis for the plea of res adjudicata urged by appellant upon this hearing. It is further specifically pointed out in the opinion to which we have referred that the procedure provided by section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure is the one to be followed by the executor of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, in order to compel the desired accounting. The language of the opinion is, 'the proceeding for such accounting must be inaugurated under said section of the Code of Civil Procedure,' and then concludes that, as the court did not follow such procedure, the action taken by it was without jurisdiction. The opinion referred to does cite a number of authorities in which it is held that assets cannot be collected upon distribution, but there is nothing in the opinion which prohibits, or in any way tends to prohibit, the superior court of Yolo county, on the going down of the remittitur, from proceeding, if proper pleadings were filed therefor, under section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to enforce the desired accounting.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"Upon the going down of the remittitur, after the prior hearing of this cause, the surviving executor of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, instituted proceedings under and in accordance with the provisions of section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure to enforce an accounting by the representative of the estate of Charles M. Clary, deceased, of the amount of property and moneys in his hands belonging to the estate and constituting a part of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, at the time of the death of said Charles M. Clary, deceased, and upon this accounting an order fixing the indebtedness as we have herein stated, was made in the probate court of Yolo county.

"The proceedings had in the first instance, leading to the first appeal and the proceedings had in the appeal now before us, were and are both based upon section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under the terms of which all moneys due from the executor to a testator at the time the executor qualifies as such become assets of the estate of the testator in the hands of the executor, and hence renders the executor liable for the same as if so much money was in his hands. The note in this case was due at the time of the qualification of Charles M. Clary as executor of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, but against this note the statute of limitations had not yet run. This period would not have expired until some eighteen months after the death of Charles M. Clary, deceased. The exact dates are immaterial. No accounting was ever made or rendered by Charles M. Clary, as executor of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, of the amount due upon said note or of what the Codes specify shall be considered as so much cash in his hands, nor was any accounting ever made or had thereof by the personal representative of Charles M. Clary, deceased, until the institution of the proceedings herein. The surviving executor of the estate of Abraham E. Clary filed an account of his administration of said estate, called a 'final account,' and also a report therewith. In the account, termed a 'final account,' the surviving executor, E. F. Clary, made no mention of the promissory note herein referred to, but did attempt, as we have herein stated, to make collection of the same upon distribution as therein prayed for.

[2] "Upon this appeal it is urged that the whole matter presented herein was and is res adjudicata; also that the proceeding is barred by the statute of limitations. A number of cases are cited upholding the finality of a final account, from which no appeal has been prosecuted, or which has been adjudicated upon appeal, in addition to urging that the questions involved herein have once been passed upon by this court, which we have just stated to be without merit. That an account becomes final as to all matters adjudicated, the authorities abundantly establish, but it is also true that it is not final as to nonadjudicated items. The text-writer in 24 C. J. p. 1029, § 2484, thus states the rule: 'A final settlement is conclusive as to all matters, the proper subject of account, included in such a settlement or necessarily involved therein; but it is not conclusive as to matters not included or necessarily involved therein, or as to matters not within the jurisdiction of the court. The settlement is not conclusive as to assets not accounted for in such statement or received thereafter, but as to such assets the personal representative may be required to make a further settlement.' In the Matter of Estate of Ross, 179 Cal. 358, 182 P. 303, the Supreme Court, having before it this same question, there said: 'The settlement of an account is not conclusive, "except as to such items as are included in it and actually passed upon by the probate court."' See, also, Estate of Adams, 131 Cal. 415, 63 P. 838, where the same holding is had.

[3-5] "When Charles M. Clary, on the 6th day of December, qualified as an executor of the last will and testament of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, he became a voluntary trustee of the property and assets of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, holding the same for the benefit of the devisees and legatees, under the terms of the last will and testament of Abraham E. Clary, deceased. Thus, as pointed out in 16 California Jurisprudence, p. 420 et seq., sections 30 to 37, the rule is that the statute of limitations does not run where the parties occupy a fiduciary relationship toward each other, so long as such relationship is not repudiated. Thus, a guardian may not acquire title by adverse possession against his ward, nor an agent against his principal, nor an executor against the heirs. As to the latter, the rule is stated in this language: 'Pending the administration of an estate, the possession of an administrator is not adverse to that of an heir; he cannot acquire an adverse title by possession for the statutory period.' In MacMullan v. Kelly, 19 Cal. App. 700, 127 P. 819, the court, having before it the question of the running of the statute of limitations where one occupied the position of a voluntary trustee, thus announced the rule: 'It is a rule of law in this and other jurisdictions that the statute of limitations does not begin to run in favor of a defendant chargeable as the trustee of an express trust during the life of the trust. In order to set the statute in motion it is necessary that such a trustee, by some act or declaration, positively and unequivocally repudiate the trust, and that notice of such repudiation be brought home to the beneficiary. This rule is so well settled and so generally recognized that no argument is necessary to support its reiteration.' The court then cites a number of cases supporting the rule. The same rule is set forth in the case of Taylor v. Morris, 163 Cal. 717, 127 P. 66. In the case of Elizalde v. Murphy, 163 Cal. 681, 126 P. 978, the court had before it the consideration of a plea of the statute of limitations against requiring the representative of a deceased person to account for funds belonging to the estate, and held as follows: 'The action was simply an action for an accounting—an action to compel the personal representative of a trustee after his death, and the sureties upon his bond as such trustee, to give an account of the property held by the trustee, and of his administration of the trust, to have that account audited and settled by the court, and a balance struck,' citing Osment v. McElrath, 68 Cal. 466, 9 P. 731, 58 Am. Rep. 17. 'The duty of the administrator to account is a continuing duty, and does not become barred. Estate of Sanderson, 74 Cal. 199, 15 P. 753; Cook v. Ceas, 147 Cal. 614, 82 P. 370.' It was held in that case that an accounting does not depend upon any questions of fraud or malversation. It was simply a duty of the administrator or executor, while alive, to account for the trust funds in his hands, and, upon his death, the duty of the personal representative so to do.

"In behalf of their plea, appellants cite the case of Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 P. 673, and refer to the following language contained in the opinion: 'The naming of a person as executor does not thereby discharge him from any just claim which the testator has against him, but the claim must be included in the inventory, and the executor is liable for the same, as for so much money in his hands, when the debt or demand becomes due.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1447. As a necessary consequence, if defendant Forrest S. Rowley owed the ten thousand dollars here in controversy on June 3, 1915, when he became executor, he became chargeable with that sum as for so much money in his hands and continued liable therefor, irrespective of the running of the period of the statute of limitations against the debt itself, by reason of the change in the character of his obligation due to his intervening fiduciary capacity.' From this it is argued that the statute of limitations has run against the note involved in this action, and therefore that an accounting cannot be had. The language quoted, however, holds exactly the contrary. As we read it, it means that, irrespective of the lapse of time which would ordinarily bar an action upon the note, the executor, by reason of his fiduciary capacity, becoming chargeable with the note in his hands as so much money, is in that capacity, precluded from pleading the bar of the statute, and therefore, so long as the trust relation continues, the statute does not run. The duty to account is a continuing one, as stated in Elizalde v. Murphy, and devolved upon Charles M. Clary until the date of his death, and immediately devolved upon his personal representative, and, applying the reasoning of the court in the case of Minifie v. Rowley, the fiduciary relationship of the parties stops the running of the statute and precludes reliance upon such plea, irrespective of whether the statute might or might not have been pleaded as against an action on the note itself.

[6] "Likewise, the facts in the case of Schaeffer, 53 Cal. App. 493, 200 P. 508, render it readily distinguishable from the case at bar. In the Schaeffer Case the note against which the right of retainer or set-off was claimed was barred by the statute of limitations before the death of the testator, and hence there was neither right nor remedy existing at the time of the appointment of an executor or administrator. Furthermore, in the Schaeffer Case, no relationship of trust or confidence had been created prior or subsequent to the running of the statute. In the case at bar there was a subsisting and enforceable obligation, both at the date of the death of the testator and upon the qualification of Charles M. Clary as an executor, nor does the question of retainer or set-off strictly arise in this case as against the heirs of Charles M. Clary, deceased. Under our procedure and the law of this state, whatever portion of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, should or may finally reach the possession of the heirs of Charles M. Clary, deceased, does not affect the rule applicable here, as distribution of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, of the portion, if any, distributable to Charles M. Clary, deceased, would not and could not be made to his heirs, but only to his estate, to be taken possession of by his personal representative, administered upon, and then distributed. Under the rule announced in Estate of Pina, 112 Cal. 14, 44 P. 332, followed in Estate of Strong, 119 Cal. 663, 51 P. 1078, and, also, the case of Galvin v. Mutual Savings Bank, 6 Cal. App. 402, 92 P. 322, the heirs of Charles M. Clary, deceased, would take the residue of his estate only after administration had thereon, payment of debts, etc., and the ascertainment of who the heirs of Charles M. Clary are. The right of retainer or set-off is recognized as applicable upon distribution in this state. Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 135 P. 970; Estate of Angle, 148 Cal. 102, 82 P. 668. In states where the law and procedure concerning the devolution, administration, and distribution of estates are different from that which prevails in California, and the remote heirs take directly and not from their immediate ancestor, it is held that children stand in the same position as the father when the question of the right of retainer or set-off of a debt due by the father to the estate of the grandfather of the children is involved. Adams v. Yancey, 105 Miss. 233, 62 So. 229, 419, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1026; note to Stenson v. H. S. Halvorson Co., Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1294; Wilson v. Channell, 102 Kan. 793, 175 P. 95, 1 A. L. R. 987, and extended note beginning on page 991. See, also, Woods et al. v. Knotts et al., 196 Iowa, 544, 194 N. W. 953, 30 A. L. R. 768, and annotations thereto beginning on page 775. In many of the cases cited in the annotations to the cases referred to, debts barred at the time of the death of the testator are allowed to be set off. It may be stated that there are some decisions cited in the notes holding that the right of retainer or set-off does not exist as to remote heirs, who succeed directly, and not from the immediate ancestor, but the great weight of authority is to the contrary, and the cases which hold that the right of retainer or set-off cannot be exercised as against remote heirs, have no application in this state, for the reasons which we have stated, that they are only entitled to the residue of the estate coming to the immediate ancestor after payment of his debts, as ascertained upon administration of the immediate ancestor's estate.

[7] "Appellants further object that no claim was ever filed by the surviving executor of the estate of Abraham E. Clary, deceased, against the estate of Charles M. Clary, deceased, citing the case of In re Smith, 108 Cal. 115, 40 P. 1037. This case, however, has been overruled and the procedure adopted by the surviving executor which we have been considering, is held to be the proper procedure. In re Philbrook, 47 Cal. App. 683, 191 P. 77; Estate of Randall, 188 Cal. 329, 205 P. 118, hold that the filing of a claim is not prerequisite to instituting proceedings for an accounting under section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[8] "Under the various provisions of article 2 of chapter 10 of title 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is the duty of an executor and coexecutor to account for all moneys coming into their hands and for all moneys and properties with which they are chargeable, and this duty was incumbent upon Charles M. Clary, deceased, irrespective of a like obligation which rested upon his coexecutor, E. F. Clary.

"The proceeding before us is one for an accounting, and is not one involving collection of assets upon distribution, as was the case upon the prior appeal in the Estate of Clary, 71 Cal. App. 22, 234 P. 851, and, as we have said, the cases there relied upon and necessitating a reversal are not applicable here, save and except in so far as they hold that the proceeding now before us is the one that should have been taken in the first instance."

[9] There can be no doubt that some of appellant's contentions are given more than a mere show of color by certain earlier decisions of this court, especially those rendered prior to the enactment of section 1639, Code of Civil Procedure, by the Legislature of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 216), which provides for the settlement of a deceased executor's accounts by the personal representative of such deceased executor. "Formerly," as stated by the code annotations, "there was no way of settling such accounts except by suit in equity, which is expensive, unnecessary and less expeditious" than the mode proposed by said amendment. It is the trend of recent decisions to extend the jurisdiction of the probate court over such matters as are essentially involved in the probate and settlement of estates, especially where the subject-matter has been in said court contested by all parties in interest. Bauer v. Bauer (Cal. Sup.) 256 P. 822. The amendment of 1905 (section 1639, Code of Civil Procedure) illustrates the tendency of the Legislature to extend the jurisdiction of the probate court over controversies where no legal right is curtailed by so doing, rather than to send the parties into a court of equity at much sacrifice of time and expense. The probate court "'is the guardian of the estates of deceased persons and has control of the person appointed by it to administer the estate subject to review as provided by law. * * * It is the duty of the court carefully to scrutinize the account and reject all claims of the executor illegal in themselves or unjust in fact.'" Estate of Randall, 188 Cal. 329, 205 P. 118. By parity of reasoning it would be its duty to charge either or both executors with debts which they owe the estate and which have been omitted from the account irrespective of the causes of omission or the method by which such indebtedness may be brought to its notice.

[10] The Estate of Walker, 125 Cal. 242, 57 P. 991, upon which appellant relies as an authority nullifying the provisions of section 1447, Code of Civil Procedure, does not do so. That case prescribes the formula as to the kind of judgment that should be rendered in case an administrator is a debtor of the estate he is administering. It does hold, however, that he "should be charged with the entire sum, including the debt due from himself, and the decree should then show what portion of that amount consisted of debts due from the administrator which he reported as cash on hand. Of course, if it appears that he actually has the money, this formula would be unnecessary" In the instant case, the executor, C. M. Clary, deceased had earned a portion of his commission as an executor, which was due him from the estate. As Clary could not sue himself, and as it was "his duty to collect the debt for the estate, he must be held officially liable for any money he could have so applied at any time during his official term. If he has not so applied it, he has not faithfully executed the duties of his trust according to law. * * *" Estate of Walker, supra. It was C. M. Clary's duty to report his indebtedness to the probate court and to have paid it, if it was possible for him to have done so. The commissions earned by him could, and should have been applied to his indebtedness. The fact that he died pending the administration of the estate did not affect the situation in any sense. Estate of Walker really supports respondent. All other points raised by appellant seem to be sufficiently disposed of by the opinion of the District Court of Appeal.

The order and decree appealed from are affirmed.

MARTIN v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO.

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 31, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1064(1)—Holdings that complaint charged negligence in maintaining electric power wire, as well as in failure to remove wire after it broke, held not prejudicial to defendant.

Holdings of trial court that complaint charged negligence in maintaining electric power wire, as well as in failure to remove it from sidewalk after it became broken, held not prejudicial to defendant, where it was fully aware that plaintiff contended for such construction and it had fair opportunity to meet charge. (Per Preston, Seawell, and Langdon, JJ.)

2. Electricity ⚷19(2)—Evidence of negligence in maintenance and in failing to remove electric power wire after it broke held admissible under pleading.

Evidence to show both negligence in maintenance of electric power wire and in failing to remove it from sidewalk after it became broken held admissible, where complaint charged both acts of negligence and defendant admitted only latter act of negligence. (Per Preston, Seawell, and Langdon, JJ.)

3. Trial ⚷55—Evidence of negligence held not inadmissible because inflammatory, where otherwise admissible.

Evidence to show negligence respecting electric power wire held not inadmissible because it would be inflammatory or tend to unduly arouse the jury, where otherwise admissible. (Per Preston, Seawell, and Langdon, JJ.)

4. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—Reading of pleadings is not prejudicial, though legal effect has been admitted.

Reading of pleadings to jury is not prejudicial error, even though legal effect of them has been admitted. (Per Preston, Seawell, and Langdon, JJ.)

5. Appeal and error 🔑230—Objections to testimony held not available on appeal where witnesses had testified fully upon subject.

Objections to testimony as to injuries held not available in Supreme Court where witnesses had testified fully upon subjects before any objections were made. (Per Preston, Seawell, and Langdon, JJ.)

6. Appeal and error 🔑1052(5)—Admitting evidence of negligence respecting electric power wire, where negligence was conceded, held harmless error, where verdict was not excessive.

Admitting evidence that electric power company was negligent as to charged wire which caused personal injuries, where such negligence was conceded, held harmless error, where verdict was not excessive. (Per Shenk, J., and Waste, C. J.)

7. Appeal and error 🔑1052(5)—Admitting evidence of negligence as to electric power wire, if error, because negligence was conceded, held harmless where verdict was not excessive.

Admitting evidence that electric power company was negligent respecting charged wire which caused personal injuries, if error, because such negligence was conceded by it, held harmless where verdict was not excessive. (Per Curtis, J.)

Richards, J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Henry Alan Martin, a minor, by and through P. R. Merrill, guardian of his estate, against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 255 P. 284.

Thos. J. Straub and Charles E. Finney, both of San Francisco, and Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for appellant.

Jesse W. Carter and Carter & Smith, all of Redding, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. [1] This is an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, a minor, when between 8 and 9 years of age. He had judgment for $25,000, and defendant has appealed.

On December 24, 1922, at Cottonwood, Shasta county, plaintiff was injured by coming in contact with a highly charged power line owned, maintained, and operated by defendant in serving a nearby pumping plant with electric energy. A wire of said power line had broken and fallen across the sidewalk area of a street in said town and had remained on the ground, unguarded and charged with electricity, for several hours, to wit, from some time in the early morning until after plaintiff was injured, about 10 o'clock a. m.

Appellant sets forth its reasons for a reversal under eight subdivisions, but we do not see the necessity of considering these contentions separately. With one or two exceptions, all the important grounds urged for reversal of the judgment are answered by the boundaries which we place upon the issue of negligence tendered by the pleadings and the admissions by the defendant in connection therewith. A difference between the parties as to the proper interpretation of this issue forms the basis of practically all the errors claimed by appellant.

Paragraph V of the complaint is as follows:

> "That on or about the 24th day of December, 1922, and for several months prior thereto, the said defendant carelessly and negligently had constructed, kept, maintained, and operated the said electric power line through the limbs and branches of a tree situated on the sidewalk on said Chestnut street, near the southeast corner of the yard fence of the 'Ogburn residence,' in said town of Cottonwood; that said electric wire power line was so constructed, kept, maintained, and operated through the limbs and branches of said tree that the wires thereof came in contact with the limbs, branches, and leaves of said tree and caused the same to arc, burn, rub, and cut said limbs, branches, and leaves; that for approximately three weeks continuously prior to the said 24th day of December, 1922, some of the limbs and branches of said tree had broken and fallen over said wires, causing the same to droop, sag, and break, thus greatly endangering the life and limb of persons passing under said tree and said electric wire power line on said sidewalk; that as a result of said wires coming in contact with the limbs and branches of said tree and the limbs and branches thereof falling and bearing upon said wires, and said wires, arcing, burning, rubbing, and cutting said limbs and branches, one of said wires broke and fell to the ground, and remained thereon at or near said sidewalk from about 6 o'clock a. m. until 12 o'clock m. on the said 24th day of December, 1922; that said wire remained connected on one end with the said electric wire power line and was, during all of said time, heavily charged with electricity, which said charged wire was so exposed and unguarded as to permit pedestrians to come in contact with it, all of which the said defendant well knew; that said broken wire lying on the ground near said sidewalk, as aforesaid, was at all of said times owned by and under the control of said defendant."

This is followed by paragraph VIII, which reads as follows:

> "That said plaintiff, Henry Alan Martin, suffered and received said injuries hereinabove mentioned, wholly by reason of the carelessness and negligence of said defendant in permitting said electric power line to remain upon the ground at the time and in the manner aforesaid."

At the trial, and after the impanelment of the jury and when plaintiff's counsel was about to make his opening statement, the defendant, desiring the court to limit the issue of negligence, tendered the following admission:

> "Before proceeding with the trial of the case, we desire to make the following admission. The Pacific Gas & Electric Company desires to admit that on the morning of December 24, 1922, one of its wires fell, and that the defendant thereafter negligently permitted the wire to remain on the ground until the time alleged in the complaint, and that Henry Alan Martin, the plaintiff in this action, was injured as a result of such negligence. We have made this admission in the interest of shortening the trial of the case, believing that the circumstances justify it; and we will then go to the jury with the sole issue as to the nature and extent of the injuries, and the amount of just compensation to which the plaintiff is entitled."

This admission was predicated upon the contention that paragraph VIII, above quoted, limited the allegations of paragraph V to one ground of negligence, to wit, negligence arising not from the maintenance of said electric power wire, but negligence arising solely from neglect or failure to sooner discover and remove from the sidewalk area, where plaintiff was injured, this dangerous instrumentality. Counsel for defendant, having taken this position of weakness, undertook with great skill to turn it into a position of strength. For example, objection was repeatedly and emphatically made to any reference at all by plaintiff's counsel in his opening statement to the jury to the alleged negligent acts which caused the wire to break and fall to the ground. Objection was also strenuously urged even to the reading of portions of said paragraph V of the complaint in the presence of the jury. Objection was also time and again urged to the introduction of proof upon this issue or upon any issue of negligence. Again, repeated and determined opposition was asserted to reference to such alleged acts of negligence or to the question of negligence at all in the argument of counsel. Over and over again his words in this behalf were assigned as misconduct. This same issue arose again on motion for new trial, where the acts and conduct of plaintiff's counsel with respect to its particular subject-matter were set forth in an affidavit, the court striking said references from said affidavit and thereafter denying the motion for new trial.

The meaning of this pleading and the acts and conduct of both parties with respect thereto become, therefore, an important consideration at the outset. The said amended complaint was filed on June 22, 1923. On July 12, 1923, a general and special demurrer thereto was filed, but nothing is found therein urging ambiguity or uncertainty between the allegations of paragraphs V and VIII thereof. But pending the hearing on this issue of law, a motion to strike out certain portions thereof was made. This motion was denied and the demurrer overruled on September 7, 1923. A portion of said motion was directed to paragraph V of the amended complaint, but even had it prevailed it would have left the following allegations in said paragraph relating to the cause of the falling of said wire:

> "That on or about the 24th day of December, 1922, * * * that as a result of said wires coming in contact with the limbs and branches of said tree and the limbs and branches thereof falling and bearing upon said wires, and said wires, arcing, burning, rubbing, and cutting said limbs and branches, one of said wires broke and fell to the ground, and remained thereon at or near said sidewalk from about 6 o'clock a. m. until 12 o'clock m. on the said 24th day of December, 1922; that said wire remained connected on one end with the said electric wire power line and was, during all of said time, heavily charged with electricity, which said charged wire was so exposed and unguarded as to permit pedestrians to come in contact with it, all of which the said defendant well knew; that said broken wire lying on the ground near said sidewalk, as aforesaid, was at all of said times owned by and under the control of said defendant."

The denial in toto of this motion to strike certainly put defendant on notice that plaintiff was relying upon all of the acts of negligence set forth in said paragraph V without limitation of any kind. Defendant answered said paragraph and also paragraph VIII specifically, and apparently experienced no trouble in that behalf, for said answer makes specific denial of each of the causes alleged to have contributed to the injury of plaintiff. Finally, answering said paragraph VIII, there is no intimation of doubt about its reference to all of paragraph V, the answer in this connection being:

> "Answering the allegations contained in paragraph VIII of said complaint, said defendant denies that said plaintiff suffered or received the said alleged injuries, or any of them, wholly or at all, by reason of the alleged carelessness or negligence, or any carelessness or negligence, of said defendant in permitting said electric power line to remain upon the ground at the time or in the manner alleged in said complaint, or otherwise, or at all; and in this connection said defendant denies that said plaintiff was ever injured by reason of any careless or negligent act or omission on the part of said defendant with respect to the management or control of its said power lines, or any of them, or at all."

In this portion of the answer, we find a clear interpretation of said pleading as putting forth the issue:

> "* * * Careless or negligent act or omission on the part of said defendant with respect to the management (and) or control of its said power lines. * * *"

This paragraph VIII, standing alone, would not be a sufficient allegation of negligence, reference to paragraph V being necessary for the gravamen of the charge. If we go there for the allegations of negligence which defendant admitted, why may we not be referred to said paragraph also for all other allegations there found? Why may not it be held that the pleader intended said words "at the time and in the manner aforesaid" to refer to all the contributing causes set forth in said paragraph V? The most that may be said of said allegations is that as between the two paragraphs an ambiguity arises. The demurrer, however, as above stated, took no form which permitted the raising of this question. The motion to strike, as above noted, really did not fully and fairly raise it.

Moreover, it must be noted that plaintiff from the beginning of the trial to its close was insisting that he was standing on paragraph V as the specific acts of negligence relied upon, and was contending also that the meaning thereof was in no way limited or qualified by said paragraph VIII. The trial court, as above noted, sustained plaintiff in this construction of the pleading. The defendant had an answer on file consonant with that construction. The defendant at no time subsequent to September 7, 1923, when the motion to strike was denied, could have been in doubt as to the construction of the pleading contended for by plaintiff. Defendant enjoyed every right it would or could have had, had paragraph VIII been eliminated as surplusage or been amended to harmonize perfectly with paragraph V. Upon no reasonable hypothesis can it be said that defendant has or could have suffered any legal injury arising from this situation. The effect of the action of the court was as though it had struck out paragraph VIII or had amended it so as to fully obviate any cause for the claim that paragraph V was in any way impaired by it. Defendant had a fair opportunity from every standpoint to meet the charge, and in fact attempted to do so as best it could when the plaintiff placed the employee responsible for the maintenance of the wire upon the witness stand. The language of Bergen v. Tulare County Power Co., 173 Cal. 709, 715, 161 P. 269, 271, is here applicable:

> "The order overruling the demurrer to the complaint was a proper one. The case was tried upon a well-defined theory, and even if the complaint had contained the defects of which the demurring party complained, that litigant was not misled because the controversy was fairly determined upon its merits. Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234–237, 90 P. 936; Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 P. 663; Irrgang v. Ott, 9 Cal. App. 440–442, 99 P. 528."

See, also, Grossetti v. Sweasey, 176 Cal. 793, 795, 169 P. 687; Ingalls v. Monte Cristo Oil, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 128, 133, 167 P. 857; and Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 370, 113 P. 663.

[2] With this construction of the pleading on the issue of negligence, practically all of the contentions of appellant, one by one, must fail. For example, the admission indulged by it, which undertook to limit the proof, becomes an admission of only one of the two or more specific acts of negligence alleged to have proximately contributed to plaintiff's injuries. Such an admission not only did not authorize the court to limit the evidence, but in reality it would have been error if the court had undertaken to so limit it. Williamson v. Atlas Powder Co., 212 App. Div. 68, 208 N. Y. S. 301. This construction of the pleading makes also free from error the act of counsel for plaintiff in referring to all the issues on negligence in his opening statement. This same observation is true with reference to the marshaling and introduction of evidence to prove each of the specific acts of negligence alleged in said paragraph. This holding renders harmless also the argument of counsel referring to the evidence upon this subject. This same observation is again true as to the objections made to the instructions of the court outlining the legal principles applicable to all the allegations of negligence contained in said paragraph V. This also renders harmless any act of the trial court in striking from the affidavit used on motion for new trial those references to the alleged misconduct of counsel in arguing the features of the evidence relating to the allegations of said questioned paragraph. Indeed, it never has been the law that it was or could be error to prove even admitted allegations of the pleadings if the patience of the trial court would permit it.

"It does not lie in the power of one party, however, to prevent the introduction of relevant evidence by admitting in general terms the fact which such evidence tends to prove, if the Presiding Justice in his discretion deems it proper to receive it. Parties, as a general rule, are entitled to prove the essential facts, to present to the jury a picture of the events relied on. To substitute for such a picture a naked admission might have the effect to rob the evidence of much of its fair and legitimate weight. No exception lies to the admission of relevant evidence under such circumstances." 26 R. C. L. § 40, p. 1036; Dunning v. Maine Cent. Ry. Co., 91 Me. 87, 39 A. 352, 64 Am. St. Rep. 208.

[3] The fact that the evidence admitted might, as an incidental feature thereof, be inflammatory or have a tendency to unduly arouse the jury does not render such evidence inadmissible. In Mohn v. Tingley, 191 Cal. 470, 491, 217 P. 733, 742, it is said:

> "The chief objection to all the evidence of which complaint is made is that it served to stir up the prejudice of the jury and arouse sympathy in respondent's favor. But the evidence being admissible, its effect upon the jury would furnish no reason for its rejection."

[4] Likewise no prejudicial error can be committed by reading the pleadings to the jury, even though the legal effect of them has been admitted. Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 410, 414, 19 P. 698.

We therefore hold that the said attempt of counsel to limit the proof was abortive and the trial court committed no error in its rulings in respect thereto.

[5] The only other assignments of error necessary to notice are two: First, that it was error for the court to admit evidence of existing curvature of the spine, chorea, and endocarditis as results of the injury, and likelihood of cancer in the future, because these ailments were not specifically pleaded; and, second, that the verdict was excessive as the result of passion and prejudice.

The plaintiff's injuries may be described as follows (testimony of Dr. Thompson):

> "The first injury was on the back of his head. The burn there caused the external area of the skull to die, and it had to be curetted away about a half inch in diameter, and the external plate had to be removed; the electric current entered the body through the right hand, and his two fingers and thumb were very badly burned, and the little finger was partially removed, that is, about one-third of the bone; the little finger is somewhat pressed in toward the other finger, and a portion of it and the muscles are dead from the effects of the burn. The second finger was entirely destroyed to the knuckle joint and had to be removed to that joint; the first finger was destroyed down almost to the joint; the thumb was removed at the last joint; the wire evidently came in contact with this hand through the body and went out through the head and where the boy's body came in contact with the ground; the next injury was a spot right in the left shoulder blade, about two inches long, where it went through the skin; the next burn was about four inches long on the left side, and some of the tissues underneath were destroyed; we took some skin off the leg and covered that over; you can still see the outline of the scar; at the point where this burn occurred the muscles extending to the arm where the electricity entered the body, the upper part of the arm is about half an inch smaller than the left arm, and in the forearm it is about a quarter of an inch smaller than the left arm; the boy was formerly right handed; the measurements of the boy's chest disclose that the muscles on the right side seemed to be three or four inches smaller than the muscles on the left side of the chest; the tendency of the muscles on the left side of the chest, being injured and drawn toward the spine, is to pull the muscles to the left of the vertebræ, causing a curvature of the spine about half an inch at the widest place; there was also a spot on the left shoulder blade about two inches in length."

The evidence also showed the boy to have been in robust health and between the age of 8 and 9 years when the injury was received. With these injuries, emphasis was also made by plaintiff's testimony of the presence of a pronounced case of chorea, commonly known as St. Vitus dance, a nervous affliction causing a systematic contraction of various muscles, sometimes causing spasms of face and neck and a twitching of the eyes. The presence of endocarditis was shown, this being a disease of the muscles of the heart, which is found in about 80 per cent. of the cases of chorea. It is described as a chronic inflammatory trouble of heart muscles and, like any other heart trouble, it is a serious affliction. Testimony was also given to the effect that there was some danger of a cancerous growth arising because of poor circulation to and the tender condition of large scars on the body of plaintiff as the result of the burns received at the time in question. Speaking of this situation, one of plaintiff's witnesses said:

> "I would say there are a certain number of cases of this character where injurious results occur later in life. I would not say that they are certain to appear, but in a certain number of cases they do appear."

A second expert testified to the same effect.

The two experts testifying for defendant, after a full and fair examination of plaintiff, gave a similar opinion, one saying:

> "I don't agree with the doctor in that respect. Cancers do occur in the skin in cases of scarred tissues, but the percentage of cancer that develop in scars is very, very small."

And the other:

> "There is always a possibility of anything in medicine and surgery. The probability of a malignant growth in this case is very remote."

It should be here carefully noted that as to curvature of the spine, presence of chorea, and endocarditis, the facts were made known to the experts of defendant when they met prior to the trial, and had ample opportunity to examine and did examine plaintiff. The evidence, however, as to the danger from cancerous growth was apparently not discussed at the time of said examination. But it should be noted that this apprehension of danger was considered by all the witnesses as more or less remote. It should also be carefully noted that objections to the testimony upon all these subjects were belated and came entirely too late to avail defendant here. The physicians, and particularly Dr. Thompson, testified fully upon all these subjects before objections of any kind were made. If all that occurred after objections were given full weight, it would add little, if anything, to the testimony that had already entered the record.

Moreover, the court adequately limited the issue in this particular and instructed the jury as follows:

"You are therefore instructed that the amount plaintiff may recover in this action is limited to such damages as are the effect of the injuries complained of in his complaint, or reasonably certain to result therefrom. You are instructed that, in estimating the amount of compensation to be awarded plaintiff for the future consequences of the injuries complained of in his complaint, he may only recover such damages as by the evidence it is reasonably certain he will suffer in the future as a direct and necessary result of his injuries. This does not mean such future disability, pain or mental anguish, as the evidence may show is 'reasonably probable,' and does not mean you may estimate prospective damages upon what you 'believe' might be the plaintiff's future suffering. Such damages may only be awarded for injury or suffering reasonably certain to result in the future."

An examination of the amended complaint shows that the damages contended for might have been defined in clearer language. Nevertheless, we believe that paragraph VII thereof is broad and general enough to admit all this testimony and to make operative the rule stated in Samuels v. Cal. St., etc., Co., 124 Cal. 294, 296, 56 P. 1115, as follows:

"The complaint averred that Mrs. Samuels, by reason of the accident, 'was rendered unconscious for a long period of time, and received great bodily injury, and was made sick, sore, lame, and disabled for a long period of time, to wit, from thence hitherto, during all of which time she thereby suffered great pain, and was thereby then and there hindered and prevented from attending to her business and domestic affairs, and has ever since remained and continued sick, sore, lame, and disabled, and has suffered, and still continues to suffer, great pain of body and anguish of mind, and is informed and believes that said injuries are of a permanent nature.' Under this averment evidence was admitted of a uterine trouble brought upon Mrs. Samuels by the accident. Such evidence was admissible under the general averment of bodily injury and resulting damage. Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574 [22 P. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498] 13 Am. St. Rep. 174; Montgomery v. Lansing, etc., Ry. Co., 103 Mich. 46 [61 N. W. 543, 29 L. R. A. 287]; Denver, etc., Ry. Co. v. Harris, 122 U. S. 597 [7 S. Ct. 1286, 30 L. Ed. 1146]."

This rule is an amplification of the rule earlier announced and clearly stated in Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 579, 22 P. 266, 5 L. R A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 174. The allegations of the complaint do not confine the result of the injuries solely to a disabled arm and hand, but in other respects declare that by reason of said injury and burns plaintiff suffered and still suffers great and excruciating pain, and has been maimed and disfigured and will continue to suffer great and unusual pain and mental anguish for a long time to come. These allegations were broad enough at least to admit testimony as to any affliction that had already developed from said injury. Other interpretations of the above rule may be found in the following cases: Kuhns v. Marshall, 44 Cal. App. 588, 186 P. 632; Worden v. Central Fire Bldg. Co., 172 Cal. 94, 97, 155 P. 839; Lauder v. Currier, 3 Cal. App. 28, 84 P. 217; Campbell v. L. A. Traction Co., 137 Cal. 565, 70 P. 624.

This conclusion also disposes of the contention that the court erred in refusing to peremptorily instruct the jury to disregard all evidence respecting curvature of the spine, chorea, endocarditis, and danger of cancer.

The only other contention to be considered is the claim that the verdict is as a matter of law excessive. This contention, in view of what has been said above, requires no discussion. As we understand counsel, they really predicate their claim of excessive damages in this respect upon alleged prejudicial matters hereinabove discussed, particularly the reception of evidence, the instructions of the court, the conduct of counsel, and failure of the court to limit or prevent the admission of evidence of negligence. Being unable to agree with learned counsel for defendant that any prejudicial error was committed in that respect, this assignment of error spends its entire force. There is nothing tangible found in the record to authorize us, as a matter of law, to declare the verdict the result of passion or prejudice.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: SEAWELL, J.; LANGDON, J.

SHENK, J. [6] I concur in the judgment. Paragraph VIII of the amended complaint alleged the negligence of the defendant which was the proximate cause of the injury, namely, that the defendant negligently permitted the electric power wire "to remain" upon the ground. The concluding phrase of the allegation, to wit, "At the time and in the manner aforesaid," should be held to refer only to such portions of the allegations of paragraph V as related to the negligence of the defendant in permitting the wire "to remain" on the ground. The admission of the defendant at the commencement of the trial constituted an admission of the negligence alleged in paragraph VIII as so construed and as such was an admission of the negligence that proximately caused the injury. Assuming that this belated admission should not have operated to prevent the plaintiff from proving his allegations of negligence under this material issue, if the court should so permit, it is clear to me that proof of the other allegation of negligence should not have been allowed if the same tendered an immaterial issue. Whether the defendant was negligent in the maintenance of the unbroken wire at or near the scene of the accident, as alleged in paragraph V, was, in my opinion, immaterial. I am not satisfied, however, that the error of the court in permitting proof on the immaterial issue resulted in a miscarriage of justice, as it cannot be said, in view of the seriousness of the injuries inflicted on the minor, that the verdict was excessive. In order so to declare it must appear to this court that the judgment is "so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at the first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury." Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 713, 106 P. 83; Mohn v. Tingley, 191 Cal. 470, 492, 217 P. 733. I am not prepared so to declare.

I concur: WASTE, C. J.

CURTIS, J. [7] I concur in the judgment. While it may have been error for the trial court to have admitted evidence of the defendant's negligence after the admission of its counsel at the commencement of the trial that the plaintiff sustained the injuries complained of by reason of the negligence of the defendant, I am not satisfied the defendant was seriously prejudiced by the introduction of such evidence. By this admission of defendant's counsel the sole issue left to be tried by the jury related to the nature and extent of plaintiff's injuries and the amount of compensation to which plaintiff was entitled by reason thereof. The evidence upon this issue is fully set out in the main opinion. It shows that the plaintiff, a boy in robust health, and of the age of 8 or 9 years at the time of his injury, was left by reason thereof a helpless cripple, to spend the remainder of his life in pain and suffering, unable to earn a bare existence, and, by reason of his afflicted condition deprived of enjoying any, of the pleasures or even comforts of life. With such evidence as to the extent and seriousness of plaintiff's injuries the jury would have been warranted in finding the verdict which they rendered against defendant, and in the absence of any of this evidence of negligence, I am not satisfied that the result of the jury's deliberation would have been different from the verdict which we are now asked to set aside. There has been no miscarriage of justice, and whatever error was committed by the court in the admission of evidence showing defendant's negligence did not result in any prejudice to the defendant.

RICHARDS, J. I dissent from that portion of this opinion wherein it is held that the trial court was not in error in permitting the plaintiff to introduce a large amount of highly prejudicial evidence upon matters which were no longer at issue on the trial of the cause. The defendant's offer to go to trial upon the sole issue "as to the nature and extent of the injuries, and the amount of just compensation to which the plaintiff is entitled" could not be otherwise interpreted than as a withdrawal of every denial of negligence in its answer upon which an issue of negligence could be predicated, and hence upon which evidence could be producible. Had the defendant's answer contained no denials of the defendant's alleged negligence, but only denials as to the extent of the plaintiff's injuries, could it be contended that the plaintiff would nevertheless be entitled to present a large amount of inflammable evidence upon the subject of the defendant's past and proximate acts of negligence, the obvious purpose of which could be only to arouse resentment and prejudice in the minds of the jurymen? If so, this judgment is correct. If not, it should be reversed.

ERDEVIG v. MARKET ST. RY. CO.★

Rehearing Denied March 8, 1928.

1. Street railroads ⟾112(1)—Pedestrian, suing street railway company for injuries from operation of car, was required to prove defendant's negligence proximately causing injury.

Pedestrian, suing street railway company for injuries, was required to prove negligence on part of defendant in operation of its car, and that such negligence proximately caused injury.

2. Street railroads ⟾111(1)—Street railway company, sued by pedestrian for injuries, had burden to plead and prove contributory negligence.

Contributory negligence was affirmative defense to be alleged and proved by street railway company, sued by pedestrian for injuries resulting from operation of street car.

3. Negligence ⟾136(26)—Trial court was required to grant motion for nonsuit, if injured plaintiff's own evidence convicted her of contributory negligence as matter of law.

If plaintiff, in endeavoring to prove negligence on part of the defendant, gave evidence from which contributory negligence on her part could have been reasonably inferred, court was under duty on motion for nonsuit to consider such evidence, and to grant defendant's motion, if testimony showed plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

4. Street railroads ⟾114(10)—Evidence of street railroad's operation of street car at rapid rate and without warning past safety zone and car on adjoining track held to make prima facie case of negligence in pedestrian's action for injuries.

Evidence of street railroad's negligence in permitting operation of street car at rapid rate of speed and without warning past safety zone at intersection and past car on adjoining track held sufficient to make prima facie case of negligence in action for injuries by pedestrain, who, while passing in front of car which had stopped to take and unload passengers, was struck by another car proceeding in same direction.

5. Street railroad 🔑85(4)—Pedestrian has at least equal right with street car to use of crossing.

Pedestrian has at least as much right to use of street crossing at intersection as has passing street car.

6. Street railroads 🔑117(21)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian passing in front of street car at intersection and coming into contact with moving street car on adjoining track held for jury.

Contributory negligence of pedestrian proceeding in front of one street car, which had stopped at intersection, and coming into contact with rapidly moving car on another track which was claimed to have approached without warning, held question of fact for jury in action for injuries.

7. Trial 🔑142—Question on which reasonable minds might differ is for jury.

Question on which reasonable minds might differ is one of fact for jury, and not question of law for determination of court.

8. Street railroads 🔑98(6)—Pedestrian passing in front of street car at regular pedestrian's crossing could assume persons in charge of car on adjoining track, which car was obscured from view, would give warning signal.

Pedestrian passing in front of street car at intersection at regular pedestrian's crossing had right to rely on those in charge of car on adjoining track to give warning or signal of approach, especially where view of pedestrians was obstructed on account of car which had stopped.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Josine Erdevig against the Market Street Railway Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Max Schmulowitz, Oliver B. Wyman, A. D. Duncan, and C. M. Booth, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Cyril Appel, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was brought by appellant to recover damages for injuries sustained by her in being knocked down by an electric car owned by respondent, and operated at the time of the accident by respondent's employees. The trial court granted a nonsuit and the plaintiff has appealed. The evidence shows that the appellant was, at the time she was struck by respondent's car, in the act of crossing Market street, in the city of San Francisco, at its intersection with Franklin and Twelfth streets. Just prior to the accident the appellant had walked from the northerly curbstone of Market street to the safety zone contiguous to the tracks of the Municipal Street Railway on the northerly side of Market street. A Municipal car had stopped opposite and parallel to this safety zone upon appellant's arrival at the safety zone. This car, before it stopped, had been traveling in a westerly direction, and the front or westerly end thereof was about even with the westerly end of the safety zone. Appellant walked in front of the standing Municipal car, intending to cross Market street at the intersection crossing to the safety zone on the opposite or southerly side of said street for the purpose of taking a car which would cary her in an easterly direction down Market street. We now quote from appellant's testimony:

"The Market Street Railway tracks are about six feet from the Municipal tracks. I saw no car on the Market Street Railway tracks. Just as I cleared the Municipal car a Market Street Railway car knocked me to the pavement. I did not hear any gong or bell.

"Q. Did you see the street car before it struck you? A. No; I did not; it was instantaneous.

"Q. Do you know what portion of the car struck you? A. The front corner, as near as I know.

"Q. Which front corner, or which side? A. The right. * * * The car struck my left thigh. My back, in the bumping around, was wrenched badly, and also bruised, and within the course of being bumped around my knees were bruised and my elbows also. My back had to be taped. The buttons were all torn off my clothes and my stockings were in shreds. The first I recollect after the accident was being back in the safety zone that I had just left. The Market Street Railway car that struck me stopped quite a little distance ahead of the safety zone after I was struck."

On cross-examination the appellant testified as follows:

"Q. The only time that you saw the Market Street Railway Company's car that was involved in the accident was the instant that it came in contact with you? A. I knew nothing; it was instantaneous; just when I cleared the Municipal car—just the instant I had cleared it I was struck.

"Q. Did you see the Market Street Railway Company car at all? A. No.

"Q. And, as you crossed in front of the Municipal Street car, was there anything to obstruct your view to your east, that is, to your left, or to your right, on Market street? A. Well, the instant I cleared the track—all the while—why, I put my gaze ahead.

"Q. You were looking straight ahead? A. And to the side as I crossed, and the instant I cleared the Municipal track I was struck.

"Q. When you crossed in front of the Municipal Street car, did you look to your left? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was there anything to obstruct your view in an easterly direction, toward the Ferry, on Market street, at the time you looked to the left? A. No.

"Mr. Booth: I don't suppose, Miss Erdevig, that you know how far these cars extend out from the tracks and into the space between the tracks? A. Well, I can't say exactly, but it is quite a little ways from the tracks that they extend."

A Mrs. Foard, a sister of appellant, testified on cross-examination that:

> "I saw my sister walk in front of a standing Municipal car and the next thing after she passed in front of the standing Municipal car she was knocked down by a Market Street car. She was never on the track in front of the Market Street car."

It was also in evidence that the tracks of both the Municipal Street Railway and the Market Street Railway were standard gauge and that the distance between the two rails of each track was four feet eight inches, and that the distance between the Municipal Street Railway track and the Market Street Railway track was six feet four inches. There was no evidence as to the exact distance the cars extended out from or overhung the tracks on which they are operated.

[1-3] In order for the appellant to have made out a case which would entitle her to have the merits thereof passed upon and decided by the jury, it was necessary for her to prove negligence on the part of the respondent in the operation of its car which proximately caused her injury. The burden of proving contributory negligence on the part of the appellant is an affirmative defense and must be both alleged and proven by respondent. But if appellant, in endeavoring to prove negligence on the part of the respondent, gave evidence from which contributory negligence on her part could have been reasonably inferred, it was the duty of the court, upon the motion for a nonsuit, to give consideration to such evidence, and if it were sufficiently strong as to show as a matter of law that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence which proximately caused the injury sustained by her, then it was the duty of the trial court to grant such motion. Therefore appellant's evidence must have shown negligence on the part of respondent proximately causing her injury without showing that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence, and unless it possesses both these characteristics the plaintiff failed to make out a case for the jury and a nonsuit was proper.

[4-7] Let us first ascertain whether the evidence of appellant made out a prima facie case of negligence against respondent. The place where the injury was sustained was at a street intersection. From this fact we think we can reasonably infer that it happened at a point in the street where pedestrians were not only accustomed to cross, but where in most communities they are required to walk in going from one side of the street to the other. The evidence shows that a safety zone was established at this point and that cars stopped there to take on and unload passengers. The Municipal car had stopped for that purpose just before appellant walked in front of it. The Market Street Railway car was traveling in the same direction as this Municipal car at the time it struck appellant and was obscured from appellant's sight by the Municipal car. We think the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that the car of respondent approached this crossing without stopping, and that at the time it was traveling at rather a rapid rate of speed, as the evidence of appellant was that after it hit her it went some distance beyond the safety zone before it was stopped. Appellant testified that she heard neither bell nor gong sounded by those operating the car, and from this evidence we must infer that no warning was given as the Market Street Railway car approached the crossing. We think this evidence establishes beyond question that the respondent was negligent in the operation of its car at the point where it struck and injured appellant. Respondent was therefore responsible to the appellant for the injuries sustained by her unless appellant was guilty of contributory negligence. As we have already seen, the distance between the two car tracks was six feet four inches. The cars of each company extended out or overhung the tracks some little distance, and this would diminish the space between the car on the Municipal Street Railway track and the car on the Market Street Railway track when abreast of each other to the extent that the two cars extended out over their respective tracks. Whatever this space was (and from the evidence it must have been materially less than six feet four inches, the distance between the two car tracks) it represented the distance the appellant traveled after passing in front of the Municipal car before she was struck by the car of respondent. Her testimony was that:

> "Just when I cleared the Municipal car—just the instant I had cleared it I was struck."

We might reasonably infer from this evidence that appellant took but a step or two after clearing one car before she was struck by the other. As we have already seen, her view of the Market Street Railway car was obscured by the presence of the Municipal car, and it would continue to be obscured until she had passed beyond the Municipal car. She was looking straight ahead and to her left. She was using the street crossing, which she, as well as other pedestrians, had at least an equal right with respondent to use. Whether under these circumstances she was guilty of contributory negligence in walking in front of respondent's car, as it neared the crossing without giving any warning of its approach, we think was a question which should rightly be left to the decision of the jury. It was a question upon which reasonable minds might differ and was, therefore, one of fact for the jury, and not one of law for the court. Driscoll v. Cable Railway Co., 97 Cal. 553, 32 P. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203; Hennesey v. Bingham, 125 Cal. 627, 58 P. 200; Babcock v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 128 Cal. 173, 60 P. 780; Wahlgren v. Market Street Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 656, 62 P. 308, 64 P. 993; Schneider v. Market Street Railway Co., 134 Cal. 482, 66 P. 734; Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 P. 677.

The facts in this case are quite similar to those in Driscoll v. Cable Railway Co., supra. In this latter case this court said:

> "Under these circumstances—the appellant being in default for not giving the proper warning—we think that the question whether deceased was guilty of contributory negligence was a proper one for the jury; that deceased cannot be held, as a matter of law, to have been so guilty; and that there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that he was not. Counsel for appellant, in his very thorough and able brief, has cited a number of cases in which it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, because he had not exercised sufficient caution in attempting to cross a railroad track. Those were cases, however, where the accidents occurred on ordinary steam railroads running through the country at comparatively long intervals of time; and the rule there laid down can hardly be applied in all its strictness to street railroads in crowded cities, where a car that can be speedily stopped passes a crossing every two or three minutes, and where people necessarily cross the streets frequently and hurriedly. * * * Of course, if all people exercised the greatest care and caution in approaching and crossing railroad tracks, such accidents as the one here involved would rarely, if ever, occur; but the law does not expect or require such extreme care."

[8] The appellant had a right to rely upon those in charge of respondent's car, in the event they were approaching the crossing then being in regular use by pedestrians, that they would give some warning or signal of the approach of the car, especially when their view of pedestrians passing in front of the Municipal car was obscured by the presence of the Municipal car. This principal was enunciated in the case of Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 P. 677, and has never to our knowledge been departed from by this court. In that case Mr. Justice Shaw, speaking for the court said:

> "The foot passenger or driver of a horse has a right to expect that those in charge of street cars will operate them in the manner and run them at the speed which is customary at the particular place, and that they will give the usual warnings and signals, and take the usual precautions to avoid injury to others. * * * In a crowded street it is often necessary and not inconsistent with reasonable prudence for a person to cross the street in front of street cars, in motion or at rest, at a point so near that it would be prima facie an act of negligence, if attempted at another place where the streets are less crowded and the cars usually run faster."

Respondent has cited a number of cases in support of its contention that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The difference between the facts in those cases and the facts in the present case, in our opinion, renders these authorities inapplicable to the present action.

Judgment reversed.

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 9, 1928.

Appeal and error 🔑458(2)—On appeal from judgment dismissing cross-complaint, defendants held entitled to have judgment stayed and attachment preserved upon giving sufficient stay bonds.

Defendants who interposed cross-complaint and levied attachments, and appealed from judgment dismissing cross-complaint, were entitled to have judgment stayed and to have attachment preserved pending appeal upon giving good and sufficient stay bonds in form and manner required by law, plaintiffs being entitled, however, to good and sufficient undertakings.

In Bank.

Action by Fred Palmer and others against M. J. Fix and others in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiffs on the original and cross-complaint, and defendants appeal. On defendants' application for writ of supersedeas, prayed to be directed to the superior court to stay execution on giving of proper undertakings. Writ granted.

Verge & Cooney and Harold F. Collins, both of Los Angeles, for plaintiffs.

John A. Jorgenson, C. H. Tyler, and Chas. H. Sherrick, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and S. V. O. Pritchard, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an application for a writ of supersedeas. Plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants in the superior court, in and for the county of Los Angeles, to recover from the defendants the sum of $3,571, with interest and costs, claimed to be due under a certain contract. The defendants filed an answer denying said indebtedness and also filed a cross-complaint, in which they alleged the breach of said contract by plaintiffs, and sought to recover therefor in the sum of $30,000. At the time of filing said cross-complaint the defendants caused an attachment thereon to be issued and levied upon certain real estate belonging to one of the plaintiffs. Upon the trial of the cause the court, on or about October 10, 1927, rendered and entered its judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $3,571.88 and costs, and against the defendants on their cross-complaint, which judgment ordered a dismissal thereof. On October 11, 1927, the defendants and cross-complainants filed with the county clerk a notice of appeal, and also and in connection therewith an undertaking to stay execution on said judgment, and also an undertaking to keep in force pending said appeal the attachment which had theretofore issued and been levied in said action.

Thereafter, between said last-named date and November 7, 1927, a certain series of proceedings occurred in the trial court and also in the District Court of Appeal, in and for the Second appellate district, affecting the matter of the sufficiency of the defendants' and cross-complainants' undertaking to stay execution and preserve the lien of their attachment upon their said appeal, which finally resulted in the making of an order by the trial court purporting to disapprove the said undertaking or undertakings on account of the alleged failure of the sureties to justify thereon. It was and is the contention of the appellants herein that the trial court was not justified in making said order, in view of the proceedings already had in said court having to do with the justification of the defendants' sureties upon their said undertakings on appeal. We do not deem it necessary to state in detail the nature and effect of said proceeding, nor shall we attempt to disentangle the snarl into which the court and the parties have apparently become enmeshed in consequence thereof. The plaintiffs are entitled to good and sufficient undertakings to stay execution upon this appeal. The defendants are entitled to have the judgment against them upon this appeal stayed, and also to have their attachment theretofore procured preserved pending their appeal upon giving good and sufficient stay bonds in the form and manner required by law.

It is therefore ordered that a writ of supersedeas issue herein staying execution upon the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs herein upon their original cause of action, and also for the preservation of the rights of the cross-complainants acquired by virtue of the attachment heretofore issued and levied herein upon their cross-complaint, upon the giving by the appellants of an undertaking or undertakings effectuating the foregoing purposes, and each or either of them, in the form and amount required by law, said undertaking or undertakings to be approved by the presiding judge of the superior court, in and for the county of Los Angeles, and filed in this court within 30 days from the date of this order.

BOULENGER v. MORISON. (Civ. 3373.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 25, 1928.

1. Principal and agent ⚷48—Agent's obligation to principal demands strictest integrity, good faith, and faithful service.

The law requires perfect good faith on the part of agents not only in form, but in substance; the obligation of an agent to his principal demanding the strictest integrity, good faith, and most faithful service.

2. Brokers ⚷34—Real estate agent must disclose to principal fact of contracting to sell for greater sum than originally agreed to with principal (Civ. Code, § 2330).

Where a real estate agent procured exclusive right to sell certain real estate for $30,000, but subsequently entered into a contract to sell it for a greater sum, held, that, under Civ. Code, § 2330, he was required to disclose to principal the fact of increased price for which property was to be sold.

3. Principal and agent ⚷70—One cannot be agent of both buyer and seller without their consent.

One cannot be the agent of both buyer and seller without consent of both.

4. Brokers ⚷100—Secret agreement by brokers for profit in addition to commission payable by owner rendered contract between purchaser and owner, while still executory, voidable at owner's option.

If brokers had secretly engaged with another to sell property in their hands for sale so as to receive a profit by them in addition to commisson payable from owner for making the sale for him at stated price, this rendered contract between purchaser and owner, which was still executory, voidable at option of owner.

5. Specific performance ⚷117—To obtain specific performance, plaintiff must allege and prove that contract was just and reasonable and consideration adequate (Civ. Code, § 3391).

The law is well established that before the court of equity will decree specific performance of a contract, the plaintiff must, because of Civ. Code, § 3391, allege and prove that it was just and reasonable, and that consideration was adequate.

6. Specific performance ⚷49(2)—"Adequate consideration," to warrant specific performance, is fair and reasonable price (Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 1).

Adequate consideration, as used in Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 1, without which specific performance will not be decreed, does not necessarily mean the highest price obtainable, but a price that is fair and reasonable under the circumstances; it always being peculiarly a question of fact for the trial court to determine in the light of all facts and circumstances of the particular case.

7. Specific performance 🔑121(8)—Evidence of higher offers held proof of inadequacy of price offered by purchaser, so as to preclude specific performance.

Where a landowner had placed realty in hands of agent to sell for $30,000, but agent received offers of $35,000 and $36,000 for the property, which offers he did not communicate to his principal but proceeded to enter into contract to sell the land to plaintiff for $30,000, held, in suit for specific performance, that the fact of such higher offers for the land was proof of inadequacy and unfairness of the purchase price of $30,000, so as to preclude purchaser's obtaining specific performance.

8. Specific performance 🔑28(1)—Contract cannot be specifically enforced unless terms are clear, definite, and certain (Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6).

A contract cannot, because of Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6, be specifically enforced unless its terms are clear, definite, and certain, and if they are not so, a court of equity will leave the party seeking specific performance to his remedy at law.

9. Specific performance 🔑99—Purchaser's failure to deposit part of purchase price within time provided precluded his obtaining specific performance of land purchase contract (Civ. Code, § 3392).

Where purchaser of realty sought specific performance of the contract, held, that, under Civ. Code, § 3392, his failure to make a deposit of part of purchase price within time provided by contract precluded his obtaining specific performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action for specific performance by A. E. Boulenger against D. Morison, wherein Catherine Elizabeth Morison, executrix of the estate of Donald Morison, was substituted as defendant on defendant's death. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert F. Shippee, Henry I. Broulett, Broulett & Shippee, and J. M. Stevens, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON Justice, pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff, A. E. Boulenger, from a judgment rendered against him in an action wherein he sought to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate.

The facts are briefly these: On October 8, 1923, Donald Morison and his wife, Catherine Elizabeth Morison, owned certain real estate in the city of Los Angeles, which was community property. "Terry & Co." were real estate brokers and are the successors of another real estate firm known as "Wheeler & Terry," and were operating in Los Angeles. The plaintiff, A. E. Boulenger, is the father-in-law of Terry, but appears to have no connection with the firm of Terry & Co., other than hereinafter mentioned. On the said 8th day of October, 1923, Donald Morison gave Wheeler & Terry an exclusive right and option to sell the property in question at any time within 30 days for the sum of $30,000, out of which Wheeler & Terry were to receive $1,000 as commission for making the sale.

The plaintiff contends that he purchased the property from Terry & Co. under this option on October 8, 1923, for the sum of $30,000, and paid Terry & Co. a deposit thereon of $200. The defendant contends, and the court found upon conflicting evidence, that nothing was done under the option until October 12, 1923, when a Mrs. Ransdell entered into an agreement with Terry & Co., the successors of Wheeler & Terry, by which she was to buy the property in question for $35,000, and made a deposit of $200 thereon. Mrs. Ransdell testified that Terry & Co. had told her that they thought they could get the owner to sell for $35,000; "that he was an old sick man living in Hollywood." The person referred to was shown to be Mr. Morison. At that time, it must be remembered that the plaintiff, Boulenger, was claiming to be the owner of the same property, through purchase from Terry & Co. on October 8, 1923. On October 13, 1923, the next day after the agreement with Mrs. Ransdell, Mr. Fellows, the admitted agent and representative of Terry & Co., went to the residence of Mr. Morison and procured his signature to an agreement dated October 12, 1923, wherein Morison agreed to sell to plaintiff the property in question for $30,000, and agreed to pay Terry & Co. $1,000 commission. On October 15, 1923, Morison placed in escrow with the bank, in conformity with the contract, deeds executed by himself and wife to the plaintiff, with certain escrow instructions. The plaintiff also filed with the bank his escrow instructions. After this was done, and on the 17th of October, one Schleyn offered Terry & Co. $36,000 for the property, whereupon Terry & Co. returned to Mrs. Ransdell her deposit of $200, and wrote her a letter in part as follows:

> "We regret very much that we were unable to get the owner to accept your offer of $35,000. * * *"

Upon receipt of this letter, Mrs. Ransdell called upon Mr. Morison and informed him of her negotiations with Terry & Co. for the property. This was the first information Mr. Morison had received as to the negotiations carried on by Terry & Co. with Mrs. Ransdell and Mr. Schleyn.

After the agreement of sale, deed, and instructions had been placed in escrow, and before receiving the call from Mrs. Ransdell, a controversy arose between Morison and plaintiff relative to the title and certain setbacks and restrictions affecting the property, which continued until November 19, 1923, when the defendant, Morison, withdrew from the escrow and so notified plaintiff. The plaintiff never placed in escrow at any time any money called for in the contract. Thereafter, on December 15, 1923, the plaintiff sought to waive all objections to the title and to the setbacks and restrictions, etc., and so notified Morison, but Morison refused to proceed further with the transaction and withdrew his deed from escrow. Thereafter, and on the 4th of March, 1924, this action for specific performance was instituted.

The answer, in addition to denying the material allegations of the complaint, sets up the special defense of fraud, practiced upon the defendant Morison by his own agent, Terry & Co.

The case was tried by the court, sitting without a jury, and the court found that plaintiff was not entitled to enforce specific performance of the contract and rendered judgment accordingly. Since the trial the defendant Morison has died, and Catherine Elizabeth Morison, executrix of his estate, has been substituted as defendant and respondent herein.

Many reasons are set forth in appellant's brief why the judgment should be reversed, and equally as many are set forth in respondent's brief why it should be affirmed.

The principal contention made in support of the findings and judgment of the trial court is that plaintiff and his agent, the latter also being the agent for the defendant, did not exercise the utmost good faith, and concealed from the defendant, Morison, the fact that the property was being sold for $35,000 or $36,000 instead of $30,000.

Section 3391, Civil Code, provides that specific performance cannot be enforced against a party to a contract in any of the following cases:

> "(3) If his assent was obtained by the misrepresentation, concealment, circumvention, or unfair practices of any party to whom performance would become due under the contract, or by any promise of such party which has not been substantially fulfilled; or, (4) If his assent was given under the influence of mistake, misapprehension, or surprise. * * *"

[1] It is admitted that Terry & Co. was the agent of the defendant Morison. The law requires perfect good faith on the part of agents, not only in form, but in substance. Indeed, the obligation of an agent to his principal demands of him the strictest integrity, good faith, and the most faithful service. Lem v. Wilson, 27 Cal. App. 512, 150 P. 641; Ritchey v. McMichael, 4 Cal. Unrep. 384, 35 P. 151; Allsopp v. Joshua Hendy Machine Works, 5 Cal. App. 228, 90 P. 39; 1 Cal. Jur. 709.

[2] Section 2330, Civil Code, provides:

> "An agent represents his principal for all purposes within the scope of his actual or ostensible authority, and all the rights and liabilities which would accrue to the agent from transactions within such limit, if they had been entered into on his own account, accrue to the principal."

Therefore, any profit or advantage that Terry & Co. might make out of the transaction should have been disclosed to the defendant Morison.

[3] The law is well settled that Terry & Co. being the admitted agent of Morison, the seller, they could not at the same time be the agent of the purchaser without the consent of both seller and purchaser; the double agency is a fraud upon the principal, and he is not bound. Gordon v. Beck, 196 Cal. 773, 239 P. 309, and cases there cited; Glenn v. Rice, 174 Cal. 269, 162 P. 1020.

[4] The defendant, Morison, was entitled to receive, and had the right to expect, absolute fidelity and loyalty to his interests on the part of his agent, and their secret engagement with Mrs. Ransdell to sell the same property to her for $35,000 and receive a profit of $5,000, in addition to a commission of $1,000 from Morison for making the sale for him at $30,000, rendered the contract between plaintiff and Morison, which was still executory, voidable at the option of Morison. Gordon v. Beck, supra.

An agent cannot serve two masters. In Mechem on Agency, p. 301, this language is found:

> "Fidelity in the agent is what is aimed at, and as a means of securing it, the law will not permit the agent to place himself in a situation in which he may be tempted by his own private interest to disregard that of his principal. This doctrine, to speak again in the beautiful language of another, has its foundation, not so much in the commission of actual fraud, as in that profound knowledge of the human heart which dictated that hallowed petition, 'Lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil,' and that caused the announcement of the infallible truth that, 'A man cannot serve two masters.'"

[5] Irrespective of the question of fraud, it is contended by respondent that plaintiff's action must fall because there is no proof that the contract was just and reasonable and the consideration adequate. The law is well established that before a court of equity will decree specific performance of a contract, the plaintiff must allege and prove that the contract was just and reasonable and the consideration adequate. Section 3391, Civ. Code; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 P. 193; Gibbons v. Yosemite Lumber Co., 172 Cal. 714, 158 P. 196; Bishop v. Barndt, 43 Cal. App. 157, 184 P. 901; Joyce v. Tomasini, 168 Cal. 237, 142 P. 67; Ehrhart v. Mahony, 43 Cal. App. 448, 184 P. 1010; O'Connell v. Fowler, 46 Cal. App. 466, 189 P. 322; Morgan v. Dibble, 43 Cal. App. 116, 184 P. 704; Salisbury v. Yawger, 184 Cal. 795, 195 P. 682; Herzog v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R. R. Co., 153 Cal. 496, 95 P. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428; Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 171, 66 P. 231; Magee v. Magee, 174 Cal. 276, 162 P. 1023.

[6] "Adequate consideration," as used in section 3391, subd. 1, Civil Code, does not necessarily mean the highest price obtainable, but a price that is fair and reasonable under all the circumstances; it is always peculiarly a question of fact for the trial court to determine, in the light of all the facts and circumstances of each particular case. Morrill v. Everson, 77 Cal. 114, 19 P. 190; Wilson v. White, 161 Cal. 465, 119 P. 895; Cummings v. Roeth, 10 Cal. App. 144, 101 P. 434. No witness testified as to the market value, or the reasonable value of the property in question at the time the contract was entered into, and the court found on this point as follows:

> "The said price of $30,000 for said property was neither just, nor fair, nor reasonable, nor adequate as to said D. Morison, also known as Donald Morison, and there is not sufficient proof to find that said sum of $30,000 was a fair market value of said property at the date of said agreement."

We think this finding is amply supported by the evidence.

[7] There is sufficient evidence to show that the price was not fair and adequate under all the circumstances. No better proof of the inadequacy of the consideration, under all the circumstances, could be produced than the fact that two other persons were, at the time Morison entered into the contract with appellant, anxious to purchase the property, one for $35,000 and another for $36,000, and both proposed purchasers offered just as favorable terms as those offered by appellant.

[8] For still an additional reason we think the court's conclusion in denying specific performance was correct: The terms of the contract are so uncertain and indefinite as to be incapable of being specifically performed. A contract cannot be specifically enforced unless its terms are clear, definite, and certain. Agard v. Valencia, 39 Cal. 292; Magee v. McManus, 70 Cal. 553, 12 P. 451; Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 P. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334; Monsen v. Monsen, 174 Cal. 97, 162 P. 90; Magee v. Magee, supra; section 3390, subd. 6, Civ. Code; Klein v. Markarian, 175 Cal. 37, 165 P. 3; Buckmaster v. Bertram, 186 Cal. 673, 200 P. 610.

In a case where the contract is thus so uncertain a court of equity will not decree specific performance, but will leave the party to his remedy at law. Agard v. Valencia, supra; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 128, 60 P. 689; Watson v. Fisher (Cal. App.) 250 P. 577; Allman v. Rich, 76 Cal. App. 601, 245 P. 439; Wood v. Anderson, 199 Cal. 440, 249 P. 862.

[9] If it be conceded that the contract is sufficiently definite and certain to be specifically enforced, still the court found that appellant did not comply with its terms by depositing $4,800, the balance of the cash payment of $5,000 called for in the contract, and that there was nothing in the contract, or the evidence, that excused him from prompt performance. There is ample evidence in the record to sustain this finding and this fact alone affords a sufficient answer to appellant's demand for specific performance. Mr. Morison's duty to carry out the terms of the contract in good faith was at an end upon the failure of appellant to deposit the $4,800 within the time provided by the contract. Dunne v. Colomb, 192 Cal. 740, 221 P. 912; section 3392, Civ. Code.

Other points are presented by the briefs, but under the view we have taken of the case, we deem it unnecessary to discuss them in detail.

We have examined the record with care, and we are fully convinced that the trial court's conclusions are sustained by the evidence, and that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

SISTRUNK et al. v. TEXAS HOLDING CO.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 30, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)—On appeal, facts supporting verdict and sufficiently supported by evidence will be taken as established.

On appeal for action for personal injuries, facts which sustain verdict and are sufficiently supported by evidence will be taken as established, and conflicts will be disregarded.

2. Explosives 🔑8—Evidence held to sustain verdict against oil company for negligence causing explosion.

In action for personal injuries sustained when explosion and fire occurred on property of defendant oil company, evidence held sufficient to sustain verdict for defendant against oil company for negligence.

3. Explosives 🔑8—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held applicable to explosion on oil company's property.

Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held applicable in action against oil company for injuries sustained when explosion and fire occurred on company's property, where there was testimony that fire actually started on defendant's premises, notwithstanding contention, unsupported by evidence, that fire started on adjoining property, and explosion resulted from fire coming into contact with gasoline on plaintiff's truck.

4. Trial 🔑260(8)—Instruction, in personal injury action, on subject fully covered in court's charge, held properly refused.

In action for injuries sustained from explosion and fire on defendant oil company's property, instruction concerning defendant's duties and liabilities as to ordinary care and negligence held properly refused, where court's charge fully covered such subjects.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Clarence D. Sistrunk and Shaffer & Best, a copartnership consisting of L. N. Shaffer and H. G. Best as members thereof, against the Texas Holding Company, an unincorporated association. From a judgment for plaintiffs and the denial of a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Oliver O. Clark and Charles R. Nelson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newlin & Ashburn and R. L. Haight, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs, following verdict of a jury. Included in the appeal is the order of the court below denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

The action is to recover damages resulting from injuries sustained by plaintiff Sistrunk through the alleged negligence of defendant. The plaintiffs Shaffer and Best are the employers of plaintiff Sistrunk, and joined with him as such. No question is presented as to the rights of the employers in the event it is concluded that the employee is entitled to recover. Therefore, for the purposes hereof, the case will be treated as though the action had been commenced and prosecuted by the plaintiff Sistrunk alone.

[1] The facts necessary to the determination of the questions presented are in the main undisputed. However, in outlining the case as made, we do not mean that all of the facts stated are admitted. Our statement here necessarily takes as established the facts, sufficiently supported by evidence, which sustain the verdict, disregarding any conflict.

The plaintiff Sistrunk, on February 24, 1923, was employed as a truck driver, engaged at his employment near Huntington Beach in Los Angeles county. About 8 o'clock p. m. of that date, after having delivered a load of pipe, he had withdrawn from the place of delivery, and was with his trucks upon a public street or highway known as Crystal avenue in Huntington Beach. Suddenly without warning an explosion occurred, accompanied with flames of burning oil, enveloping the immediate vicinity. Before Sistrunk could remove himself, his clothing took fire, and he sustained the injuries here complained of.

At this point it becomes necessary to outline to some extent the general situation with reference to the territory named. The Huntington Beach oil field is located on property subdivided into town lots. The leases are small, and wells are numerous and close together. The property of defendant was and is surrounded by other leases, wells, and drilling outfits owned and operated by persons and companies other than the defendant. The area of each lease was approximately 300 feet by 145 feet, and some smaller. In the one city block here concerned there were operating five oil leases on one side of the street and three explorations on the other side.

The Texas Holding Company operated three of the leases, though here we are concerned with but one, and hereafter such reference as may be made to the property of that company will be exclusive of all but the one; namely, the one adjoining what is called hereinafter the Moore lease. The Moore lease is another town-lot oil well, and immediately adjoins the property of defendant on the north.

On the property of defendant Texas Holding Company, at a point some 30 feet south of the Moore lease, there had been erected, and were standing at the times here in point, two large oil tanks, and also an open sump. There was oil in both the sump and the tanks, and the oil in the tanks either had been, or was being, heated at the time. Further the evidence disclosed the premises of defendant to have been maintained in a careless manner, with rubbish, old lumber, waste, etc., scattered about. In addition, the ground around the tanks and sump was oil saturated, and here and there near the highway were formed small pools of oil lying on the surface.

Coming, then, to the night in question, it is in evidence that there was an open fire on the Moore lease some 50 feet from the sump and tanks, and that this fire was wholly without the control of defendant Texas Holding Company, and not on property owned by it. About 10:30 on that night the fire occurred, and the testimony of many witnesses is in accord to the effect that there was a sudden flare of light, and an almost instantaneous explosion, followed by fire in all directions. The explosion occurred upon defendant's premises; the fire started on defendant's premises; the oil was seen by several of the witnesses to have run directly from the tanks in question, which were being maintained upon defendant's land, across the road, and on to and under the truck in which plaintiff was sitting, and which truck was then on the public highway. The testimony further shows that oil was thrown by the explosion from the tanks of defendant into the adjoining street, setting fire to the clothing of plaintiff as aforesaid.

As indicated hereinbefore, a conflict exists as to just where the fire started, and as to just how long afterwards the explosion resulted. However, there is abundant testimony establishing the fact that the fire started right at or between the tanks, and that the fire and explosion were practically simultaneous.

On this state of facts appellant contends: (1) That the verdict and judgment stand unsupported by the evidence; (2) that the verdict is contrary to the evidence and the law; (3) that the court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury; (4) that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by defendant.

[2] 1. The testimony taken as a whole shows that the defendant's oil storage tanks were maintained in close proximity to the boundary line of defendant's premises, and immediately adjoining a public highway on which plaintiff's trucks were standing; that there was also maintained on defendant's property a large open sump next to the storage tanks, and directly opposite and within a short distance of an open fire on the Moore property; that the storage tanks and sump contained quantities of crude petroleum; and that the manholes of these storage tanks were uncovered. Also the evidence disclosed that crude petroleum, when exposed to the air, emits quantities of gas explosive in character. It was shown further that the night in question was foggy, with a wind velocity of about twelve miles per hour, and that a fog tends to hold gas close to the ground, and that such gas will travel with the wind. It is further disclosed by the record that the fire and explosion took place first upon the premises of defendant, and that the spread of this fire caused the injuries to plaintiff.

We deem these facts ample to sustain the verdict. We content ourselves with thus stating the conclusion reached without citation at this place, for the reason that all of the claims of appellant center around practically the same theory, and as we progress with the discussion, ample authority will support these first conclusions.

2. The appellant claims the verdict is contrary to the evidence and the law. The basis of this contention appears to be that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to have introduced evidence of what would have constituted the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, and then to have shown wherein defendant fell short of such standard. Plaintiff, in answer to this, urges the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. As this very same question is presented in the attack upon the instructions given on the subject, we may pass this branch of the case for the moment and take up the questioned instructions.

[3] 3. Error in giving instructions. The court instructed the jury as follows:

> "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be wholly under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care. The effect of the doctrine when applied to this case is that proof of the injuries to the plaintiff, provided such injuries are shown to have been caused through the explosion or ignition upon the defendant's property of crude petroleum located thereon, which property and which petroleum were under the exclusive management and control of the defendant, created a prima facie case or presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant, which it is called upon to meet or rebut. This presumption that the injury or damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant is itself a fact which the jury must consider in determining its verdict, and which, in the absence of any other evidence, and in the absence of contributory negligence, necessitates a verdict in favor of the plaintiff."

Two other instructions along the same lines are attacked by appellant, but the one quoted is deemed the one most objectionable by appellant, and it is unnecessary to here go into the others.

Appellant contends that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable to the present case, and urges many reasons for its contention. It is urged that, to apply this doctrine, it must first be shown that the thing causing the accident is under the exclusive control of the defendant. And it is further argued that, where the facts attending the injury are disclosed by the evidence, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply.

It is claimed that the real cause of the fire and explosion was the open fire under the boiler on the Moore lease, concededly not under the control of defendant, and not on the premises of defendant. The obvious answer to this is that the record does not disclose this to be the fact. Throughout the trial of the case it was generally assumed that this open fire might in some way have caused the oil in the tanks to ignite, and as another theory it was possible that the gas lying close to the ground was carried over to this open flame, and thus became ignited, and, spreading to the tanks, caused the explosion and general conflagration. This is but a theory in the case. The plaintiff's witnesses all seem to be in accord on the point that the fire started among the tanks, and the defendant's testimony was to the effect that the fire started out in the middle of the road near the truck of plaintiff, and that the explosion following was the result of the fire coming into contact with gasoline on plaintiff's truck. Nowhere in the record is there a single fact to indicate that the fire started on the Moore lease, or that the fire on the Moore lease had the slightest connection with it. A careful reading of the entire testimony leaves the origin of the fire in darkest doubt. Several theories present themselves, but all in the face of testimony that the fire actually started between the tanks on the defendant's premises.

There is abundant testimony to establish the fact that conditions existing on the property of defendant were in themselves dangerous, as evidenced by the cautionary signs and warnings posted about the workings. There was always a constant menace from escaping gas, and the process of refinement or clarifying was such that gas was freely and often in quantity emitted from the tanks, and that this gas was highly inflammable and susceptible to explosion. In addition to this, there was the express testimony of expert witnesses called by defendant to the effect that an accident of this sort could happen only as a result of the act of God or the negligence of some person. The accident is not attributed to an act of God, as the phrase is generally employed. We think it to be a case where the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has its true application. We content ourself here with a citation of authority, omitting quotation therefrom for a reason to be hereafter stated. Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 P. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146; Rathburn v. White, 157 Cal. 248, 107 P. 309; Willard v. Valley Gas & Fuel Co., 171 Cal. 9, 151 P. 286; Hallawell v. Union Oil Co., 36 Cal. App. 672, 173 P. 177.

[4] The last point urged by appellant is error of the trial court in refusing certain instructions offered by appellant. At the trial appellant was permitted to introduce the testimony of expert witnesses on the subject of the general practice, usage, and custom among oil operators in the maintenance of their leases and appliances, equipment, and instrumentalities used in the production of oil for the purpose of showing that the defendant's properties were maintained and operated in a careful and prudent manner. In line with such testimony defendant requested specific instructions to the effect that, if defendant adopted in its operation of the oil wells in question the same standard of equipment, tanks, pipes, etc., as was in common use in the Huntington Beach oil field, then such fact might be considered by the jury in determining whether or not defendant exercised ordinary care. Without detailing further the instructions requested and refused, the principle contended for is that, if it had been shown that there was a general custom, practice, and usage amongst others engaged in the same business in the same locality, then such custom, practice, and usage constituted in themselves a standard of ordinary care and prudence, and in themselves would negative any inference of negligence.

We think the trial court committed no error in refusing to give these instructions. The jury were elsewhere sufficiently instructed on the subject. The duty and liability of defendant were in great detail explained to the jury, and nothing could be added to the court's charge by the instructions refused. This in itself is an all-sufficient answer to appellant's contention. This practically disposes of the grounds urged here for a reversal of the judgment. There remains, however, one most important matter worthy of notice here.

This case was for the damages resulting to plaintiff while engaged in his employment as a truck driver. The owners of the trucks upon which plaintiff was employed at the time instituted a separate action to recover for the loss of the trucks. This action, to be accurate, was maintained by the insurance carriers, and was entitled Phœnix Assurance Co. v. Texas Holding Co. On practically the identical facts the plaintiff recovered, and appeal was taken. The District Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment, and the case is reported in 252 P. 1082. However, for the reason that throughout the opinion the district court assumed that the boiler and fire on the Moore lease were on the property of defendant and under its control, we have given the instant case independent consideration. In a petition for a hearing before the Supreme Court appellant pointed out this erroneous assumption of fact on the part of the district court, and went fully into the questions presented here; indeed, in many respects the briefs of appellant here are but copies of the authorities filed in the Supreme Court in the petition for a hearing before that court. The petition was denied; and so, therefore, to a great extent, irrespective of the fact taken against the record, the case now cited, viz., Phœnix Assurance Co. v. Texas Holding Co., 252 P. 1082, concludes our further inquiry here.

As indicated hereinbefore, we have dismissed with little quotation of authority those points discussed in the previous case.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WINTHROP. (Cr. 1414.)

1. Indictment and information 🔑161(3)—Trial amendment of information for forgery and uttering fictitious checks by substitution of name of person for that of corporation held not abuse of discretion (Pen. Code, § 1008).

In prosecution for passing fictitious checks and forgery, permitting information to be amended on day of trial on motion of district attorney under Pen. Code, § 1008, so that name of corporation which through inadvertence had been placed in instrument where name of person should have appeared was corrected, not affecting defendant's substantial rights, held not abuse of discretion, in view of section 1008.

2. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Mere technical errors in pleading or procedure are not to be employed to defeat justice (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, mere technical errors in either pleading or procedure which do not in any way affect substantial rights of parties are not to be employed to defeat justice.

3. Indictment and information 🔑149—Denying motion to file demurrer after jury had been impaneled and amendment to information filed not affecting defendant's substantial rights held proper (Pen. Code, §§ 990, 1003).

After amendment to information charging uttering of fictitious checks and forgery, not affecting defendant's substantial rights, after jury had been impaneled, motion made by defendant's attorney for permission to file demurrer, denial of motion held proper, under Pen. Code, §§ 990, 1003.

4. Forgery 🔑47—Evidence that fictitious check was uttered in certain county entitles state to go to jury on question that it was forged there.

In absence of other proof, evidence that fictitious check was uttered in certain county is strong proof that it was forged there and is sufficient at least to entitle state to go to jury on that question and to sustain a verdict that crime was there committed.

5. Criminal law 🔑1167(2)—Defendant convicted under information charging same offense under four counts, where judgment ran on four counts concurrently, held not prejudiced (Pen. Code, §§ 470, 476).

Where information contained four counts, but clearly showed that matters set forth thereunder were one and same offense and prosecution was had for forgery and for making fictitious check, under Pen. Code, §§ 470, 476, and district attorney in opening statement to jury informed that body that charge related to one particular check, and judgment on four counts ran concurrently, held that defendant suffered no prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

J. B. Winthrop (true name, C. E. Weston) was convicted of passing fictitious checks and forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Myron Harris, of Oakland, and Leon A. Sullivan, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted upon four counts contained in an information charging a felony. The first alleged a violation of section 476 of the Penal Code relating to the making, passing, or uttering of fictitious checks; the second, third, and fourth charges a violation of section 470 of the same Code relating to forgery. The charging parts of the information read, in substance, as follows: First count: That J. B. Winthrop violated section 476 of the Penal Code, in that he did, at the county of Alameda, state of California, knowingly and fraudulently, make, pass, utter, and publish a fictitious check, with intent to defraud the Central National Bank of Oakland, a corporation, the First National Bank of Minnesota, a corporation, and the B. F. Nelson Manufacturing Company, a corporation, and each of them. The check was set out in hæc verba, and reads as follows:

"No. 16652 S. 795.
"Minneapolis, Minn., July 27, 1926, 192—
"The B. F. Nelson Mfg. Co.
"Pay to the order of J. B. Winthrop $750.00 Dollars The B. F. Nelson Mfg. Co.
"By Robt. E. Little
"Vice President & Treasurer
"To First National Bank
"Minneapolis, Minn. 17-2"

The nonexistence of the individual Robert E. Little was then alleged and that defendant knew this fact, and also knew that at the time the check was passed that it was fictitious. Second count: That J. B. Winthrop violated section 470 of the Penal Code, in that he did, at the county of Alameda, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, and with intent to defraud Central National Bank of Oakland, a corporation, First National Bank, Minneapolis, Minn., a corporation, and the B. F. Nelson Manufacturing Company, a corporation, and each of them, sign the name of "Robt. E. Little" to the check in count 1 set forth (the check again follows in hæc verba), and that said name was known by defendant to be then and there the name of a fictitious person and that he had no authority to do so. Third count: That J. B. Winthrop violated section 470 of the Penal Code, in that he did, at the county of Alameda, state of California, with intent to defraud the Central National Bank, a corporation, First National Bank, Minnesota, a corporation, and the B. F. Nelson Manufacturing Company, a corporation, and each of them, willfully, feloniously, and falsely make, alter, and forge and counterfeit the check in count one of the information referred to (the check is again set forth). Fourth count: That J. B. Winthrop violated section 470 of the Penal Code, in that he did, at the said county of Alameda, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, utter, publish, and pass to said Central National Bank of Oakland, a corporation, as true and genuine the check in count 1 of the information referred to (check set out in detail), and that said check then and there was and known by said J. B. Winthrop to be false, altered, forged, and counterfeit, and was uttered, published, and passed with intent to prejudice, damage, and defraud the Central National Bank of Oakland and other corporations named and each of them.

As above indicated, all four counts were based upon the single particular check. Defendant pleaded not guilty to each count. He was tried by a jury and found guilty upon all four counts. A motion for a new trial was made and denied and defendant was sentenced to the state prison for the term prescribed by law. The offenses being one transaction, the judgment declared that the sentences run concurrently. Defendant appeals from the order and judgment. So much of the evidence as is necessary to a consideration of the points urged for a reversal show that defendant visited the Central National Bank and consulted the manager for space in the building. At the conclusion thereof he proceeded to the bank proper and was introduced by the manager to the assistant cashier. At this time he opened an account in the bank, depositing $100 in currency. He returned a few days later and presented to the cashier a check for $1,000 made out to the G. F. Nelson Manufacturing Company. Defendant represented to the bank that he was a representative of that company. The bank received the check on deposit. Defendant thereupon presented another check for $750 and asked that it be and it was cashed. This check was the one upon which the information is based. To prove intent the prosecution showed that about the same time defendant visited the Gilchrist Furniture Company and made the same representations to that company concerning his position with the Nelson Company. He selected a rug of the value of $56 and tendered a fictitious check for $150 and received the difference in change. He also under the same misrepresentations cashed a check of like character with the Maxwell Hardware Company for $187.50. During his operations he visited the Broadway-Grand Branch Bank of Italy and interviewed the assistant cashier. He also informed him that he was the representative of the Nelson Company and desired to bank with his institution and requested a statement of the bank's affairs so that he could forward it to his company. He returned a little later with two envelopes bearing air mail marks. From the first one he extracted a check for $1,500 payable to the Nelson Company and deposited it to the credit of that company. He then opened the other letter and drew therefrom a check made payable to himself for $750. He informed the cashier that he needed funds with which to purchase office furniture and the cashier advanced him $550 on the check, the balance being placed to his credit. An inspector of the Oakland police department testified that he had gone to Texas with extradition papers to bring defendant back to California, from which state he had fled, and that during their return trip defendant had discussed his acts with him and had admitted that he had first "operated" in Oakland after leaving Salt Lake City and should be returned to that place. Certain incriminating evidence concerning his activities were found in his possession. Defendant had admitted upon his preliminary examination that he had written the check and had passed it and received the money and that the name "Robert E. Little" was a fictitious person. Further recital of the evidence is unnecessary.

Appellant presents four objections. He claims the trial court erred in the decisions of questions of law; that the information does not charge a public offense. He also claims the verdict is contrary to the evidence and that there is a variance between the pleadings and the proof. On the day of the trial and just prior to the time of the impaneling of the jury the district attorney moved to amend the first count of the information. He claimed that the name "B. F. Nelson Mfg. Co." had, through inadvertence, been placed in the instrument at a point where the name "Robert E. Little" should have appeared. The motion was granted and the words "such bank, corporation, copartnership Nelson Mfg. Co., a corporation" were stricken out and the information made to read, "whereas in truth and in fact there was then and there no such individual as Robert E. Little in existence" at the time the check was made, etc. It is argued that the information as amended charged an entirely different offense as far as the defendant is concerned. There is no merit in the claim. It is perfectly apparent that the name of the corporation had through inadvertence been recited in the information where the name "Robert E. Little" should have appeared.

[1-3] As pointed out by counsel for respondent the check was set out in hæc verba in the information and the B. F. Nelson Company was referred to as the corporation which appellant intended to defraud. The denial of the existence of the corporation, later on, shows plainly that it was a mere clerical error. Section 1008 of the Penal Code, which permits an amendment to be made to an information after the defendant has pleaded, is in accordance with section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution and with the rule that mere technical errors in either pleading or procedure which do not in any way affect the substantial rights of the parties are not to be employed to defeat justice. People v. Clawson (Cal. App.) 255 P. 552. The amendment in question did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant, and the court, therefore, did not abuse its discretion in permitting it. Moreover, the record discloses the fact that the attorney had knowledge, prior to the case being called for trial, of the intention to amend the information and had agreed thereto. After the amendment and when the jury had been impaneled, defendant's attorney sought permission to file a demurrer. The motion was denied, the court using the following language:

> "Let the record show that after the impanelment of the jury the demurrer was filed, and the court called attention to the fact the time had expired within which to file a demurrer, and the court does not grant leave to file the demurrer, but takes the position that there is no right to file a demurrer at this time. Furthermore, let the record show, even if the demurrer was permitted to be filed, and was filed, the court would overrule it."

Section 1003 of the Penal Code provides that both the demurrer and plea must be put in, in open court, either at the time of the arraignment or at such other time as may be allowed to the defendant for that purpose. See, also, section 990, Pen. Code. A discussion of this question is unnecessary, as there is no merit therein. The court in effect overruled the demurrer and properly so. In this connection appellant urges his objection that the information as amended, charged an entirely separate and distinct offense from that originally charged, and he should have been permitted to file his demurrer. As above stated, it is plainly apparent that the error was one of inadvertence, the correction of which did not in any manner prejudice the rights of the defendant. People v. Carroll, 39 Cal. App. 654, 180 P. 49.

[4, 5] It is further urged that the record fails to show that appellant either made the check in Alameda county or the state of California, or that he wrote the fictitious name "Robert E. Little" thereon. As above recited there was evidence that defendant admitted that he had written the check, passed it, and received the money. In the absence of other proof evidence that a fictitious check was uttered in a certain county is strong proof that it was forged there, and is sufficient at least to entitle the state to go the jury on that question, and to sustain a verdict that the crime was there committed. 26 C. J. 975; State v. Forbes, 75 N. H. 306, 73 A. 929, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 302. Something is said in appellants' brief concerning the charging of the same offense under four different counts. The information clearly shows that the matters set forth thereunder was one and the same offense. A prosecution for forgery for making a fictitious check may be had under either sections 470 or 476 of the Penal Code. People v. Lucas, 67 Cal. App. 452, 227 P. 709. Moreover, the district attorney in his opening statement to the jury informed that body that it was a charge of one particular check. Then, again, the judgments on the four counts run concurrently. It is therefore clearly manifest that appellant suffered no prejudice because of any conflict between sections 470 and 476 of the Penal Code. There is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

DROVERS' NAT. BANK v. BROWNE.★
(Civ. 5791; L. A. 8632.)

1. Guaranty ⚷16(4)—Renewal of note without indorsement held sufficient consideration for continuing guaranty by former indorser covering indebtedness represented by note.

In action on instrument guaranteeing indebtedness of defendant's company to plaintiff bank, evidence that defendant indorsed note, thereby guaranteeing payment of own obligation as well as that of maker of note, and induced bank to renew note without his indorsement by giving continuing guaranty securing payment of indebtedness represented by note, without which note would not have been renewed, showed sufficient consideration for guaranty and authorized judgment for plaintiff.

2. Guaranty ⚷16(1)—Whether there was consideration for guaranty should be determined by court in light of circumstances under which guaranty was accepted.

In determining whether there was consideration for guaranty sued on, court should consider matter in light of circumstances under which guaranty was accepted.

3. Bills and notes ⚷430—Obligation evidenced by notes of company indorsed by president held not paid or extinguished by renewal notes.

Obligation of company to bank, evidenced by promissory notes on which president of company was indorser, was not paid or extinguished by renewal of notes, but same debt still existed.

4. Guaranty ⚷16(2)—Consideration supporting promise of guarantor generally is consideration passing between maker and payee of note guaranteed.

Though promise of guarantor must be supported by consideration generally consideration supporting promise is consideration passing between maker and payee of note guaranteed.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

5. Bills and notes ⚷94(1)—Surrender of valid note furnishes consideration for making of new note.

Surrender of valid note will furnish consideration for making of new note.

6. Guaranty ⚷16(4)—Guarantor of indebtedness represented by note renewed without guarantor's indorsement could not complain because guaranty was executed 5 days before maturity and renewal of note.

In action on instrument of guaranty of indebtedness represented by note on which guarantor was indorser, made in consideration of renewal of note without guarantor's indorsement, guarantor could not complain that guaranty was executed 5 days before maturity and renewal of note.

7. Guaranty ⚷16(4)—Express agreement not to sue on note renewed on defendant's giving guaranty securing payment of note held unnecessary to hold guarantor, in view of implied contract (Civ. Code, § 1621).

In action on guaranty of payment of indebtedness represented by note indorsed by guarantor, which guaranty was given to obtain renewal of note without guarantor's indorsement, it was unnecessary to hold guarantor liable that express language should be used establishing agreement by plaintiff to forbear bringing suit on note which was renewed, where parties understood that there should be renewal of note and there was implied contract not to sue, under Civ. Code, § 1621.

8. Trial ⚷404(2)—Allegation of no consideration for guaranty sued on held allegation of conclusion of law, and hence, like finding, is but conclusion of law.

General averment that contract sued on was executed without consideration is but an allegation of conclusion of law, and hence finding of no consideration for instrument of guaranty sued on may be disregarded.

9. Appeal and error ⚷854(2)—Prevailing party need not defend judge's logic; it being sufficient if decision is correct.

It is not incumbent on prevailing party to defend logic of judge; it being sufficient if decision is correct.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Carey, Judge.

Action by the Drovers' National Bank against F. O. Browne. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur F. H. Wright, of San Diego, for appellant.

Eugene Daney, of San Diego, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendant was the president and principal stockholder of the National Auto Sales Company, hereafter referred to as the company. On August 18, 1920, the company, a Colorado corporation, borrowed from the plaintiff bank the sum of $10,000 on a 90-day note and on September 10, 1920, borrowed from plaintiff an additional sum of $12,000 on a separate note, making a total loan of $22,000. As these notes matured they were extended on new notes until May 18, 1921, when a single note for $22,000 was given by the company and the old notes were surrendered. This note became due August 15, 1921, and on August 17, 1921, it was renewed by note dated August 15, 1921, and due November 14, 1921. Defendant was the indorser on all of these notes. The fifth finding of the trial court is as follows:

> "That on the 9th day of November, 1921, the defendant, F. O. Browne, called on the plaintiff at its banking house in the city of Denver, Colo., and stated that he was going to California, and for that reason it would be inconvenient for him to be in Denver when the said note or any renewal thereof matured, and was then and there informed by the plaintiff that the said note maturing on the 14th day of November, 1921, would not be renewed without his guaranty, whereupon the said defendant, F. O. Browne, stated to the said plaintiff that he would give the bank a continuing guaranty covering the entire indebtedness of the National Auto Sales Company until it was liquidated, and thereupon delivered to the said bank the guaranty set forth in finding No. 3 hereof. That on or about the 15th day of May, 1922, the said obligation of the National Auto Sales Company to the Drovers' National Bank, the plaintiff herein, was reduced to the sum of $20,000. That at all the times herein mentioned the defendant, F. O. Browne, was, and still is, the president of, and the largest individual stockholder in, the said National Auto Sales Company, and at all the times herein mentioned was the only financially responsible stockholder of said company. That there were only two other stockholders of the National Auto Sales Company; namely, D. R. Platt and W. W. Beeson, each of whom was also at various times an indorser on the several notes herein mentioned, but that each of them was at all of said times financially irresponsible."

The guaranty set out in the third finding is in the following language:

> "November 9, 1921.
> "The Drovers' National Bank, Forty-Seventh and Lafayette Streets, Denver, Colo.—Gentlemen: This is to certify that the undersigned will be personally responsible for the indebtedness of the National Auto Sales Company to the Drovers' National Bank to the extent of $22,000.
> "Yours truly, F. O. Browne."

The tenth finding is as follows:

> "That the defendant by virtue of delivering, as aforesaid, to the plaintiff the written guaranty set forth in finding 3 hereof, as well as by reason of the statements then and there made to the plaintiff by said defendant, induced the plaintiff to cancel and deliver, at maturity, to the National Auto Sales Company its note maturing on November 14, 1921, on which the said defendant was indorser, and by reason of such guaranty and the repeated statements made by the said defendant to the plaintiff herein, that he, defendant, was responsible for, and back of, the note of the National Auto Sales Company held by the plaintiff, induced the said plaintiff to accept the various renewals thereof, some of which were without the indorsement of the defendant, owing to the fact that the said defendant was out of the state of Colorado at the dates of the respective maturity of the notes upon which he was not an indorser."

All of the findings heretofore mentioned are amply sustained by the evidence. The note of the company maturing November 14, 1921, was renewed from time to time, sometimes with and at other times without the indorsement of defendant, depending upon the presence or absence of the defendant at the time of renewal. On May 15, 1922, the indebtedness was reduced to $20,000 and thereafter renewal notes were given by the company for this amount until November 23, 1923, when the last renewal note was delivered to plaintiff. This note was made payable 30 days from its date. Plaintiff seeks to recover the principal sum of this note, with interest thereon. Defendant was absent from Denver on November 23, 1923, and his name does not appear as an indorser on the note.

The eleventh finding is as follows:

> "That by reason of the foregoing facts the defendant is estopped from denying his liability to the plaintiff on the said guaranty set forth in finding 3 hereof, although the court also finds that there was no consideration for said guaranty set forth in finding 3."

[1-3] The trial court correctly concluded that plaintiff was entitled to judgment. It is apparent, however, that judgment was based upon the ground of estoppel since there was a finding of failure of consideration. We agree with the final conclusion reached by the lower court that defendant is liable, but are of the opinion that there was sufficient consideration for the guaranty of defendant, and that the judgment should be based on that ground. In determining whether there was a consideration for the guaranty the court should consider the matter in the light of the circumstances under which the guaranty was accepted. The obligation of the company to the bank, evidenced by the promissory notes on which defendant was an indorser, was not paid or extinguished by the renewal notes. The same debt still existed. In Savings & L. Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 530, 39 P. 922, 925, the court uses this language:

> "It is the general rule that one executory contract does not extinguish another. It is also the rule that there must be an express agreement or understanding to that effect before another note, bill, or check extinguishes and satisfies the indebtedness evidenced by an earlier one."

See, also, Dellapiazza v. Foley, 112 Cal. 386, 44 P. 729, where it is said:

> "Without the intention, and an express agreement of the parties, that the making and acceptance of the note should operate as payment or satisfaction of the original debt, to secure which it was given, it did not so operate, though it may have suspended the right of recovery until the maturity of the note."

Since defendant was an indorser on the $22,000 note, which matured November 14, 1921, he was guaranteeing the payment of his own obligation as well as that of the maker of the note when he gave the guaranty on November 9, 1921. As an indorser he could have been sued on the note which was then in the possession of the plaintiff. Defendant induced the bank to renew the note which fell due November 14, 1921, without his indorsement only because it had already secured his guaranty of the payment of the indebtedness represented by the note. Without the guaranty the note would not have been renewed.

[4, 5] While the promise of the guarantor must be supported by a consideration, in most cases the one which supports the promise is the one which passes between the maker and the payee of the note. Howland v. Aitch, 38 Cal. 133. That the surrender of a valid note will furnish the consideration for the making of a new one is well settled. In Mahana v. Van Alstyne, 179 Cal. 725, 178 P. 853, the defendant and her husband had, on November 5, 1914, executed to plaintiffs a note and trust deed covering the separate property of defendant, the note being given for the personal debt of the husband. Thereafter, on April 17, 1915, plaintiffs, at the request of defendant, canceled said note and trust deed, and defendant executed the note sued on. The lower court decided that this note was only collateral security for the previous debt of defendant's husband and was not supported by any consideration. In reversing the judgment the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Shaw, said:

> "The fact that the original note was given for the debt of Guy Van Alstyne and that at no time was there any new consideration running to him other than the several renewals and cancellations, does not aid the defendant. The giving up of the deed of trust and the old note, which were at that time valid obligations, was a sufficient consideration for the note of $2,500 sued on."

See, also, Shoenhair v. Jones, 33 Cal. App. 545, 165 P. 971.

In Brewster v. Baker, 97 Ind. 260, it is said:

> "The surrender of the old note, and the substitution of the new note therefor, certainly constituted a sufficient consideration for the new note, as between the payee and Hisey, the principal therein; and this being so, it must be held, we think, that the consideration of the new note was sufficient to sustain it as against the appellant, the surety of Hisey therein."

In Home Savings Bank v. Shallenberger, 82 Neb. 507, 118 N. W. 76, the court uses this language:

> "It is elementary that the extension of time to a principal debtor is a sufficient consideration to support a guaranty by a stranger for the payment of a new obligation; and the fact that the guarantor is not a stranger to the obligation renewed, but is himself liable for the payment thereof, does not alter the rule."

See, also, Buckner v. T. P. Clark's Executor, 69 Ky. (6 Bush) 168; White v. Western State Bank, 119 Ill. App. 354; Brandt v. Vanderveen, 213 Mich. 121, 182 N. W. 35.

[6] Defendant cannot complain that the guaranty was executed 5 days before the renewal of the note maturing November 14, 1921. In Citizens' Trust, etc., Bank v. Bryant, 53 Cal. App. 735, 200 P. 823, a loan was made and a mortgage by George A. Bryant was given to the bank bearing date October 16, 1915. The bank declined to make the loan on the security offered, but insisted as a condition that defendant, W. J. Bryant, guarantee the note in part. W. J. Bryant executed the guaranty on November 5, 1915, and thereafter the bank paid over the money agreed to be loaned. The court in affirming judgment for plaintiff, said:

> "One of the points made by appellant is that there was no sufficient consideration for the contract of guaranty and that the obligation thereof must fail because it was not entered into at the time of the loan transaction. This contention has not the semblance of any real facts upon which to found it, unless the mere difference in the date of the note and mortgage and that of the contract of guaranty affords such ground. Section 2792 of the Civil Code provides: 'Where a guaranty is entered into at the same time with the original obligation, or with the acceptance of the latter by the guarantee, and forms with that obligation a part of the consideration to him, no other consideration need exist.' All of the evidence, including the terms of the contract of guaranty itself, shows conclusively that there was but one transaction and that the note and mortgage of George A. Bryant was not accepted by the bank until the guaranty was furnished."

And in Howland v. Aitch, supra, this language is found:

> "It is a matter of no moment at what time, relative to each other, the contracts may have been made and delivered, and the consideration may have passed, if they together constituted one transaction."

See, also, Tomanovich v. Casey, 106 Wash. 644, 180 P. 919; 13 Cal. Jur. 101.

[7] It cannot be maintained that it was necessary to use express language to establish an agreement on the part of the bank to forbear bringing suit on the note maturing on November 14, 1921. When we consider the entire transaction in the light of all its surrounding circumstances it is apparent that no such language was necessary, since undoubtedly it was the understanding of the parties that there should be a renewal of the note maturing November 14, 1921. Clearly there was an implied contract to that effect. No other reasonable construction can be given to the conduct of the parties. Section 1621 of the Civil Code provides: "An implied contract is one, the existence and terms of which are manifested by conduct."

[8, 9] It has been held in most jurisdictions, among them California, that a general averment that the contract sued on was executed without consideration "is but an allegation of a conclusion of law." 31 Cyc. 53; 6 Cal. Jur. 137; Gushee v. Leavitt, 5 Cal. 160, 63 Am. Dec. 116; Rivera v. Cappa, 29 Cal. App. 496, 156 P. 1016, 1017. The finding of no consideration contained in the eleventh finding of the trial court may therefore be disregarded, since it is a finding of a conclusion of law. The court properly concluded that plaintiff was entitled to judgment and this conclusion is supported by the actual findings made. It is not "incumbent on the prevailing party to defend the logic of the judge. It is enough if the decision be correct." Chabot v. Tucker, 39 Cal. 434.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; YORK, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for hearing herein is denied.

In denying such petition we withhold our approval from that portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal as follows:

> "It has been held in most jurisdictions, among them California, that a general averment that the contract sued on was executed without consideration 'is but an allegation of a conclusion of law.'"

As to that question we express no opinion. We agree with the District Court of Appeal, however, that under the facts as shown and found in this case the eleventh finding of the trial court may be disregarded as being a conclusion of law. The court found the facts surrounding the execution of the written guaranty of November 9, 1921, by the appellant. Whether these facts were sufficient to show a consideration for said written guaranty was purely a question of law.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 25, 1928.

Innkeepers ⟹11(12)—There being no special contract of storage, action against innkeeper for lost trunk held barred under 90-day statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 341a).

Where departing guest, on payment of bill, requested hotel to store her trunk until she sent for it, there being no special contract of bailment by hotel, her action to recover trunk or value thereof, brought more than 90 days after her departure, was barred by limitation of Code Civ. Proc. § 341a.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Doris Pawn against Harry J. Wall and another, copartners doing business under the fictitious name of the Hotel Gotham. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Milton M. Cohen and James S. Roche, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clark & Law, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. By this action plaintiff seeks to recover her trunk or the value thereof, $3,159.50, in case it cannot be returned. The defendants were proprietors of the Hotel Gotham, where the plaintiff had remained for some time as a guest until August 26, 1923. On that day she departed and left her trunk in the care of the defendants, to be sent for later. Defendants failed to redeliver it upon demand subsequently made, and plaintiff commenced this action on February 19, 1924, more than 90 days after her departure from the hotel. The defendants pleaded several defenses based upon Code sections limiting and regulating hotel keepers' liability. The court found these defenses to be good, particularly the plea of the special statute of limitations of Code of Civil Procedure (section 341a) limiting such an action against a hotel keeper to 90 days after the departure of the owner of the trunk from the hotel.

Appellant's argument is an attack upon the sufficiency of each and all of defendants' defenses, but none of them, from the nature of the case, needs be considered if the 90-day statute of limitations is applicable. The court found in effect that the trunk was not left in charge of the defendants as warehousemen, nor as ordinary bailees, nor pursuant to special express agreement, promise or contract, but that it was left in defendants' charge in no other capacity than that of hotel keeper. The validity of the judgment appealed from depends upon the validity of this finding. The court's finding that defendants did not promise to redeliver upon demand must be taken to mean that they made no express promise, as undoubtedly the law will imply a promise, or at least will enjoin the duty of redelivery upon demand.

The part of plaintiff's testimony relied on by the appellant is as follows:

> That on August 26, 1923, she went to the hotel desk and paid her hotel bill, and thereupon told the man behind the counter, admittedly an employee of the hotel, that she wanted to have the trunk stored, that she was going away and did not have time to take it to the storage company, and "would they be so kind as to take charge of my trunk, and they told me they would and it would be perfectly safe"; witness continuing, that they said it would be all right and that they would take care of it and "when I was ready for it they would send it to me. They did not tell me there would be any charge for taking care of the trunk. I did not tell them how long it would be before I would send for the trunk."
> "Q. You were still in the hotel at the time you told them to put your trunk in storage? A. I was paying my bill, and after I paid my bill I told them to take care of my trunk.
> "Q. You never left the hotel after you paid your bill and then came back and told them to put the trunk in storage? A. No; but I would do naturally like I would with any other hotel, after I paid my bill, tell them what I wanted them to do with my trunk."

The evidence relied upon does not prove a special contract of bailment as contended by appellant. The evidence very well warrants the court's finding to the effect that the transaction represented the ordinary case of a guest departing and at the same time leaving a trunk to be called for later. It is appellant's contention that the evidence shows that at the time she left her trunk in the care of respondents she had ceased to be a guest, because she had just paid her bill, and for that reason the agreement of safekeeping was of a special nature, different from an ordinary case of a guest leaving a trunk in the care of the hotel keeper upon departing. We are unable to agree with this contention. The exact time that one ceases to be a guest of a hotel cannot be in all cases the very time of paying one's bill. Some pay in advance and some after a period of credit greater or less, and it is therefore apparent that such a criterion would lead to absurd conclusions. In the very nature of the case the exact time at which one ceases to be a guest must necessarily depend upon all the facts and circumstances. It has been held that, when a guest departs from a hotel leaving baggage behind, the hotel keeper's liability continues to be that of a hotel keeper for a reasonable time allowed the guest to remove his goods. Authority for this proposition is found in the same citations given by appellant as a part of her argument to the effect that defendants will not escape liability by her claim that their liability is not that of hotel keepers, but that under the facts of this case they would be liable as gratuitous bailees. Beale on Innkeepers and Hotels, §§ 231, 234, 235; Carol v. Monteleone, 139 La. 541, 71 So. 798, L. R. A. 1916F, 234; Oxford Hotel Co. v. Lind, 47 Colo. 57, 107 P. 222, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 495, 18 Ann. Cas. 983.

We need not determine whether or at what exact time, after the plaintiff departed, defendants' liability ceased to be that of hotel keepers—depositary for hire (Civ. Code, § 1859)—and commenced to be that of gratuitous bailees. That would only affect the burden of proof and excuse for failure to redeliver. The provisions of Code of Civil Procedure, § 341a, may not be designed to apply to a stranger depositing goods at a hotel, nor to one who, having once been a guest and departed, returns again, not as a guest, but as a stranger, and deposits goods for safekeeping. The relation of guest and hotel keeper existed at the time plaintiff departed. The leaving of her trunk was an incidental part of her departure.

The period of limitation prescribed by Code of Civil Procedure, § 341a, commenced to run when she departed and continued thereafter to completion. To hold otherwise would nullify the section. To hold that it applied only when the goods are left before the guest settled his bill would give it an absurd and uncertain application. There is nothing in the evidence to distinguish this case from the ordinary case of a guest leaving a trunk at the time of departure, to be later called for or sent for, and this is the very situation the section is designed to cover.

The judgment is affirmed.

ELLET v. LOS ALTOS COUNTRY CLUB PROPERTIES, Inc. (Civ. 6003.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 31, 1928.

1. Corporations 🔑406(1)—Authority of person to execute contract for corporation may be shown by acquiescence of directors in his conduct as agent, and corporation's defense of want of authority is looked on with disfavor.

Authority to execute contract for corporation may be shown by evidence that person does business for it and in its behalf, as agent, with knowledge and acquiescence of its directors, or at their direction, and defense of want of authority to execute contract on behalf of corporation is looked on with disfavor; corporation being held to its contracts in same manner as natural persons.

2. Corporations 🔑397—Corporation is responsible for manner in which it permits its agents to represent it.

Corporation is responsible for manner in which it permits its agents to hold it out to the world, as is the rule with individuals.

3. Corporations 🔑397—Court may, without disregarding theory of distinct corporate existence, look to substance of transaction, and hold corporation liable by implication for acts of its representatives to prevent fraud.

While it must appear in order to cast aside legal fiction of corporate existence that corporation is the conduit of another, and that to recognize it as distinct would perpetrate fraud, court will at the same time look through the form of a corporate transaction to the actual conditions involved, and hold corporation bound by acts of its representatives on implication arising from facts which in themselves might not establish positive and direct authorization.

4. Corporations 🔑519(3)—Evidence held to sustain broker's recovery on corporation's note given for commissions for negotiating transfer of option to persons subsequently forming corporation and taking option in corporation's name.

In action by broker against corporation on note given in settlement of broker's claims for commission based on negotiations for transfer of option to individuals later forming corporation, and then taking option in corporation's name, evidence held to sustain plaintiff's recovery, notwithstanding claim of want of consideration and claim that president and treasurer had no authority to execute corporate note.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1060(1)—Counsel's misconduct, unless grossly improper, does not warrant reversal.

Alleged misconduct of counsel on account of improper remark or discussion does not warrant reversal, unless something grossly offending appears.

6. Trial 🔑185—Trial court may state to jury that certain testimony has been given, provided statement is accurate and not misleading.

Trial court may state to the jury that certain testimony has been given in the case, provided it states the same with accuracy, and not in a manner calculated to mislead jury, though comments on evidence are always dangerous, and should be carefully approached.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1170(9)—Judgment is not disturbed for error in giving and refusal of instructions which could not have seriously affected outcome (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where errors in giving and refusal of instructions could not have materially prejudiced rights of appellant or seriously affected outcome of trial, judgment will not be disturbed, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

8. Trial 🔑349(2)—Refusal to submit special issues held within trial court's discretion, where general verdict was sufficient and special issues were misleading.

Refusal to submit special issues to jury held within discretion of trial judge, and discretion was not abused where general verdict sufficiently covered the issues, and where some of special issues proposed to be submitted were misleading.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Charles Ellet against the Los Altos Country Club Properties, Inc. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mervyn R. Dowd and Charles Reagh, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Rea & Caldwell, of San Jose, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover upon a promissory note. The case was tried by the court, sitting with a jury, and after a verdict in favor of plaintiff judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant's motion for a new trial was denied. From the judgment so entered this appeal is taken.

Issue was joined on the complaint of plaintiff and the answer and cross-complaint of defendant. It is conceded that the allegations of the cross-complaint are not material on this appeal, and therefore we omit further reference thereto and consider the case on the issues joined by the complaint and answer.

The note sued upon was signed, "The Los Altos Country Club Properties, Inc., L. G. Monroe, Pres., Lawrence F. Miller, Tres.," and bore the seal of the corporation and was made payable to plaintiff herein. Defendant corporation contended in the court below, and likewise contends here, that as far as it was concerned there was no consideration for the execution of the note, or at best a consideration which failed, and that, therefore, the verdict and judgment are against the evidence and contrary to law.

The controversy centers about the purchase of certain lands in Santa Clara county. Much evidence was received, and a detail thereof is here unnecessary. The record before us contains sufficient evidence to support what we will outline as the facts, disregarding entirely any conflict which may exist. Certain real estate brokers, who will be hereinafter referred to as "brokers" (which designation, if not technically accurate, will suffice for identification), had secured an option to purchase these lands. By the terms of the option the time was limited and prompt action was necessary. The plaintiff, Ellet, was a banker and real estate agent in Mayfield, and he entered into the transaction through an arrangement with the brokers whereby he was to secure some person with the necessary cash to carry through the option, and in return for his success he was to receive a share of the profits realized. Plaintiff, Ellet, placed the properties before one L. J. Monroe, and the latter, becoming interested, took the matter to one L. J. Miller, and the negotiations began. Ellet agreed to give Monroe half of whatever might be received through the Ellet agreement with the brokers. The negotiations finally reached a stage where Monroe and Miller entered into a syndicate agreement, Monroe putting $75,000 in cash into the enterprise, and the brokers were to negotiate a loan or otherwise secure the balance of the purchase price, namely, $225,000. As a part of this arrangement the brokers turned over to Monroe and one Smith (the latter furnishing $25,000 under the agreement to purchase) the option held by them.

It was further agreed between the parties that the brokers should have the exclusive selling agency in the property purchased, and also 50 per cent. of all profits realized; it being the purpose of the entire transaction to subdivide the property into lots and tracts. Following the execution of this instrument the brokers gave to Ellet, plaintiff herein, their written promise and agreement to pay to him a percentage approximating one-third of the profits realized by the brokers. It appears that nothing further was done under the so-called syndicate agreement, and it is doubtful if the same was ever fully executed by all of the parties thereto. In any event, the option held by the brokers was not transferred. The events surrounding the syndicate agreement do evidence the stage of negotiations reached. Subsequently Monroe and Miller, together with one Dailey, entered into another agreement with the brokers, by the terms whereof the brokers convey and assign all their right, title, and interest in the option to Miller, Monroe, and Dailey, who agree to form a corporation under the name of Los Altos Country Club Properties, Inc., for the purpose of purchasing and subdividing and selling the property under option. The former agreement with the brokers as to the profits from the enterprise and the giving to them the exclusive selling agency was reaffirmed, and the brokers, as a consideration therefor, were still charged with the obligation of raising the necessary funds to complete the purchase. The corporation, being the defendant herein, was formed with Monroe as president, Miller as treasurer, and Dailey secretary, in which offices each continued up to the time of this action. Monroe and Miller owned 52 per cent. of the stock of the corporation.

It appearing that the brokers were unable to complete their undertaking to finance the purchase of the property, a final agreement was made, whereby the brokers assigned to a firm composed of Monroe and Miller all of their rights in the premises, including the exclusive selling agency and rights to profits, for the sum of $11,250, thus completely eliminating the brokers from the transaction. At the time of this agreement, in which the corporation, through its officers and attorneys, participated, a general discussion arose concerning the rights of the plaintiff herein, Ellet. All seemed to agree that Ellet had some claim that he might assert, though the corporation, then the holder of the option, did not consider anything due him. However, upon the insistence of the brokers and as a part of the transaction the corporation did make and execute and deliver to the brokers a written undertaking as follows:

> "The Los Altos Country Club Properties, Inc., hereby agree to hold you safe and harmless from any and all claims Messrs. A. B. Smith and Charles Ellet may have against you for any contemplated percentages due them as a result of your favorably negotiating a loan of $125,000 or any part thereof."

The brokers accepted this as an indemnity against any and all claims of Ellet, and such was the intention of the agreement. The plaintiff, Ellet, was not a party to any of these negotiations or the agreements resulting therefrom. Thereafter Ellet, learning that the option had been transferred and the brokers compensated, demanded of Monroe that he (Ellet) be compensated. Ellet, Monroe, and Miller then undertook to determine the amount due Ellet. Ellet claimed a sum equal to one-third the amount paid the brokers, which one-third amounted to $3,750. Much discussion was had, and Ellet threatened to withdraw from the controversy and begin suit against the corporation. Thereupon Monroe and Miller, to avoid litigation and by way of compromise, agreed to pay Ellet the sum of $1,875, and as an evidence of the indebtedness Monroe as president and Miller as treasurer of the corporation executed and delivered to Ellet the note sued upon here, no part of which has been paid.

The foregoing details the main facts of the controversy. There are some additional facts and circumstances, minor in themselves, indicating the general idea that the purpose of the formation of the corporation and its conduct was solely for the purpose of handling the option and the lands involved. From this recital the prominent indisputable facts standing out in bold relief indicate clearly the following: That the corporation was created solely pursuant to an agreement with the brokers and as a part of the consideration involving the transfer of their interests; that plaintiff was in privity with the brokers and with the corporation's organizers and a party in interest; that the interest of plaintiff was recognized by all concerned, and all undertook and agreed to compensate him; that when the corporation took over the lands pursuant to the option the plaintiff, Ellet, had a claim against the corporation, even conceding that the corporation might have maintained a valid defense thereto; that by way of adjustment of that claim the corporation, through its president and treasurer, officers authorized to act for the corporation, executed and delivered the note in question under the corporate seal. And beyond this there are facts from which a fair inference might have been drawn by the jury that the directors and attorney for the corporation knew of and authorized the transaction.

[1, 2] On this state of the record appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict or to uphold the judgment, in that the corporation received no consideration, and that Monroe and Miller had no authority to execute a corporate note. It is the policy of the law and the endeavor of courts to hold corporations as well as natural persons to their contracts. Such defense introduced against a contract which has been executed in whole or in part by the corporation is looked upon with disfavor. Authority of the corporation may be shown by evidence that the person does business for the corporation and on its behalf as agent with the knowledge and acquiescence of its directors or by their direction. Davis v. Pacific Studio Corporation (Cal. App.) 258 P. 440; Blood v. La Serena Land, etc., Co., 134 Cal. 361, 66 P. 317; Commercial S. Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 P. 964. Like individuals, a corporation is responsible for the manner in which it permits its agents to hold it out to the world. San Francisco Gas Co. v. San Francisco, 9 Cal. 462. In 1 Parsons on Contracts, p. 118, we find:

> "In general if a person not duly authorized makes a contract in behalf of a corporation, and the corporation take and hold the benefit derived from such contract, it is estopped from denying the authority of the agent."

And that this is the recognized law of today is affirmed in Capitol Woolen Co. v. Berger (Cal. App.) 262 P. 351, decided December 12, 1927.

As is said in Sargent v. Palace Café Co., 175 Cal. 737, 167 P. 146:

> "In the matter of consideration as well as that of corporate power the court will equitably look through the mere form to the reality of the transaction."

[3] The law of this jurisdiction is announced in the case of Llewellyn Iron Works v. Abbott Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 211, 155 P. 986, as follows:

> "And upon a proper showing that the Abbott Kinney Company, a corporation, was but the instrumentality through which Abbott Kinney for convenience transacted his business, by all of the authorities not only equity, looking through the form to substance, but the law itself, would hold such a corporation bound as the owner of the corporation might be bound, or, conversely, hold the owner bound by the acts which bound his corporation."

The rule in its strictness is necessarily limited. Courts may not disregard the corporate entity in all cases, and destroy the usefulness or identity of private corporations as such. The rule is as announced in the following cases: Erkenbrecher v. Grant, 187 Cal. 7, 200 P. 641; Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 P. 673; Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 380, 224 P. 455; Wenban Estate v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 696, 227 P. 723.

Generally, and without provision for exceptional cases, the rule is that in order to cast aside the legal fiction of distinct corporate existence it must appear that they are the business conduit and alter ego of one another, and that to recognize their separate entities would aid the consummation of a wrong. We would not attempt to enlarge upon this rule or to go beyond its limitations. Nevertheless, the spirit of the rule is to permit the fullest inquiry in each individual case, and when it is disclosed that injustice would result or fraud be perpetrated courts are not powerless to sift through mere form and determine the actual conditions. And, consistent with the rule and the spirit thereof, the corporate entity may be recognized and respected and yet be bound by acts of its representatives upon an implication resulting from facts and circumstances which in themselves might not go to the extent of establishing a positive and direct authorization.

[4] In the case at bar there was but an equivocal showing of lack of authority or nonreceipt of benefits. The testimony offered in defense was evasive and uncertain, and the defense urged technical in character. We thus characterize the testimony, not entirely by way of condemnation, but accepting defendant's own estimate of it. We conclude the evidence amply sufficient to support the verdict and judgment.

[5] Appellant next urges misconduct of counsel for plaintiff. We have carefully examined the record in this respect. While it is true that there was at the trial some discussion and reference that might well have been omitted, yet the proceedings below were conducted without prejudice to the rights of either party in this respect. Necessarily in every trial, from time to time, side remarks and allusions creep in, and it would be impossible to prevent this. Unless, upon a review of the particular case, something grossly offending appears, it is idle to bring up this ground of complaint.

[6, 7] The third ground of appeal concerns certain instructions given by the court. We deem it needless to set out in detail all of the instructions complained of. The result would be simply the building up of a theory merely for the purpose of destruction. There is nothing in the contention that involves any new or interesting problem of law such as would establish any doctrine needful to the practice or instruction of the profession or of assistance to trial courts. On the whole the jury were fairly and fully instructed; and while we might and do concede that the language employed in certain instructions was perhaps ill chosen, and perhaps to some extent inapplicable, yet no injury could have resulted therefrom.

We may state, however, that it is always a dangerous practice for trial judges to comment even indirectly upon the evidence, or to even inferentially stress the testimony of any witness or witnesses. It is not error for the trial court to state to the jury that certain testimony has been given in the case, provided it states the same with accuracy and not in a manner to mislead the jury. Bruce v. Western Pipe & Steel Co., 177 Cal. 25, 169 P. 660. It is, however, a delicate task and one that should be carefully approached.

Though it may appear on close analysis that the action of the trial court in the matter of giving and refusing instructions is subject to some of the criticism offered by the appellant, yet a study of the record makes it manifest that any errors appearing could not have materially prejudiced the rights of appellant or seriously affected the outcome of the trial. In other words, we conclude that substantial and even justice resulted irrespective of the errors, and that a trial free from such errors would have the same result. Therefore we are content to leave the judgment undisturbed. Constitution, § 4½, art. 6.

[8] Lastly, appellant complains of the action of the trial court in refusing to submit proposed special issues to the jury. In the brief of appellant it is not disclosed just what issues were offered. We have, however, examined the record in this connection, and can find nothing in the court's action requiring the intervention of this court. The general verdict sufficiently covered the issues and answered the pleadings. Some of the special issues offered were clearly issues of law and were misleading. A separate finding on each of the issues offered would have added nothing, and the special issues presented were confusing, and so phrased that nothing but doubt and uncertainty could have resulted from their submission to the jury. In any event, it was a matter clearly within the discretion of the trial judge, and nothing appears to indicate that the discretion in this instance was abused.

Judgment affirmed.

CLOVERDALE UNION HIGH SCHOOL DIST. OF SONOMA COUNTY v. PETERS. (Civ. 3107.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 30, 1928.

1. Action 🔑6—Whether complaint for declaratory relief stated cause of action held immaterial, where counterclaim tendered same issues (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

Whether complaint for declaratory relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, stated cause of action held immaterial, where defendant interposed counterclaim tendering same issues, and judgment thereon was complete adjudication of rights of parties, since defendant, by tendering counterclaim, became a plaintiff in effect, invoked jurisdiction of court, and submitted to it, under section 581, subd. 1.

2. Courts 🔑37(3)—Defendant by counterclaiming becomes a plaintiff, invokes jurisdiction of court, and submits to it (Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1).

Defendant by setting up counterclaim becomes a plaintiff in turn, invokes jurisdiction of court in same action, and thereby submits to it, under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑135(1)—School board cannot employ teacher without meeting and formal action (Pol. Code, § 1607, subd. 1).

Members of school board cannot make valid contract employing teacher without meeting and formal action, under Pol. Code, § 1607, subd. 1.

4. Schools and school districts 🔑135(4)—Where teacher's contract is agreed on at regular meeting of school board, contract may be executed subsequently and officers of board may sign at different times (Pol. Code, § 1607, subd. 1).

Where terms of contract employing teacher are properly agreed upon at regularly convened meeting of school board, contract need not be executed at such meeting, but may be signed and executed subsequently and officers of board may sign at different times, under Pol. Code, § 1607, subd. 1.

5. Schools and school districts 🔑57—That combined vote of high school board and elementary school board was six to four in favor of joint meeting permitted no inference that majority of high school board favored joint meeting.

Fact that combined vote of members of high school board and members of elementary school board was six to four in favor of joint meeting of boards permitted no inference that majority of members of high school board voted in favor of such joint meeting.

6. Schools and school districts 🔑57—High school board cannot delegate to elementary school board power to determine question of joint meeting.

High school board cannot delegate to elementary school board power to determine whether two boards shall have a joint meeting.

7. Evidence 🔑209—Stipulation that three members of high school board would testify that they voted against employment of principal at joint meeting with another school board might be accepted as proof.

Stipulation of parties that three members of high school board would testify that they voted against employment of principal at joint meeting of high school board with elementary school board might be accepted by trial court as proof that they so voted.

8. Schools and school districts 🔑135(1)—High school board cannot delegate to elementary school board power to employ high school principal (Pol. Code, § 1743).

High school board cannot delegate to elementary school board power to employ or participate in employment of principal for high school, though it is intended that he serve also as elementary school principal, under Pol. Code, § 1743, but each board must determine for itself whether or not it will employ same person as principal of both schools and who such person shall be.

9. Schools and school districts 🔑135(1)—Contract employing high school principal, signed by majority of high school board after joint meeting with another board dispersed, held invalid, where not authorized at session of high school board (Pol. Code, § 1743, and § 1609, subd. 5 [a]).

Contract employing principal for both high school and elementary school, signed by majority of high school board and of elementary school board after joint meeting dispersed, held invalid as to high school board, where such board neither authorized nor signed contract at session of such board, under Pol. Code, § 1743, and section 1609, subd. 5 (a).

10. Schools and school districts 🔑133—Statute authorizes employment of same person as high school principal and elementary school principal (Pol. Code, §§ 1589c, 1743).

Pol. Code, § 1743, authorizes employment of same person as high school principal and as elementary school principal, rather than section 1589c, which relates to elementary schools, not to high schools, in view of section 1741.

11. Schools and school districts 🔑147—High school principal may not act as elementary school principal without consent of majority of high school board, given in statutory manner (Pol. Code, §§ 1741, 1743).

Principal of high school may not also act as principal of elementary school without consent of majority of high school board, given in manner provided by law, under Pol. Code, §§ 1741, 1743.

12. Schools and school districts 🔑9, 21, 133—Management of public schools is state affair, school districts are state agencies, and act of high school board in employing principal is governmental.

Management of public schools is a state affair, and school districts at most are but state agencies for that purpose, and act of high school board in employing high school principal is not proprietary act, but governmental.

13. Schools and school districts 🔑135(5)—High school district held not estopped to deny validity of contract purporting to employ principal, where it gave timely notice and no services were performed (Pol. Code, § 1743).

High school district held not estopped to deny validity of contract purporting to employ principal for both high school and elementary school, under Pol. Code, § 1743, where it gave timely notice before opening of school that his services would not be required, and no services were performed for high school district under contract.

14. Schools and school districts 🔑135(3)—Teacher might rescind contract wtih high school district and elementary school district purporting to employ him as principal of both high school and elementary school, where contract was invalid as to high school (Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 4; Pol. Code, § 1743).

School teacher had right to rescind contract with high school district and elementary school district purporting to employ him as principal of both high school and elementary school, under Pol. Code, § 1743, where contract was invalid as to high school district, since there was a partial failure of consideration within Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 4.

15. Appeal and error 🔑1073(1)—Defendant might not complain of portion of judgment enjoining him from claiming employment by plaintiff during year which had passed.

Defendant might not complain of portion of judgment enjoining him from claiming or asserting any employment by high school district during particular school year which was entered after end of such school year, where such injunction could have no possible effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action for declaratory relief brought by the Cloverdale Union High School District of Sonoma County against W. J. Peters, who counterclaimed. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan and A. W. Hollingsworth, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

F. W. McConnell, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1924, the "defendant has repeatedly and falsely claimed and asserted to the said plaintiff and to the members of its board of school trustees, and to the students in attendance at said school, and has made public declaration that he was at all times since July 1, 1924, and is now the regularly employed principal of the said school for the said present school year * * * at a salary of $200 per month; * * * that the said claims and assertions so made * * * have caused and are now causing, and will continue to cause, unrest, disturbance, and confusion in said school and among the students thereof and the citizens of said school district, * * * and does and will continue to interfere with the best interests and welfare of said school and the students in attendance thereat, * * * and since the beginning of the present school year there has existed and now exists an actual controversy between the said plaintiff and its said board of school trustees, with the said defendant, relating to the legal rights and duties of the said respective parties, and particularly relating to the alleged rights and claims of the said defendant herein." The prayer is, in substance, for a judgment declaring the rights of the parties in the premises, "including a determination of any and all questions of construction or validity arising under said defendant's alleged employment and the pretended contract so claimed and asserted by him."

The defendant, as a defense and by way of counterclaim, alleged that he was regularly employed by the plaintiff on May 5, 1924, as principal of the high school for the fiscal year mentioned at a salary of $2,400 a year; that at the opening of school in that year he made demand "that he be allowed to perform his duties as principal of said high school, and that he was present and ready, able, and willing and at all times herein mentioned, and that he is now ready, able, and willing, to assume and discharge the duties of principal of said high school, and that notwithstanding said high school board refused and ever since and still refuses to permit defendant to discharge and perform his duties under said employment." The defendant also alleged that "for more than two years next preceding said 5th day of May, 1924, he has served successfully * * * as joint principal of the Cloverdale Union school and of the Cloverdale Union high school"; and that "there is now due, owing and unpaid from plaintiff to defendant the total sum of $2,400," for which sum the answer prays judgment against the plaintiff.

The complaint was filed December 5, 1924, and the answer June 3, 1925. The trial was had on June 17, 1925, and "the cause as submitted to the court for its decision upon certain stipulated facts and evidence." Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and defendant has appealed. Counsel for the plaintiff stated substantially the following facts at the trial:

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, the defendant was the principal of the plaintiff high school and of the Cloverdale Union elementary school. Each school is governed by a board of five members. May 5, 1924, the members of the two boards met at the same place and separately elected their respective officers for the ensuing year. Thereupon:

> The "following proceedings were had: * * * Grant (a member of the elementary school board) made a motion that we act as a joint board, and Mr. Hall (a member of both boards) seconded it. Then they appointed Burrough (president of the high school board) to act as chairman of the meeting. After a brief discussion, the motion (that they act as a joint board) was put and carried by secret ballot, six voting for and four against. Then motion by Grant, seconded by Hall, that Peters be employed as principal of both high and grammar schools for the ensuing year at the former salary. Then motion was submitted and secret ballot taken, resulting in vote of six for and four against. There was no regular motion or order for adjournment, but after the foregoing the meeting simply dispersed. Thereupon Mr. Grant produced the form of notice of employment for the employment of Peters as principal, and this was then signed as shown by the file in the county superintendent of school's office."

The notice to which counsel referred is in the usual form of notices of employment of teachers which, by the provisions of section 1609, subdivision 5 (a), of the Political Code, trustees are required to give the county superintendent of schools. It was signed by the president and the clerk of the high school board and by one other member thereof and by the president and the clerk and a third member of the elementary school board. In addition to those mentioned, it was signed by Hall as a member of the elementary school board, but not as a member of the high school board. Thereafter the defendant signed the usual form of acceptance appearing upon the instrument. It may be conceded that the instrument so executed was sufficient in form to constitute a valid contract of employment. The important question is whether its execution was authorized. June 3, 1924, the high school board adopted a resolution to the effect that the services of defendant would not be required for the ensuing school year and served notice upon him to that effect.

After counsel for the plaintiff had stated the foregoing facts, together with others which are not deemed material or are otherwise shown, counsel for defendant said: "We will stipulate that this is a correct history." It was further stipulated, subject to all legal objections made by counsel for defendant: "That * * * Peters was not present at the meeting of May 5, 1924, at the time of the signing of the 'notice of employment'; that the minutes of the meeting of the board of trustees of the Cloverdale Union high school district, * * * held on May 5, 1924, contain no reference whatever to the employment of W. J. Peters as principal, * * * nor do said minutes refer in any manner to any employment of Mr. Peters, or to any contract between said board and said defendant Peters"; that three members of the high school board "would each testify that he did not at said meeting on May 5, 1924, vote in favor of employing W. J. Peters as principal; * * * that each of them would testify that no vote was taken of the board of trustees of Cloverdale Union high school district relative to the employment of W. J. Peters, as principal, other than the secret ballot taken in the so-called joint meeting of the two boards; * * * that each of them would testify that he never consented or agreed to the employment of said Peters as such principal, * * * unless the signing of said notice of employment was consent"; and that the defendant would testify that on May 6, 1924, the president of the high school board said to him, "We have signed the contract or paper and have placed it in your desk"; and that three copies thereof were there found on said day.

[1, 2] The action was brought under the provisions of section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for declaratory relief. In appellant's opening brief it is said:

> "Appellant contends that under the plain provisions of the statute, before a party may seek declaratory relief, he must allege and show relationship between himself and the defendant under a contract, will, or other written instrument, or in respect to property, and that this fact is not shown by the complaint, and in fact is expressly negatived."

It does not appear necessary to decide the question thus presented. The defendant's counterclaim tenders the same issues as the plaintiff's complaint. The plaintiff did not demur or in any manner object to the counterclaim, and the defendant was entitled to a trial of such issues, even if the plaintiff had desired or attempted to dismiss the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1.

[3, 4] In Merchants' Heat & L. Co. v. James B. Clow & Sons, 204 U. S. 286, 27 S. Ct. 285, 51 L. Ed. 488, it is said:

> "By setting up its counterclaim the defendant became a plaintiff in its turn, invoked the jurisdiction of the court in the same action and by invoking submitted to it. * * * The defendant if he elects to sue upon his claim in the action against him, assumes the position of an actor and must take the consequences. * * * After the cross claim is set up the plaintiff is not permitted to dismiss his suit without the consent of the defendant or leave of court granted for cause shown."

The judgment against the defendant on his counterclaim is a complete adjudication of the rights of the parties, and therefore it is immaterial whether the plaintiff had a cause of action under section 1060.

> "Where power to employ a teacher is in a school board, a valid contract with a teacher cannot be made by members of the board without a meeting and formal action." 24 R. C. L. 615; Pol. Code, § 1607, subd. 1; McGinn v. Willey, 6 Cal. App. 111, 91 P. 423; Ryan v. Humphries, 50 Okl. 343, 150 P. 1106, L. R. A. 1915F, 1047, and note. "Where the terms of a contract with a teacher are properly agreed upon at a regularly convened meeting of the school board, it is unnecessary that the contract be executed at such meeting, but it may be subsequently signed and executed by the parties thereto, and it is immaterial that the officers of the board sign at different times." 35 Cyc. 1084.

[5-11] The court was justified in finding from the stipulated facts that the alleged contract is invalid. The high school board did not authorize the alleged joint meeting of the two boards. The members of both boards being together, a secret vote was taken upon the question of organizing as a joint board. Four voted against such organization. In the absence of evidence as to how the members voted, it cannot be inferred from the result of the vote that a majority of the members of the high school board voted in favor of such organization as a joint board, and clearly the high school board could not delegate the power of determining that question to the members of the elementary school board. Webster v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 331, 73 P. 1070. Upon the question of employing defendant as teacher, the secret ballot against stood six to four, and it was stipulated that three members of the high school board would testify that they voted against such employment. The court was justified in accepting such stipulation as proof that such members so voted. As upon the question of organization as a joint board, the high school board could not delegate to the elementary school board the power to employ or to participate in the employment of a principal of the high school, but the law contemplates that each board must determine for itself, in the manner provided for the determination of other questions, whether or not it will agree to the employment of the same person as principal of both schools and who such person shall be. The alleged contract was signed by a majority of the members of each board. Had this been done while such boards were in session it might be argued logically that it was a sufficient compliance with the law, but the contract was "produced" and signed after "the meeting * * * dispersed." It is immaterial whether the time intervening between the dispersion of the meeting and the signing of the contract was short or long. The contract was neither authorized nor signed at a session of the high school board and therefore it was not valid or binding on the plaintiff. The case has been argued upon the theory that the authority of a high school board and an elementary school board to unite in the employment of a principal is given by section 1589c of the Political Code, which reads as follows:

> "Whenever in their judgment it may be deemed advisable, the board of trustees for any union or joint union school district may unite with the trustees of any other school district, single, union or joint, in the employment of a supervising principal, who shall devote such time to the supervision of instruction in the several school districts and shall receive such compensation from each board of trustees as may be agreed upon by them."

It will be observed that the provisions of the section quoted relate to elementary, not to high, schools. Section 1741, in article 14, relating to high schools, provides:

> "Except as in this article, or in article XV of this chapter, otherwise provided, the powers and duties of high school boards shall be such as are now or may hereafter be assigned by law to boards of education or boards of school trustees in school districts."

Section 1743 in the same article 14 provides:

> "The principal of any high school may act as principal of any elementary school situated in said high school district; or as supervising principal of two or more elementary schools situated within said high school district, without regard to the number of teachers employed in each of said elementary schools, if so desired by the trustees of said elementary school district or districts and the high school board of trustees."

Authority to employ the same person as principal of a high school and an elementary school is given by this section rather than by section 1589c, and it is clear, from the provisions of section 1743, that a principal of a high school may not act as principal of an elementary school without the consent of a majority of the high school board, given in the manner provided by law.

[12] Appellant contends that the respondent is estopped to assert the invalidity of the alleged contract. This contention is based on the assertion that "the act of employing a principal is a proprietary or private act and not a governmental act." Attention has not been called to any private act in which a school district may engage. "The management of the public schools is a state affair, and school districts at most are but a state agency for that purpose." Board of Education v. Davidson, 190 Cal. 162, 168, 210 P. 961, 963.

[13] Appellant relies on the case of McCormick Lumber Co. v. Highland School District, 26 Cal. App. 641, 147 P. 1183, where it is said:

> "The question presented is as to whether, admitting the informalities of notice in the calling of the meeting and advertising for bids for the construction of the building, the school district, having received and appropriated the benefit of the labor and materials supplied by the contractor, is estopped from maintaining a defense based upon the irregularities noted. We think, under the circumstances of this case, the contractor, or his assignee, was entitled to recover."

[14] It has been held that where a teacher renders services under an informal contract, "the district will not be permitted to avail itself of the fruits of his labor and then refuse to pay for it." 24 R. C. L. 615; Scott v. Williamstown School District No. 9, 67 Vt. 150, 31 A. 145, 27 L. R. A. 588. The facts herein are wholly unlike those in McCormick Lumber Co. v. Highland School District, supra, or in the Scott Case. The defendant was given timely notice, long before the opening of the school, that his services would not be required during the ensuing year. He performed no services whatever for the plaintiff under the alleged contract. One of the considerations for the defendant's agreement to act as principal of the elementary school was that he was also to be employed by the plaintiff as principal of the high school, a fact which the elementary school board knew. The purported agreement of the high school to employ him being invalid, there was such a partial failure of consideration as entitled him to rescind his agreement to act as principal of the elementary school. Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 4. It is simply a case of an invalid contract with a public agency of the state, under which no services were performed. None of the cases cited by appellant hold that a public agency is estopped under such circumstances.

[15] Appellant complains of the part of the judgment which enjoins him from "claiming or asserting any employment by plaintiff * * * during said school year beginning July 1, 1924." Judgment was entered December 30, 1925. This was long after the end of the fiscal year for which the defendant claims that he was employed. The other parts of the judgment completely dispose of the case against him. The part to which objection is made, therefore, is of no possible effect and adds nothing to the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUTHERLAND v. CALIFORNIA HIGHWAY INDEMNITY EXCHANGE. (Civ. 4876.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 29, 1928.

1. Insurance ⚷622(3)—Cause of action on automobile indemnity policy did not accrue until appeal was decided against person indemnified, although he had paid judgment before decision (Code Civ. Proc. § 1049).

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1049, cause of action on automobile indemnity insurance policy held not to have accrued until appeal of action against person indemnified had been decided, although he had paid judgment before the decision of the appeal, especially where payment was forced because of failure of attorneys for indemnity company, who were defending suit, to file a stay bond to prevent execution pending appeal.

2. Insurance ⚷665(4)—Evidence held to support finding that plaintiff was insured under automobile indemnity policy describing insured as Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages (Civ. Code, § 2591).

In action on indemnity insurance policy, evidence held to support trial court's finding that plaintiff was insured, within Civ. Code, § 2591, providing that, when the description of the insured is so general that it may comprehend any person, plaintiff must prove policy was intended to include him, under policy describing the insured as Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Fred A. Sutherland, doing business under the name and style of Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages, against the California Highway Indemnity Exchange, an unincorporated interinsurance association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, and E. L. Seavey, of San Diego, for appellant.

Haines & Haines and Sample & Harden, all of San Diego, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal taken from a judgment for the respondent, Fred A. Sutherland, against the California Highway Indemnity Exchange, an unincorporated interinsurance exchange, upon a liability insurance policy issued under date December 11, 1919, by the appellant to "Sutherland Tia Juana Stages."

The action was brought to obtain reimbursement for the amount of a judgment with interest, recovered by Annie Powers et al. against said Fred A. Sutherland and Mariana Gear impleaded as doing business under said name of Sutherland Tia Juana Stages, in operating an automobile stage line for the carriage of passengers between San Diego, Cal., and Tia Juana, Mexico; it being alleged in that action (referred to herein as the Powers Case) that, in the operation of said auto stage line, the stage in which one Frank Powers was being transported overturned, causing his instant death. The judgment recovered in favor of Powers was enforced by execution against Fred A. Sutherland, and was paid by him prior to the commencement of this action.

The two principal questions raised by appellant on this appeal are: (1) That there is a complete failure of proof upon the part of plaintiff that he was ever at any time an assured or ever had any right or beneficial interest in said policy of indemnity; and (2) that the condition in the alleged policy of indemnity, providing that no recovery shall be had thereon unless suit be brought within "ninety days after the right of action accrues therein," is a complete bar to plaintiff's cause of action, suit not having been commenced by him within such ninety days.

[1] Considering these two questions in their inverse order, the clause in the policy of indemnity, relied upon by appellant as limiting the time within which plaintiff could bring this action, is contained in paragraph 13 of the general agreements of said policy, and provides that no action shall be brought on said contract "unless brought * * * for moneys actually paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment after trial of the issue in a suit instituted within the period limited by the statute of limitations, and in no event shall any action lie unless brought within ninety days after the right of action accrues as herein provided." (Italics ours.)

This action was commenced April 23, 1923. Appellant contends this was ten months and eight days after respondent paid the judgment in Powers Case, and that that was when the cause of action accrued. Respondent contends that his right of action did not accrue until the final determination of the appeal in the Powers Case, 190 Cal. 487, 213 P. 494, by the Supreme Court on February 24, 1923.

The facts are as follows: One Frank Powers was killed while riding as a passenger in an auto stage alleged to have been operated by Sutherland Tia Juana Stages. The heirs at law of said Frank Powers filed an action seeking damages for his death in the superior court of San Diego county against "Sutherland Auto Stage Company, Sutherland Tia Juana Stages, Mariana Gear, sometimes known as Marianna Gear, and Fred Sutherland, doing business as Sutherland Auto Stage Company and Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages." Trial of that action resulted in a judgment against the defendants in the sum of $3,930. An appeal was taken from this judgment to the Supreme Court of the state of California. The California Highway Indemnity Exchange, defendant and appellant herein, through counsel engaged for that purpose, conducted the defense of said Powers action pursuant to the terms and provisions of that portion of the general agreements of said alleged policy of indemnity, which reads as follows:

> "If thereafter any suit, even if groundless, is brought against the subscriber to enforce a claim for damages on account of an accident covered by this contract, the subscriber shall immediately forward to the office of the exchange every summons, notice, or other process as soon as the same shall have been served upon him, and the exchange will, at its own cost, defend such suit in the name and on behalf of the subscriber, or settle same."

The attorneys for the exchange also conducted the appeal to the Supreme Court. While said appeal was pending, and because of the failure upon the part of the attorneys for the defendants to file a stay bond, an execution was issued and levy thereunder made by the sheriff of San Diego county upon property of the defendant Fred A. Sutherland. Had a stay bond been filed, Sutherland would not have been obliged to pay the judgment until after its affirmance by the Supreme Court, and there could have been no question that this cause of action did not accrue until then.

According to the allegations of the amended complaint herein, this plaintiff (respondent), who was one of the defendants against whom said judgment was recovered, acting under an alleged duress of said execution, paid said judgment, including interest and costs, in full, amounting to the sum of $4,131.10, on June 15, 1922. This action, to recover from defendant and appellant herein the sum so paid, was commenced in said superior court April 23, 1923. The aforesaid judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court on February 24, 1923, and the record shows that the remittitur was dated March 30, 1923, and was filed in the trial court April 17, 1923.

In other words, appellant contends that plaintiff's cause of action arose at the time of the payment and satisfaction of said judgment, although the appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court was still pending and undetermined, and respondent contends that its limitation of ninety days did not begin to run until the affirmance of the judgment by the Supreme Court on February 24, 1923, which subsequently became final.

There is no dispute as to the fact that plaintiff and respondent paid the judgment in the Powers Case after execution had been issued and a levy on his property made thereunder, nor that such payment was a necessary preliminary act before suit could be brought. But we believe respondent's contention is correct that this was only preliminary, and that his complete cause of action did not accrue, and that he could not have brought this action, until he could also allege and prove that a final determination of the rights of the parties had been had, and this he could not do pending the review of the judgment of the trial court upon the appeal to the Supreme Court. Code Civ. Proc. § 1049; 2 Cal. Jur. § 177, pp. 412, 413, and cases cited.

In Illinois Tunnel Co. v. Gen. Acc. F. & L. Ins. Co., 219 Ill. App. 251, relied upon by appellant, the court held, in construing the effect of a limitation period in a policy of insurance, that the judgment must be actually satisfied and suit brought within 60 days (in that case) from final judgment rendered in action against the assured. (Italics ours.)

In the instant appeal the period of limitation was ninety days, and the action was begun within ninety days from final judgment rendered.

We have considered it more logical to dispose of appellant's second contention first, for the obvious reason that, if appellant's point as to the time limitation had been well founded, it would have been unnecessary to consider any other point.

[2] In support of the other contention, appellant cites section 2591 of the Civil Code:

> "When the description of the insured in a policy is so general that it may comprehend any person or any class of persons, he only can claim the benefit of the policy who can show that it was intended to include him."

And it is argued that there is no evidence to support the trial court's finding that the policy was intended to include said plaintiff respondent Fred A. Sutherland.

It appears that the trial was had upon the issues joined by the plaintiff's amended complaint and the answer thereto of the defendant, California Highway Indemnity Exchange, and that no evidence was introduced by defendant, which also waived argument. The findings of the trial court are too voluminous to quote in full, but, in substance and effect, it finds that the plaintiff, with one Mariana Gear, were subscribers to the defendant appellant, California Highway Indemnity Exchange, under the fictitious name and style of Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages, and that "at all times herein mentioned up to and including the time of the accident hereinafter and in the amended complaint mentioned plaintiff, Fred A. Sutherland, was, together with a certain Mariana Gear, engaged under the name Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages in conducting, in conformity with the law, an automobile stage line between the city of San Diego, Cal., in the United States of America, and Tia Juana, in Lower California, in the republic of Mexico, whereby passengers were and are transported for hire by automobile stage between said places, that plaintiff, Fred A. Sutherland, has, subsequent to the occurrence of said accident, acquired the interest of said Mariana Gear in said business and all of the assets thereof, and has ever since been and now is the full owner of said business and all of the assets of the same, and that no other person has any interest therein, and that plaintiff has complied with the provisions and requirements of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code of California, and at all times mentioned in the amended complaint resided and still resides in the county of San Diego, state of California."

Plaintiff introduced in evidence the judgment roll in the case of Anna Powers v. Mariana Gear and Fred A. Sutherland, as doing business under the fictitious name Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages (the Powers Case), from which it appears, among other things, that a summons upon the amended complaint was issued to Fred Sutherland, one of the defendants in that case; that an answer to the amended complaint was prepared by the attorneys for the exchange who represented the defendants in the Powers Case; that such answer was sent by such attorney to Fred A. Sutherland, who verified the same, and that such answer was interposed on behalf of the defendants in that case; that the court found in the Powers Case, among other things:

> "That defendants Mariana Gear and Fred Sutherland at all times hereinafter mentioned were doing business under the fictitious name and style of Sutherland Auto Stage Company and Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages. That at all times mentioned herein said defendants were the owners of and conducted and operated an automobile stage line between the cities of San Diego, state of California, and Tia Juana, Mexico, consisting of a number of passenger carrying automobiles for hire, which said automobiles were owned, operated, and controlled by said defendants at all times hereinafter mentioned, and that, at the date and time hereinafter mentioned, said defendants were engaged in carrying passengers for hire in said automobile in the county of San Diego, state of California, and between said cities of San Diego and Tia Juana."

And, as conclusions of law, the court finds that plaintiffs are entitled to recover from defendants the sum of $3,930 and costs, and rendered judgment accordingly; also, under the same exhibit number appears the record of the entire proceedings on appeal to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the judgment. Appellants admit that Sutherland Tia Juana Stages was its subscriber, and that it conducted the defense in the Powers Case, but, as to Fred A. Sutherland's status as one of the defendants in that action, appellant states:

> "The defendant exchange was obliged to defend its subscriber Sutherland Tia Juana Stages, one of the defendants, in any case, and it was a matter of indifference to said exchange that other defendants were included."

It may pertinently be asked why, if Fred A. Sutherland was not "included" or "comprehended within the group" insured as the Tia Juana Stages, did the attorneys for the exchange select him as the defendant to verify the answer and interpose the answer verified by him on behalf of their admitted subscriber? It seems obvious without further discussion that appellant at that time recognized respondent as its insured, but, when it was called upon to make good its obligation, tried to reverse its position.

Plaintiff also introduced in evidence the bill of sale from Mariana Gear to Fred A. Sutherland, dated March 4, 1920, conveying to the latter her interest in the business known as the Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages.

Appellant argues that, because this bill of sale conveys "all" the business of the Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages to Fred A. Sutherland, instead of using the language "all her interest" in the business, it follows that she owned all the business and Fred A. Sutherland owned none of it, and therefore was not a subscriber nor one of its insured. But the evidence and the court's findings in the Powers Case completely negative this argument.

In view of appellants' admissions, referred to above, that Sutherland's Tia Juana Stages was its subscriber, we think it unnecessary to further discuss the evidence, as from the above it appears that there is no ground for appellants' contention that there is a complete failure of proof on the part of plaintiff that he was ever at any time an assured or ever had any right or beneficial interest in said policy of indemnity, but, on the contrary, it appears that there was ample evidence to sustain the court's findings and judgment.

We believe the foregoing also sufficiently answers and disposes of appellants' specific assignments of error.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte SANTOS. (Cr. 1016.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 28, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑597—Application of police power is coextensive with preservation of health of municipalities.

Application of police power of a city must be held coextensive with increased necessities for preservation of health of municipalities.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑605—That garbage had value as food for hogs did not limit police power of municipality to direct disposal.

That garbage in question may have had some value as food for hogs did not limit police power of municipality to direct by ordinance that garbage be disposed of in certain manner.

3. Constitutional law 🔑278(4)—Ordinance providing for disposal of garbage and its transportation only by authorized persons held not to deprive of property right without due process.

Ordinance providing for disposal of garbage and its transportation through streets of city only by duly authorized persons, and defining garbage as "dead animals, of not more than ten pounds weight each, and of every accumulation of animal, vegetable, and other matter that attend the preparation, consumption, decay or dealing in, or storage of, meats, fish, fowls, birds, fruits or vegetables. The term 'garbage' does not include dish water or waste water"—held not invalid as depriving private person of property without due process of law.

Application by G. Santos for writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the chief of police of the city of Sacramento to secure release of the petitioner from custody following conviction of unlawfully transporting garbage. Writ denied, and petitioner remanded.

Robert H. Schwab and Will J. Carraghar, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

R. L. Shinn, City Atty., of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The petitioner was tried and convicted of unlawfully transporting garbage through the streets of the city of Sacramento in violation of Ordinance No. 146, Fourth series, of said city, and filed his application herein for a writ of habeas corpus, and as a reason for his discharge alleges that section 1 of said ordinance is unconstitutional in that it deprives a private person of his property without due process of law.

The ordinance in question provides for the disposal of garbage and its transportation through the streets of the city of Sacramento only by duly authorized persons. The different provisions of the ordinance specify the containers in which garbage shall be kept and also the manner of its transportation through the streets of the city of Sacramento to insure against the escape of noxious odors or fumes.

We need consider only section 1 of the act in question, as all the other provisions are merely regulatory. That section reads:

> "Section 1. Garbage, as the said word is made use of in this ordinance, consists of dead animals, of not more than ten pounds weight each, and of every accumulation of animal, vegetable and other matter that attend the preparation, consumption, decay or dealing in, or storage of, meats, fish, fowls, birds, fruits or vegetables. The term 'garbage' does not include dish water or waste water."

While not in the exact language of the ordinance under consideration in the case of In re Zhizhuzza, 147 Cal. 328, 81 P. 955, the section just quoted is in substance the same as the definition of "garbage" there set forth. For the purposes of definition, "garbage," in the Oakland ordinance involved in said action, reads as follows:

> "Garbage shall be held to include and mean kitchen and table refuse and offal, swill, and also every accumulation of animals, vegetable and other matter that attends the preparation, consumption, decay or dealing in, or storage of, meats, fish, fowls, birds, fruits or vegetables."

It does appear, however, that in the upholding of the Oakland ordinance, the Supreme Court did not in its opinion expressly pass upon the question as to whether the ordinance did or did not deprive a person of private property without compensation, and therefore unconstitutional. That question does not appear to have been urged upon the attention of the court. However, notwithstanding there has been some divergence of opinion upon the question presented for our consideration, we will cite leading cases where ordinances almost word for word with that adopted by the city of Sacramento have been upheld and the constitutional question directly passed upon.

In the case of Pantlind v. City of Grand Rapids, 210 Mich. 18, 177 N. W. 302, 12 A. L. R. 280, we find this definition in the ordinance under consideration:

> "Section 3. The words 'garbage' and 'offal,' as used in this ordinance, shall be held to include every refuse accumulation of animal, fruit or vegetable matter, liquid or otherwise that attends the preparation, use, cooking, dealing in, or storing of, meat, fish, fowl, fruit or vegetables."

In the case of Wheeler v. Boston, 233 Mass. 275, 123 N. E. 684, 15 A. L. R. 275, similar language is used, though the form employed in defining the word "garbage," the prohibitive form as to transportation was used, to wit:

> "Ordered, that no person, firm or corporation, other than the city of Boston or the city contractors or their agents, shall carry, convey or transport through the alleys, streets or public places of the city of Boston any kitchen swill or garbage consisting of any refuse accumulation of meat, fish, fowl, fruit or vegetable matter."

These citations are sufficient to show that the term "garbage," as used in section 1 of the Sacramento Ordinance No. 146, Fourth series, is to all intents and purposes the same as usually employed in ordinances dealing with the subject of garbage.

[1] In Valley Springs Hog Ranch Co. v. Plagmann et al., 282 Mo. 1, 220 S. W. 1, 15 A. L. R. 266, the objections which are urged to the ordinance under consideration were all fully considered. The ordinance of the city of Joplin involved in the Plagmann Case set forth fully and specifically the containers in which garbage should be placed; the vehicles to be used in its transportation, the manner of handling the garbage so that no noxious odors might escape or find their way into the air during such transportation, were fully set forth. Air-tight metallic receptacles were provided for, and also that the garbage should be removed by persons contracting with the city or acting under the authorization of the city. The trial court, relying upon a case decided 36 years previously to the one then being considered, held that the ordinance was void as taking private property without compensation. Upon appeal the judgment of the trial court was reversed, and in reversing the judgment the trial court held, as we must hold here, that the application of the police power of a city must be held coextensive with the increased necessities requisite for the preservation of the health of municipalities, and quoted with approval the following language from the case of Grand Rapids v. De Vries, 123 Mich. 582, 82 N. W. 273:

> "The gathering of garbage is not a trade, business, or occupation in any proper sense, and such employment does not come under the doctrine in reference to monopolies, or in reference to legislation in restraint of trade. It is a matter in which the public agencies are authorized to pursue the best means to protect the public health. The charter provisions recognize the fact that certain matter may be deleterious to public health, and dangerous to persons or property, and thus become a public nuisance; and the charter makes it the duty of the common council to declare any place, thing, or matter which may be deleterious to public health, or dangerous to persons or property, a public nuisance, and the council is given power to abate such nuisance. The ordinance treats garbage or offal as deleterious to public health, and directs the manner of its disposition for the benefit of the public health. It is one of the police regulations of the city for the benefit of the public health."

In the case of California Reduction Works Co. v. Sanitary Reduction Works, 199 U. S. 317, 26 S. Ct. 100, 50 L. Ed. 204, the Supreme Court, speaking of the right to grant an exclusive privilege to collect garbage, said:

> "The exclusive right granted to Sharon, his associates and assigns, was certainly a privilege, and the board of supervisors had power to grant it in order to protect the public health. But independently of the above statutes the board had power, under the Constitution of the state, to make such sanitary regulations as were not inconsistent with the general laws, and that broad power carried with it the power, by contract and ordinance, to guard the public health in all reasonable ways."

In State v. Orr, 68 Conn. 110, 35 A. 771, 34 A. L. R. 279, the subject of granting an exclusive privilege to collect and transport garbage is thus treated:

> "Under these provisions, and the authority of the Special Act of 1895, the board of health might contract with a single person to collect and remove garbage from the entire city, or with several persons to collect and remove it from as many different portions of the city. It might also make such contracts with respect to part of the city, or to certain buildings in part of the city, and leave the collection and removal of garbage from other places open to those who obtained from its clerk a proper permit, and provided proper means of transportation. By neither method of procedure would any monopoly be created, by which the common rights of citizenship would be infringed upon."

In the case of Valley Springs Hog Ranch Co. v. Plagmann, supra, the opinion of the Supreme Court in reversing the judgment of the trial court, on the question of taking private property without compensation, held as follows:

> "It is next urged that the ordinance is destructive of property rights. It is true that there may be an ownership of garbage from the kitchen, but the value of the owner's rights therein is so inconsequential that they are absorbed and lost in the greater rights of the state to protect such owner and the public at large from the dire effects of improper methods in the handling and disposition of the same. Garbage if allowed to accumulate and decompose, becomes a public nuisance. * * * But a short time is required to convert the harmless table scrap into a pestilence-breeding nuisance, when it is intermingled with other refuse from the kitchen," —and then cites a number of authorities to the following point:

> "The constitutional guaranties that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, and that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws were not intended to limit the subjects upon which the police power of a state may lawfully be exerted."

In Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 S. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923, the Supreme Court of the United States, after referring to what is generally known as the "Slaughterhouse" Cases, in speaking of the police power to regulate the use of private property, held as follows:

> "They do not appropriate private property for public use, but simply regulate its use and enjoyment by the owner. If he suffers injury it is either damnum absque injuria or, in the theory of the law, he is compensated for it by sharing in the general benefits which the regulations are intended and calculated to secure."

All the authorities agree that the preservation of health of the inhabitants is one of the most important purposes of municipal governments. And the police power in this respect is coextensive with the necessities of the situation. That the collection and removal of garbage is one of these necessities requires no argument. Its disposal within a very limited period of time is of prime importance. Whether it is disposed of by cremation or by other methods is wholly immaterial. Its collection, transportation and removal from the limits of the municipality are the fundamental purposes for the exercise of the police power regulating and requiring the same in order to protect the public health.

[2] That the garbage in question may have some value as food for hogs does not in any wise limit the police power of municipalities. The following statement which we take from the notes in 15 A. L. R. p. 301, is supported by numerous authorities there cited, to wit:

> "In spite of the fact that garbage, after it has been discarded as food for human consumption, has a certain value as food for hogs or for rendering purposes, its value for such purposes is so slight as compared with the danger to the public health, if the owner is allowed to dispose of it without restriction, that the courts have unanimously held that a requirement of the destruction of garbage cannot be regarded as a taking of private property for public use without compensation."

Among the authorities cited are the cases decided by the United States Supreme Court to which we have heretofore referred. In one of the cases cited in the notes to which we have referred we find the following, which is applicable:

> "The mere fact that the defendant was willing to buy garbage and use it for those purposes (feeding to hogs) is not sufficient to remove it from the category of nuisances and settle its character as property. Whilst money value is evidence, and sometimes very strong evidence to that end, it is not of itself sufficient to make a case of unreasonableness or oppression against the law and the regulations under consideration. Some members of the community may be willing to expose their own health to danger through the use of noisome manures, and to eat the flesh of animals fed upon garbage, or to sell such flesh for food to others who may be unaware of its character, but their practices cannot make a rule of community observances. It is against the ignorance, the indifference, the selfishness, the avarice, the willful disregard of just and intelligent public opinion, that the police power must be constantly invoked on behalf of the common safety and advantage."

It is this very fact that makes the regulation of the keeping of containers or receptacles in which garbage shall be placed, and the manner of its collection and disposal, a subject of necessary police regulation. In every city there is more or less ignorance, more or less willful disregard of all health laws, and much avarice which renders police regulations, such as we are here considering, absolutely indispensable, against which the so-called property right must yield to the general good. That such ordinances are not unconstitutional as violating any property rights is distinctly held by the United States Supreme Court in the case of California Reduction Co. v. Sanitary Reduction Co., 199 U. S. 306, 26 S. Ct. 100, 50 L. Ed. 204, and Gardner v. Michigan, 199 U. S. 325, 26 S. Ct. 106, 50 L. Ed. 212.

[3] A few cases decided prior to population becoming so congested in our municipalities took into consideration the slight property value of the garbage involved, but the overwhelming weight of authority is now to the effect that the police power in relation to the question of the collection and disposal of garbage is not limited by any such minor or inconsequential considerations. We find no modern authority which would justify our holding that section 1 of Ordinance No. 146, Fourth series, of the city of Sacramento, is invalid either as invading any property right or for any other reason suggested upon this hearing.

The writ is denied, and the petitioner remanded.

MONTGOMERY v. OTTOMAN et al. (Civ. 4504.) ★

Attachment ⟹337—Principal's agreement with creditor providing for installment payment of debt held to release sureties on undertaking for release of attachment (Civ. Code, §§ 2819, 2840).

Where sureties executed undertaking to secure release of an attachment, and subsequently principal without knowledge of sureties entered into agreement with creditor whereby debt was stipulated and terms of payment provided and provision was made for taking of judgment in case of default, and after judgment had been taken and returned unsatisfied action was brought against sureties, held that sureties were released by act of party in making agreement, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2819, 2840.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by F. H. Montgomery against Nathan Ottoman and another as sureties upon an undertaking for the release of an attachment. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel T. Bush, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. V. Kaufman and Milton Krug, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of the defendants, who were sued as sureties on an undertaking given by them to release an attachment. The attachment suit was commenced in the superior court of Los Angeles county on September 7, 1920, by the Collection Service Corporation, as assignee of Montgomery & Mathi Company, against Abrams & Cole, a copartnership, and others, to recover the sum of $1,533.01, alleged to have been due and owing for merchandise sold and delivered. The defendants in the attachment suit demurred to the complaint, and after the overruling of the demurrer filed their answer on October 14, 1920, denying all of the material allegations of the complaint. Before the cause came to trial, however, and on July 27, 1921, the parties to the suit, by themselves and by their attorneys, executed a written agreement, which was thereafter filed as a stipulation in the case. By this stipulation defendants admitted liability in the sum of $1,473.97, and promised to pay the same in installments of $200 on or before August 2, 1921, and $50 the first of each succeeding month, with interest at 6 per cent. Time was expressly made of the essence, and upon failure of any payment it was provided that "plaintiff shall be entitled to enter judgment herein for the unpaid balance of principal and interest upon filing a sworn affidavit setting forth the amount of said principal and interest, the amount, if any heretofore paid under this stipulation, and the amount of balance due, owing and unpaid on principal and interest hereunder," and the clerk of court was authorized to enter a judgment for such balance. The stipulation agreement recites that it does not affect the liability of the sureties on the undertaking releasing the attachment, and that no other proceeding in the action was to be taken unless default should occur. The sureties did not sign this agreement and in fact knew nothing about it.

Payment was made of the installments due under this stipulation up to the 1st of November, 1921, but none were ever thereafter made. The affidavit of nonpayment was filed and judgment entered as follows:

"Upon reading and filing the affidavit of L. P. Wackerbarth, and upon reading the stipulation heretofore filed herein, it appearing to the court that the defendants have not made the payments of fifty dollars ($50.00) per month for the months of January, February and March, 1922, as agreed upon in said stipulation, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that judgment be entered for the plaintiff in conformity with said stipulation for the sum of eleven hundred and eleven and 52/100 dollars ($1,111.52).

"Dated this 22d day of March, 1922.

"Frank R. Willis, Presiding Judge."

Execution was issued, returned wholly unsatisfied, demand for payment was made upon the sureties, and payment was refused. This action was brought on the sureties' undertaking, upon these facts.

In their answer respondents admitted all of the allegations of appellant's complaint which recites the foregoing facts and specially pleaded the following defenses, which the trial court found to be true: That the sureties received no consideration for executing the undertaking; that neither of them received any indemnity for the making of the undertaking; that the stipulation above referred to substituted a new obligation with intent to extinguish the cause of action in which the undertaking was given; that a novation was accomplished and the cause of action in the original proceeding was canceled and extinguished; that the issues in the original action were never tried or determined nor judgment entered upon the cause of action therein alleged, and that the judgment entered was not the judgment referred to in the undertaking. Judgment was entered for defendants, with costs.

From the judgment thus entered the appellant has prosecuted this appeal. He urges as grounds for reversal "that the judgment is contrary to and is not supported by law or the evidence, in that it is based upon the alleged accomplishment of a novation, while the evidence fails to establish such novation." We cannot epitomize the issue which we have to determine better than to quote from appellant's opening brief:

"The defendants' entire case rests upon the stipulation made and filed in the attachment suit. It is their theory that by virtue of such stipuation the obligation of the defendants therein was altered and the remedy and rights of the plaintiff in said action were suspended; that there was, in fact, as the result of the making of said stipulation, a substitution of a new obligation for the obligation sued upon, with intent to extinguish the cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's complaint. Upon finding these facts to be true the court concluded that a novation had been accomplished and that the sureties, respondents herein, were thereby discharged from liability on their undertaking."

The trial court was right. By agreement signed by the attorneys and the parties in the form of a stipulation filed in court and acted upon by the court, new circumstances and contingencies were made binding upon the parties which the sureties, defendants below and respondents here, could not have contemplated when they signed the undertaking and to which they never consented. "A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto in any way impaired or suspended." Civ. Code, § 2819.

In the case of Fordyce v. Ellis, 29 Cal. 96, a very similar state of facts was considered. A judgment had been entered directly upon the stipulation and suit was brought against the sureties, as in the case at bar. The sureties claimed they had been released by the stipulation and judgment, and the court so found. The Supreme Court said:

> "There is no error in the judgment. It may be conceded that the stipulation for an extension of time for the payment of the sum sued for, does not disclose a contract binding upon the plaintiffs, for the reason that the contract was without consideration. But the stipulation was made an order of court; and, furthermore, the judgment appears to have been entered in pursuance of the terms of the stipulation. If the stipulation did not impede the sureties in their remedies, both the order and the judgment did."

A stipulation providing for entry of judgment and payment thereof in installments was being considered in the cases of Scheeline v. Moshier, 172 Cal. 565, 158 P. 222. The Supreme Court there said:

> "As the stipulation was filed in the action, and the parties acted in pursuance of its provisions for several months thereafter, it cannot be said to be without consideration as a stipulation controlling the proceeding in the action."

It thus will be seen that the stipulation acted upon was a binding agreement.

> "Our Code speaks with absolute finality upon the subject. Section 2819 of the Civil Code provides that a guarantor 'is exonerated, * * * if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect.' See, also, Civ. Code, § 2840, applying the same rule to sureties. Our decisions construing these sections uniformly hold that, if there has been such a change in the contract in any (material) respect, the inquiry there ends and the guarantor is exonerated, and that it is not a subject of inquiry whether the alteration has or has not been to his injury." First Congregational Church of Christ v. Lowrey, 175 Cal. 124, at page 126, 165 P. 440, 441.

> "While mere delay on the part of a creditor to proceed against the principal, or to enforce any other remedy, does not exonerate a guarantor (Civ. Code, sec. 2823), it is well settled that if he grants the debtor an extension of time within which to pay, under such circumstances as to impair or suspend his right to proceed against the debtor in accord with the terms of the original obligation, we have such an alteration of the original obligation as will release the surety, if the same is without his consent." Bridge v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 774, at page 782, 141 P. 375, 379.

> "The surety is bound only by the terms of his contract, and if these are varied without his consent, it is no longer his contract, and he is not bound by it. The authorities are to the effect that if the time of payment is, without the consent of the surety, extended for a definite period by a binding agreement between the creditor and the principal, the surety is discharged." Daneri v. Gazzola, 139 Cal. 416, at page 418, 73 P. 179, 180.

Appellant's statement to the effect that there were probable delays ahead in the progress of the original action, and that perchance the trial in ordinary course would not have ripened the judgment sooner, may or may not be true. But the cases cited and the statute specifically covering the point unequivocally state that the injury is beside the point. The stipulation extended the time of payment of the indebtedness; authorized entry of judgment in a manner not contemplated by the sureties and not included within the terms of the undertaking entered into by them, to wit, upon failure of installment payments and upon affidavit; provided for an interest on the indebtedness less than the legal rate, and absolutely suspended proceedings in the case until default was made in the performance of the stipulation. This stipulation was filed in court, was breached and judgment entered, not on the original obligation, but, as will be seen by reference to the judgment hereinbefore set out, wholly upon an affidavit made by a stranger to the sureties and filed in conformity to the stipulation. The attempt in the stipulation to forestall the release of the sureties by agreement between the parties without consultation with the sureties was of course abortive.

Judgment affirmed.

CALLAHAN et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 6205.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 2, 1928.

Master and servant 🔑417(7)—Finding of Compensation Commission that disability and death of employee were due to disease, not injury, held conclusive, where evidence seriously conflicted (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Finding of Industrial Accident Commission that condition, disability, and death of employee were due to disease and not to injury, and hence that no compensation was recoverable under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended), held conclusive on Court of Appeal, where evidence was in serious conflict.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Bertha Callahan and another for compensation for the death of Thomas Callahan, against E. L. Younger, employer, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund, insurance carrier. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying an award of compensation claimants apply for certiorari. Writ denied.

Charles H. Seccombe, of Oakland, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, Frank J. Creede, and Henry G. Sanford, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Application for writ of certiorari. The petition shows that one Thomas Callahan, husband and stepfather, respectively, of the two applicants herein, died from injuries alleged to have been received while employed by respondent E. L. Younger. The employer's insurance carrier was State Compensation Insurance Fund, and both employer and employee were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended). An application was filed with the Industrial Accident Commission for benefits under the Compensation Act, and, after hearing, it was determined, upon conflicting evidence, that the injury complained of occurred in the course of and arose out of the employment of the deceased, and an award was made in a total sum of $4,151.40. The employer was relieved from liability. The insurance carrier, State Compensation Insurance Fund, petitioned for a rehearing. The application was granted on February 16, 1927. On November 2, 1927, the commission changed its prior award for a death benefit to an award denying such benefit. The case upon both hearings was tried upon two issues of fact: (1) Whether deceased suffered an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment; (2) whether his disability and death was proximately caused by such injury. In its decision on rehearing, the commission made no finding of fact as to whether or not the employee suffered an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. It did find, however, upon the second issue, to the effect that the evidence did not establish that the condition of the deceased, or his disability or death, were caused by injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. As above stated, there is a decided conflict in the evidence upon the question as to whether the condition of the employee was due to disease or injury. Upon this issue the commission finally determined that it was due to disease and not to injury, and the award denying compensation followed. There being a serious conflict in the evidence, we have no power to interfere. The finding is conclusive here.

For the reason stated, the petition is denied.

CITY OF MONROVIA v. BLACK, City Clerk. (Civ. 5900.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 28, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑917(1)—Statute must be substantially complied with in issuing municipal bonds (St. 1901, p. 27).

In the issuance of bonds by a municipal corporation, under the Act Feb. 25, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 27), the act must be substantially complied with; the authority of the legislative body of a city to issue such bonds arising only after compliance with statute in relation to conditions precedent.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑918(2)—That cost will exceed ordinary income must exist separately as to each improvement, issue of bonds for which must be separately submitted (St. 1901, p. 27, § 2).

Act Feb. 25, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 27) § 2, relative to the issuance of bonds by municipal corporations, clearly requires the fact that the cost will be too great to be paid out of the annual income and revenue to exist separately as to each improvement, the issue of bonds for which is to be separately submitted to the voters.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑918(2)—Absence of statement in preliminary resolution that cost of improvement would exceed ordinary income held not to invalidate bonds voted (St. 1901, p. 27, § 2).

Under Act Feb. 25, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 27) § 2, relative to issuance of bonds by municipal corporations, the absence of a statement in the preliminary resolution of the municipal corporation's legislative body for a bond issue, that the cost of improvement will be too great to be paid from ordinary annual income and revenue, held not to affect the validity of bonds voted pursuant to the resolution and ordinance.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃918(2)—Ballot must contain proposition for each purpose for which municipality proposes to incur indebtedness, showing amount desired for each.

In voter's balloting upon the incurring of indebtedness by the municipal corporation, there must be a proposition on the ballot for each distinct, unrelated, and independent object or purpose for which it is proposed to incur indebtedness, showing separately the amount desired for each one.

5. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃918(2)—Proposition to incur indebtedness for acquisition of lands and construction of water system held single purpose not required to be separately voted on (St. 1901, p. 27, § 2).

The proposition to incur indebtedness, under St. 1901, p. 27, § 2, for acquisition of additional water bearing lands and construction and completion of the reconditioning and rebuilding of the mountain water system of the city held single purpose not required to be submitted as separate propositions.

Application by the City of Monrovia, a municipal corporation, for a writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to Lewis P. Black, City Clerk of the City of Monrovia, requiring him to countersign certain city bonds and affix the corporate seal thereto. Writ granted.

Jones, Stephenson, Palmer & Moore and William Fleet Palmer, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Robert C. Wygant, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This is an original proceeding in this court for a writ of mandate, by which the city of Monrovia seeks to compel the defendant, as city clerk of said city, to countersign certain proposed city bonds and to affix its corporate seal thereto. The petition sets up the proceedings leading up to the proposed issuance of bonds, and the matter is submitted to us on the petition and the defendant's demurrer thereto.

[1] The proceedings in question were taken under the act of February 25, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 27), providing for the issuance of municipal bonds. This statute must be substantially complied with in the issuance of bonds thereunder. The authority of the legislative body of a city to issue such bonds arises only after a compliance with the statute in relation to conditions precedent. City of Inglewood v. Kew, 21 Cal. App. 611, 132 P. 780.

In this case the board of trustees, which is the legislative body of petitioner, passed a preliminary resolution in which they declared "that the public interest and necessity demand the acquisition, construction, and completion, by said city of Monrovia, of a certain revenue producing improvement," described the improvement, and estimated its costs in three separate parts, each of which was thereafter treated as a distinct improvement. Following this they passed an ordinance, which referred to the preliminary resolution, and its estimates of cost, and submitted to the qualified voters of the city three distinct propositions of incurring a bonded debt to be voted on separately. Except as hereinafter stated, these propositions agreed as to the amount and purpose of the bonded debt with the estimates above mentioned. Pursuant to this ordinance, an election was held, at which each of said propositions received a two-thirds affirmative vote. Thereafter, three ordinances were passed, each providing for the issuance of a separate series of bonds for one of said propositions and requiring the city clerk of said city to countersign the bonds and affix the corporate seal thereto. The defendant has refused to act upon the bond issues based on the first and third propositions, claiming that the proceedings therefor are irregular.

[2] Defendant contends as to each separate proposition that the proceedings are defective because the board of trustees did not in the preliminary resolution declare that the estimated cost of each proposed improvement will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue of the city. It is clear from the wording of the preliminary resolution above mentioned that the statement on this point therein made applies only to the aggregate cost of all three of the proposed improvements mentioned therein. Section 2 of the above-mentioned statute provides, omitting immaterial parts, that "whenever the legislative branch of any city, * * * shall, by resolution * * * determine that the public interest or necessity demands the acquisition, construction or completion of any municipal improvement, * * * the cost of which will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue of the municipality, it may at any subsequent meeting" order the submission of "the proposition of incurring" a bonded debt "for the purpose set forth in said resolution" to the qualified voters of said city. "The ordinance calling such special election shall recite the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness is proposed to be incurred, the estimated cost of the proposed public improvements, the amount of the principal of the indebtedness to be incurred therefor, and the rate of interest to be paid on said indebtedness." This statute clearly requires the fact that the cost will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue to exist separately as to each improvement the issue of bonds for which is to be separately submitted to the voters. Petitioner argues, however, that that while the fact must exist, the statute does not require it to be stated in the preliminary resolution, and hence its omission is not fatal to the validity of the bonds. There appears to be no decision on this point, but there are some cases which have a bearing upon it.

In Clark v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 30, 43, 116 P. 722, 727, the court said:

> "The objection that the council, before calling the election, did not make an estimate of the cost of the proposed improvement, is not sustained by the record. Section 2 of the Bond Act requires that the ordinance calling the election shall recite 'the estimated cost of the proposed public improvements,' and the provisions of the section authorize a bond issue when the cost of the improvement is too great to be paid out of ordinary annual revenues of the city. Both the original resolution of intention to establish the improvement and the ordinance calling the election declare that the estimated cost of the proposed improvement was $3,500,000. This was a sufficient compliance with the statute. It will be presumed from this recital that the council did previously make the estimate stated."

In City of Inglewood v. Kew, supra, the court held that a proper estimate of the cost is a necessary part of the preliminary resolution, and also said:

> "The right to issue bonds is restricted to instances where such estimated cost exceeds the ordinary annual income. The elector is entitled to know the estimated cost and the necessity which has arisen, and this notice is imparted to him by the election ordinance duly published."

While the point now before us is not precisely the same as that raised in these cases, yet the two points are closely related, being derived from the same sentence of the statute, and the absence from the cases cited of any declaration that the statement now under consideration must be contained in the preliminary resolution or in the election ordinance suggests at least that the courts deciding those cases did not regard it as necessary.

In Cary v. Blodgett, 10 Cal. App. 463, 470, 102 P. 668, 671, the court said:

> "The duty of determining the necessity for the expenditure and the propriety of submitting it to the electors and the particular phraseology in which it shall be expressed is cast upon the trustees, subject to a reasonable and practicable regard for the right and privilege of the electors to be informed as to the purposes and cost of the proposed improvement, that they may exercise at the polls an intelligent and discriminating judgment as to their own interests and the public welfare."

[3] This language suggests a sufficient reason for a distinction between the estimate of cost and the declaration that such cost will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income. The purpose of these preliminary proceedings is to inform the voters of the matters on which they are voting. The mere description of a proposed improvement in general terms such as will comply with the statute does not afford the basis of even an intelligent guess as to its probable cost. An estimate of the cost is within the power of the legislative body alone, who may be supposed to know better than any one else what is the exact nature of the improvement which they propose and how much they expect it to cost. It is therefore necessary to enable the voters to act intelligently that they be told what is the estimated cost of the improvement, and accordingly the Bond Act requires the ordinance calling a bond election to recite "the estimated cost of the proposed public improvement," and several other matters necessary for the same purpose of informing the voters. But the statement that the cost will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income is a mere conclusion based on a comparison of the estimated cost with the annual revenue and the expenditures necessary for other purposes. The amount of the annual revenue and expenses of a city can be ascertained by an examination of its records, which are open to any citizen for that purpose, and there is not the same necessity for informing the voters of these matters as of the cost of the improvement. Accordingly, the statute does not require them or the above-mentioned conclusion to be drawn by comparing them with the estimated cost, to be stated in the ordinance calling the election. Neither does it expressly require the revenue and the expenses or the said conclusion to be stated in the preliminary resolution. We see no greater reason for requiring this conclusion to be stated there than in the election ordinance, and hence do not feel that we are required to read such a provision into the statute by implication. In the absence of any such requirement in the statute, the determination of the legislative body that the fact exists on which their power to act depends is sufficiently indicated by their proceeding to act. People ex rel. Skelton v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 342, 65 P. 749; People v. Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 84 P. 205.

[4] Defendant also contends that the third proposition submitted to a vote violates the rule that there must be a proposition on the ballot for each distinct, unrelated, and independent object or purpose for which it is proposed to incur indebtedness, showing separately the amount desired for each one. This rule is well established, but we think it was not violated in this case. The third proposition describes the improvement contemplated by it as follows:

> "The acquisition of additional water bearing lands and the construction and completion of the reconditioning and rebuilding of the mountain water system of the city of Monrovia."

[5] As far as appears from the proceedings, the two matters thus mentioned are parts of one improvement and intended for the single purpose of improving the mountain water system of the city. They are therefore properly joined in one proposition. Clark v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 317, 116 P. 966; Hartigan v. Los Angeles, 170 Cal. 313, 149 P. 590; Clark v. City of Manhattan Beach, 175 Cal. 637, 166 P. 806, 1 A. L. R. 1532.

For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue out of this court directed to the said Lewis P. Black, as clerk of the city of Monrovia, commanding him, as such clerk, to countersign and affix the corporate seal to each and all of the said $175,000 issue of bonds and each and all of the said $20,000 issue of bonds.

HOLLMAN v. HOLLMAN. (Civ. 6057.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 29, 1928.

1. Words and phrases—"Further" is not word of strict legal or technical import, generally meaning additional, and is equivalent to moreover or furthermore.

Word "further" is not word of strict legal or technical import, and may be used to introduce negation or qualification of some precedent matter, but generally when used as an adverb it is word of comparison, and means "additional," and is equivalent to "moreover, or furthermore, something beyond what has been said or likewise, or also," and in this sense it is frequently used in legal instruments (citing Words and Phrases, "Further").

2. Husband and wife 🔑279(1)—Property settlement between husband and wife providing for cash payment and execution of note, and "further" for monthly payments, required monthly payments in addition to other payments.

Contract between husband and wife fixing property settlement in view of contemplated divorce, providing that husband pay wife $1,500 in cash, and give promissory note for $8,500, and providing "further" that husband was to pay $150 per month in advance until remarriage or death of second party, or payment of sum of $8,500, and "further" that payments of $150 per month shall be reduced pro rata with reduction of payments of sum of $8,500, and entirely cease when said sum has been paid, held to mean that parties intended the $150 per month to be in addition to the gross sum of $10,000.

3. Evidence 🔑448—Parol evidence held admissible to aid in construction of contract between husband and wife, though contract was unambiguous (Code Civ. Proc. § 1860).

Parol evidence held admissible to aid construction of contract between husband and wife providing property settlement in view of contemplated divorce, though contract was unambiguous under Code Civ. Proc. § 1860, providing that for proper construction of instruments, circumstances under which it was made may be shown.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1012(1)—Appellate court cannot disturb trial court's determination as to preponderance of evidence.

It is for the trial court to determine the preponderance of evidence, and its finding on that question cannot be disturbed on appeal.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1052(5)—Admitting parol evidence to aid in construction of contract, if error, held not reversible, where proper result was reached irrespective of evidence.

In action by wife against husband on promissory note, based on contract involving property settlement between parties, admission of parol evidence to aid in construction of contract, if error, held not reversible, where trial court placed proper construction on contract irrespective of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Eleanor E. Hollman against F. W. Hollman upon a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry I. Stafford and Edward A. Cunha, both of San Francisco (Dean Cunha, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Charles W. Byrnes and Robert L. McWilliams, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. This is an action upon a promissory note. Plaintiff recovered a judgment in the sum of $8,500, with also an attorney fee of $500. From said judgment, the defendant appeals.

It is appellant's contention that he was entitled to a credit on said promissory note of $5,350 which the court failed to give him. This claim depends upon the construction of a certain contract entered into by the parties hereto under the following circumstances:

Plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife. July 14, 1921, they entered into an agreement for the purpose of settling and determining their property rights. So far as material to this decision, said agreement recites:

"This agreement made this 14th day of July, 1921, by and between Fred W. Hollman, the party of the first part, and Eleanor E. Hollman, the party of the second part, both of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, witnesseth:

"That whereas, the party of the second part is about to commence a suit for divorce against the party of the first part, and has employed Charles W. Byrnes as her counsel for that purpose, and the party of the first part has employed Mr. Joseph H. Mayer to represent him in said suit; and

"Whereas said parties desire to avoid the expense of litigation over any and all questions as to their respective property rights, including the right of said second party to temporary and permanent alimony; and

"Whereas said parties being fully and independently advised by their respective counsel, and each being fully informed, as to his and her rights, duties and obligations growing out of their marriage relation, have come to an agreement as to each and all of said matters:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the mutual covenants each to the other running, and of other good and valuable consideration each to the other moving, the parties hereto have agreed and do hereby agree as follows, to wit:

"1. That said first party hereby agrees to pay said second party the sum of fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500) upon the execution of this agreement, and the additional sum of eight thousand five hundred dollars ($8,500) within three years from the date hereof. Said sum of $8,500 to be evidenced by a promissory note a copy of which is hereunto annexed and made a part hereof in full and marked Exhibit B. * * *

"2. That the said party of the first part further agrees to pay said party of the second part the sum of $150.00 per month, in advance, beginning with the date hereof, until the remarriage or death of said second party, or payment of said sum of $8,500. It is further understood and agreed that said payments of $150.00 per month shall be reduced pro rata with the reduction by payments of the sum of $8,500, and entirely cease when said sum of $8,500 has been fully paid.

"In the event that said first party fails to pay said monthly payments for three months said party of the second part may, at her option, declare said sum of $8,500 immediately due and payable. That the said second party shall have a lien for the payment of said $8,500, upon the following described property, to wit: * * *

"6. That said parties hereto have settled and do hereby forever settle all their property rights, including the right of the said second party to alimony, support and maintenance from the said first party. * * *"

The trial court held that the contract was ambiguous, and permitted plaintiff to introduce oral evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the true intent and meaning of the language of the contract. This, appellant contends, constituted error in that he claims the contract is clear and certain in its terms and subject to but one construction, that the monthly payments therein provided were to be applied to a reduction of the amount due on the promissory note. Counsel for respondent contends that the only interpretation that can be derived from the face of the contract is that the monthly payments are in no way connected with the amount due on the note, but constitute a separate and independent payment, but through an abundance of caution he offered and the court received the parol evidence, and that, even though erroneously admitted, the court having set the right interpretation upon the contract, the introduction of such evidence was not injurious. This brings us to an interpretation of the terms of the contract.

It is undisputed that appellant obligated himself to pay respondent the gross sum of $10,000, $1,500 thereof to be paid in cash and the promissory note executed in accordance with the terms of the contract made the balance of $8,500. This is all provided for in paragraph 1 of said contract. The note provides that no interest shall be paid. Paragraph 2 of the contract provides for the further payment of $150 per month in advance until the happening of one of three contingencies therein provided, namely, the remarriage of respondent, her death, or the payment to her of the full sum of $8,500. It is further agreed in said paragraph that said monthly payments shall be reduced pro rata with the reduction by payments of the $8,500, and that when said last-named sum shall have been fully paid said monthly payments shall cease. It is further provided in said last-named paragraph that if the appellant fails to make the said monthly payments for three consecutive months, the whole amount of $8,500 shall immediately become due at the option of respondent. Taking this contract by its four corners, and bearing in mind that the first paragraph provides for the payment of a lump sum of $10,000, the second paragraph provides that appellant "further agrees to pay" respondent $150 per month.

> "The word 'further' is not a word of strict legal or technical import. It may be used to introduce a negation or qualification of some precedent matter, but generally, when used as an adverb, our lexicographers (Webster, Walker, and others) inform us it is a word of comparison; that it means 'additional,' and is equivalent to 'moreover, or furthermore; something beyond what has been said; or likewise or also.' In this sense it is frequently used in statutes or legal instruments." Jones v. Creveling's Ex'rs, 19 N. J. Law, 127, 133.

Also, in the same volume, at page 3017, appears the following:

> "One meaning of the word 'further' is 'additional,' and in a complaint, the second count of which claimed the further sum of $1,990 as damages, implied a sum in addition to the amounts claimed in the former counts. Thompson v. Southern R. Co. [C. C.] (U. S.) 116 F. 890, 891."

We are of the opinion that these definitions are properly applicable to the contract under consideration, and it was intended by the parties that the $150 per month therein provided was to be in addition to the gross sum of $10,000. This conclusion is strengthened by the remainder of the paragraph wherein it is provided that the monthly payments are to cease upon the happening of certain contingencies and the further proviso that the monthly payments are to be reduced pro rata with the reduction by payments of the sum of $8,500.

In appellant's opening brief it is said:

> "It is superplain from the agreement that Hollman was to pay $10,000 in all—$1,500 cash and $8,500 within three years. In the meantime he was to pay on the note not less than $150 a month, and if he did not, what was to happen?
> "(1) Mrs. Hollman had the right to foreclose her mortgage lien in the event he failed for three months by declaring the $8,500 immediately due and payable. (Reporter's Transcript, p. 35, lines 21 to 24.)
> "(2) On payment of the $8,500 all payments should entirely cease. (Reporter's Transcript, p. 35, line 20.)
> "(3) The agreement says that the payments of $150 shall be reduced pro rata with reductions of the payments of $8,500. (Reporter's Transcript, p. 35, lines 12 to 19.)
> "It is too obvious for comment that the monthly payments of $150 bore a direct—(pro rata to use the term of the agreement) relation to the $8,500 note or balance."

[3] But the agreement does not coincide with these conclusions of counsel. Nowhere does the agreement say that the monthly payment was to be applied to the reduction of the note. Neither does it say that the note is to be reduced by such payments, but that the payments of $150 per month are to be reduced in proportion to the payments on the note. In other words, if appellant pays one-half of the note, then the monthly payment would be reduced to one-half the amount provided for in the contract. The construction contended for by appellant cannot be reached except by interpolating into the contract language which would change its meaning. It is a further contention of appellant's counsel that because the trial court during the progress of the trial expressed views favorable to appellant's construction of the agreement, it is clearly shown that the admission of parol evidence constituted reversible error, and that without said evidence appellant would have obtained a judgment. But such is not the conclusion to be drawn by the attitude of the trial court. It is evident that the court receded from its previous attitude as to a construction favorable to defendant appearing on the face of the contract because of his allowance of the introduction of parol evidence. However, we cannot conceive of any possible construction that would give the result claimed by appellant, and if we are wrong in the conclusion that the contract is unambiguous we are satisfied that the introduction of parol evidence was proper. The law providing for the admission of parol evidence concerning written instruments is found in section 1860, Code of Civil Procedure, wherein it is provided that:

> "For the proper construction of an instrument, the circumstances under which it was made, including the situation of the subject of the instrument, and of the parties to it, may also be shown, so that the judge be placed in the position of those whose language he is to interpret."

In United Iron Works v. Outer H. etc., Co., 168 Cal. Sup. 81, 141 P. 917, it is held that the foregoing section of the Code simply re-enacts the common-law rule that where upon the face of the contract itself there is doubt and the evidence is used to dispel that doubt, not by showing that the parties meant something other than what they said, but by showing what they meant by what they said, parol evidence is admissible. In the light of this rule we will review the oral testimony material to the construction of the contract in the case at bar. Joseph Mayer, who was the attorney for the defendant in the preparation of the contract, and present when it was executed, testified in part as follows:

> "Well, Mrs. Hollman was insisting upon receiving from Mr. Hollman $10,000; and Mr. Hollman said he was not in a position to pay $10,000 in cash; that he would pay her $1,500 in cash, and make a note for $8,500. And the question of alimony came up, and Mrs. Hollman was insisting upon $250 per month, and Mr. Hollman took the position that he could not pay $250 per month; that he could pay $150, with the understanding that in the event he paid a certain portion of the note, the amount of alimony should be reduced. That was the substance of the agreement arrived at."

Charles W. Byrnes testified:

> "Mrs. Hollman stated she wanted $10,000 and alimony in the sum of $250 a month. * * * Mr. Hollman said that he was not willing to pay $250 a month, and was willing to pay $150 a month alimony. * * *"

Mrs. Eleanor Hollman testified:

> "Mr. Hollman agreed to give me $150 a month alimony, and I was asking for $250; * * * I wanted interest on the note, and Mr. Hollman would not give me any interest on the note, and said that within four or five months that he would pay me a certain amount on that note, something like $4,500 or $5,000; and at that time when he had given me that money, why then the alimony would be reduced accordingly, but he never gave me the money, and he never gave me any money on the $8,500 note."

May 16, 1922, the appellant wrote a letter to Mr. Charles W. Byrnes, concerning certain properties in which he states that certain contingencies which might have arisen would not have been very gratifying to either the writer or to Mrs. Hollman, "especially if she expects me to pay the $8,500 note which she holds."

[4, 5] As against this testimony we have that of the appellant wherein he says in response to a question asked him as to the application of the monthly payments of $150, that they were to be applied on the $8,500 note.

It must be conceded that if this was a proper case for the admission of parol testimony the trial court was clearly correct in placing a construction on said testimony favorable to the plaintiff herein. In any event, it was for the court to determine the preponderance of the evidence, and its finding on that question cannot be disturbed on this appeal. If, on the other hand, it was not a proper case for parol testimony, then its admission under the case of Provident G. Min. Co. v. Manhattan S. Co., 168 Cal. 304, 142 P. 884, was not reversible error. In the latter case the court admitted parol evidence, but it was held that the contract was not ambiguous or uncertain but, "since the court set the right interpretation upon the contract, the introduction of this evidence was not injurious. The same result would have been reached necessarily without that evidence." We cannot conceive of any construction of the contract that would reach the interpretation placed thereon by counsel for appellant, with or without the aid of the parol evidence.

We believe the judgment of the trial court is correct and must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

FERRO v. LOS ANGELES FIRST NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS BANK.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 6, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⟹731(5)—Appellate court must accept findings of fact as true, in absence of specification of insufficiency of evidence.

Where there is no specification of particulars on which evidence was insufficient to sustain findings, appellate court must accept findings of fact as true.

2. Trial ⟹395(1)—Finding that signer of lease contract did so without consideration, and in reliance on fraudulent representation, held to support judgment denying liability.

Finding that signer of lease contract for purchase of automobile was induced to do so because of fraudulent statements of seller and cosigner, and that signature was wholly without consideration, held sufficient to support judgment denying liability thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by R. Ferro against G. C. B. Swisher and Angelus Young, wherein the Los Angeles First National Trust & Savings Bank was made defendant as administrator of the estate of G. C. B. Swisher, also known as Givens C. B. Swisher, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff against second named defendant and in favor of first named defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred Horowitz, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. W. Richardson and James H. O'Neill, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This was an action brought by the plaintiff as the assignee of one Pietro Ferro, against G. C. B. Swisher, since deceased, and Angelus Young. A trial was had by the court without a jury, and, upon the conclusion of the trial, judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant Angelus Young, and in favor of the defendant Swisher, against the plaintiff. This appeal is by the plaintiff against that portion of the judgment wherein judgment was given in favor of the defendant Swisher.

We cannot see that there is anything before this court for consideration, except the question of whether the findings support that portion of the judgment in favor of the defendant Swisher.

There is no specification that the evidence fails to support any of the findings of the trial court, nor any assignment of error.

The first fifteen pages of appellant's brief are devoted to a statement of the pleadings and the facts and "the important features of this case in their chronological order," immediately after which, on page 16, is the following:

> "The questions involved in this appeal are these:
> "(1) Can it be said that adversaries in a lawsuit occupy such a relation of trust and confidence that the parties are exonerated from reading contracts with each other?
> "(2) Assuming that there was a confidential relationship existing between the defendant Swisher and the defendant Young, can it be said that any misrepresentation by the defendant Young is chargeable to plaintiff's assignor?
> "(3) Where the defendant Swisher knew that he was signing as surety for the defendant Young and in favor of the plaintiff's assignor, Ferro, and where the defendant Swisher had the utmost confidence in the defendant Young, can the defendant Swisher then state that he believed that the amount of his obligation was less than that stated in the instrument, and that the legal effect of the instrument was different from that which he believed?"

[1, 2] The evidence shows that Swisher was blind, but not dumb, and that he not only could, but apparently did, so state. There being no specification of the particulars in which the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings, we must accept the findings of fact as true. 2 Cal. Jur. 407 et seq., and the numerous cases there cited. As to this respondent the court found as follows:

> "The court finds that the agreement, designated as a lease contract, for the purchase of a certain Hudson automobile for the consideration of $1,835.43, payable in installments, was signed by the defendants Angelus Young and G. C. B. Swisher, but that at the time the said Swisher, defendant, signed said agreement he did not read same on account of his blindness and extreme nearsightedness, it being almost impossible for him to read, and that he was induced to, and did, sign said paper wholly on the statements and representations of the plaintiff's assignee, Pietro Ferro, and of the defendant Angelus Young, and relied solely upon the statements and representations of said Angelus Young and Pietro Ferro that said instrument was only a lease to protect the said Ferro, and that the automobile was full security therefor, and that there would be no liability of the said Swisher thereon; that the said automobile was never delivered to the said Swisher, and he never had possession thereof, and the signing of said instrument was wholly without consideration to Swisher; and that he had no knowledge at the time he signed said instrument of the character of same and the obligations contained therein, and he would not have signed same had he known the kind of a paper or obligation he was signing, he being at the time more than 80 years of age, unable to read, and signed said paper wholly upon the false representations and statements of the said Angelus Young and the said Pietro Ferro; that said agreement is binding upon the said defendant Angelus Young, but is not an obligation of the defendant G. C. B. Swisher, and the said Swisher is not liable thereon."

The court then finds that the whole sum provided in the contract ($1,835.40) with interest is due from defendant Young to plaintiff, and that $200 is a reasonable attorneys' fee, and as conclusions of law as to said defendant Swisher:

"That the defendant G. C. B. Swisher, also known as Givens C. B. Swisher, was deceived and misled, and was induced to sign said lease contract upon the false statements and representations of Pietro Ferro and Angelus Young, the said Swisher being unable to read same, and did not read said agreement, and the instrument sued upon was not the obligation of the said Swisher; that he, the said Swisher, did not knowingly sign same; therefore is not liable thereon to the plaintiff in any sum by reason thereof," —and rendered judgment accordingly, and that defendant Swisher recover costs from plaintiff.

Appellant in his argument relies upon the case of Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558, and cites other cases in which it is claimed that case has been affirmed. That case is decided upon the doctrine that, where without any intention of especial trust and the means of knowledge being equally available to each, two parties sign a contract of purchase and sale, the seller may not assail the terms of the contract solely because he read with difficulty. But the doctrine of that case and like authorities does not apply to cases of actual fraud and misrepresentation (Belden v. Henriques, 8 Cal. 87; Roseman v. Canovan, 43 Cal. 110), which the court found existed in the case at bar, and, as stated above, we must accept those findings as true. In Hanscom v. Drullard, 79 Cal. 237, 21 P. 737, the court says:

> "A man may perhaps be able to discover for himself what he ought to know if left to his own devices, but where he is induced by the artifice of another not to use his opportunities, it would seem hardly fair that the one using the trick or misrepresentation should remain protected."

The findings amply support the judgment as given in favor of defendant Swisher.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by George B. Richey against Clara B. Ziegler and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. E. Gleason, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George D. Richey and C. A. Townsend, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. [1-4] Action on stockholder's liability. The complaint alleges the Gladiator Manufacturing Company to be a corporation with a total capital stock of 1,000 shares, of which defendant Clara B. Ziegler owns 500 shares and defendant Clarence M. Petty the remainder; that on October 3, 1923, one Belle Nutman obtained an award before the Industrial Accident Commission against said company for the sum of $3,893.10, and that thereafter a duly certified copy of said award was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Los Angeles county on September 29, 1924, and thereupon a judgment on award for said sum was duly entered and docketed in the judgment book of said court; that said Belle Nutman assigned the said award and judgment to the plaintiff in the action at bar. The complaint then alleges that defendants and appellants herein were stockholders of said corporation at the time said debt was incurred, and it is prayed that a judgment be rendered against the defendants on account of their liability as stockholders of said Gladiator Manufacturing Company. The defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendants or either of them. The demurrer was overruled, whereupon defendants answered, denying that Belle Nutman assigned the award or judgment to the plaintiff, and denying their liability to plaintiff as stockholders of said company for the said debt. Thereafter the case came on for trial, and the court made findings and rendered judgment against defendants for their proportionate shares of the debt as such stockholders. This is an appeal from such judgment. The sole point raised on the appeal is that the award made to Belle Nutman by the Industrial Accident Commission could not legally be assigned to plaintiff. This contention is based upon section 24 of Act 4749 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 1731), which prohibits a claim before the Industrial Accident Commission from being assigned before payment.

In support of this contention we are cited to the case of Pacific Electric Ry. Co. v. Commonwealth, etc., Insurance Co., 55 Cal. App. 704, 204 P. 262, where it is held in construing this act that the word "claim" is used in its broadest sense, and covers both claims and awards, since claims are not paid until they become awards, and the only thing payable under the provisions of the act is awards. It is apparent that defendants are invoking the aid of an act to resist the payment of an award which was designed to protect disabled workmen and their dependents, in the event of death, from making assignments of industrial compensation. That the Legislature never intended the act should be used as a shield for this purpose goes without saying. However this may be, the defense interposed can avail defendants nothing, for the reason that the award, when reduced to judgment as above recited, lost its actionable character as a claim or award as it became merged in the judgment, and the complaint is based upon such judgment, and not upon the award. The complaint itself so recites. There could be no action based upon the award after it became merged in the judgment, for, as stated, it had lost its actionable character, nor could the award be paid, as it no longer existed. Satisfaction could only be had by payment of the judgment. The statute invoked does not attempt to limit the assignment of judgments based upon awards. A judgment is assignable to pass title, and the assignee thereunder acquires a property right that is in no manner impaired by statute.

DONZE v. DONZE. (Civ. 5983.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 2, 1928.

1. Husband and wife 🔑262(1)—Property deeded to married woman at husband's request, in terms as her separate property, held conclusively presumed such; fraud or mistake not being charged (Civ. Code, § 164).

Where real estate is conveyed by a third person to a married woman with knowledge and consent and pursuant to directions of husband, and deed declares the property is conveyed to her as her separate property, regardless of the consideration being paid from husband's separate property or from the community funds, there is a presumption that it was intended as a gift to her as her separate property, conclusive, except on a showing of fraud or mistake on issue made (Civ. Code, § 164).

2. Evidence 🔑390(4)—Grounds on which recital of deed can be avoided by parol stated.

Recital of deed to married woman, that the property was conveyed to her as her separate property, can be avoided by parol only on ground of procurement through fraud, coercion, undue influence, or mistake.

3. Divorce 🔑203—Facts relied on to avoid recital of deed to married woman must be specifically alleged.

One seeking to avoid recital of deed to married woman, that the property was conveyed to her as her separate property, must specifically allege the facts relied on to show fraud, coercion, undue influence, or mistake, as ground therefor.

4. Divorce 🔑203—Divorce complaint merely alleging marital relation and that lot was community held insufficient to raise issue of wife's fraud in procuring deed as separate property.

Complaint in divorce is insufficient to raise the issue of fraud of wife in procuring a deed of a lot, as her separate property, by merely reciting the existence of the marital relation and that such lot was their community property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Leon Jacque Donze against Hattie Genevieve Donze. From part of the judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

W. Preston Butcher, Jr., and Atwell Westwick, both of Santa Barbara, for appellant.
J. W. Smith, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from that portion of an interlocutory judgment of divorce decreeing a certain house and lot standing in the name of appellant to be the community property of the respective spouses.

Appellant and respondent intermarried at Santa Barbara on July 29, 1909. In consideration of the sum of $100, the mother and father of respondent executed a deed of conveyance April 27, 1922, to lot 2, block 102, of said city of Santa Barbara, to appellant, Hattie Genevieve Donze, "as her separate property." A dwelling house was thereafter constructed on this lot at a cost of $2,800, which was borrowed from the building and loan association on a note and mortgage executed by these parties as a lien upon said premises. This money was subsequently paid in installments from the earnings acquired during coverture. Domestic trouble arose. In August, 1924, respondent brought suit against the appellant for divorce, alleging that said lot was their community property. The appellant answered, denying this allegation, and upon the contrary alleged that it was her separate property, and in a cross-complaint she prayed for a divorce on her part. Upon trial a divorce was denied respondent, but appellant was granted an interlocutory decree on the ground of extreme cruelty, and she was awarded the custody of their two minor children, and $60 per month alimony and maintenance, together with the temporary right of occupancy of said premises. The court also found that the house and lot in question was community property, and awarded it to the spouses as "tenants in common." An appeal was taken from that portion of the decree which finds that this house and lot is community property, on the ground that this finding is unsupported by the evidence, and that oral testimony as to the title was incompetent to vary the terms of the deed.

The evidence is without conflict to the effect that all of the purchase price of said lot, together with the cost of construction of the dwelling house, was paid from community funds; the deed was executed by the father and mother of respondent to the appellant. Following the name of the grantee in this deed was the recital that the lot was conveyed "as her separate property." This deed was delivered to the appellant, who had it recorded, and afterward kept it among her private papers; the respondent never afterward saw the instrument. Over the objection of appellant that the evidence was incompetent and tended to vary the terms of a written instrument, the respondent was permitted to testify in effect that the deed was taken in the name of his wife as a matter of convenience. He said:

> "It was deeded to my wife just simply in case —in the work I am in—driving a machine around, in the event anything should happen, my death or anything, there would be nothing in the way of red tape or anything, of her going ahead and proving ownership of the property. * * * We talked it over and it was just simply signed in her name. * * * I didn't know that it was in her name as separate property. * * * We agreed that it would be put over (in her name) in case anything should happen. * * * If anything happened to me there would be no argument so far as red tape of her getting hold of the property—her and the children. * * * I think she said something to the effect that parents of the husband could come in on his half of the property if it was community property. * * * (I said) rather than have an argument we would fix it so she and the children could have it all. * * * I told my father to have the property made out in her name."

Appellant said the respondent told her the reason he had the deed executed in her name was:

> "Just so the children and I could always have a home. * * * He said, if anything should happen to him, we would have it always. * * * He said he wanted the property in my name and the children's, so that his folks could never come in on it, or any one else—that it would always be our property."

The evidence is undisputed that the deed was executed to appellant with the consent and at the request of respondent. There was no contention in this case that it was executed through fraud or mistake.

[1] Where land is conveyed from a husband to his wife the presumption is that it was intended as a gift. So, also, where property is conveyed to a wife, from a third party, with the knowledge and consent of the husband, whether the consideration is paid by the husband from his separate property or from their community property, the presumption is that it was intended as her separate property. Civ. Code, § 164; Sanchez v. Grace M. E. Church, 114 Cal. 295, 46 P. 2; Stafford v. Martinoni, 192 Cal. 724, 221 P. 919; 13 Cal. Jur. 854, § 50. The intention must ordinarily be inferred from all the surrounding circumstances, including the acts, declarations, and conduct of the interested parties at the time of the transaction. Gilmour v. N. Pasadena L. Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308; Cohn v. Smith, 37 Cal. App. 764, 174 P. 682. But where a deed of conveyance to real property is made from a third party to the wife with the knowledge and consent and pursuant to directions from the husband, and the deed contains an express declaration that the property is conveyed to her as her separate property, regardless of whether the consideration is paid from his separate property or from the community funds, the presumption that it was intended as a gift to the wife is conclusive, except when that intent is challenged on the trial by an issue of fraud or mistake. 13 Cal. Jur. 855, § 50; Miller v. Brode, 186 Cal. 409, 199 P. 531; Estate of McCauley, 138 Cal. 546, 71 P. 458; Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 358.

In the case of Miller v. Brode, supra, it is said:

"* * * The deed by which the ranch was acquired conveyed it to the decedent as sole grantee, and described it as her separate property, and was so made with the consent of her husband, who participated in the transaction. This definitely establishes the character of the property as her separate property. In McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 418, 12 P. 347, it was held that, where a third person conveys property to a wife as her separate property, there is but a prima facie presumption that it is taken by her as such. This may be true where, as in that case, it does not appear that the deed was made with the husband's consent. But where, although the property is purchased with community funds, it is conveyed to the wife with the husband's consent by a deed expressly describing it as her separate estate, it is as if the husband himself had conveyed community property to her by deed expressing that she took it as her separate estate. Such a conveyance would be nothing more nor less than an express gift by the husband to the wife of community property. Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 358; Shanahan v. Crampton, 92 Cal. 9, 28 P. 50. There is no impediment to a husband making such a gift if he desires, and, if he does it, the property at once becomes the wife's separate property, and the effect of the conveyance in this respect cannot be avoided except by avoiding the conveyance itself. This, of course, cannot be done except for fraud, mistake, or some similar ground. In the absence of some such ground for setting aside the transaction it is wholly immaterial that the property was community property before the husband conveyed it to the wife, or in case it were conveyed to her by a third person that the consideration given for it was community property. Its character is changed at once by the conveyance to the wife as her separate property either by the husband directly or by a third person with his consent."

The foregoing language seems to fit the instant case exactly. This deed was made to the wife at the request of the husband, and it recited that the property was conveyed to appellant "as her separate property." There was no fraud or mistake charged with relation to its execution. Under such facts the house and lot in question is conclusively presumed to be the separate property of the appellant.

[2-4] The evidence as to the intent with which the deed was executed in the name of the appellant varied the terms of the written instrument, and, in the absence of appropriate allegations, was incompetent. The objection to this evidence should have been sustained. No rule of evidence is more firmly established than the one that "parol evidence cannot be received to contradict, vary, add to or subtract from the terms of a valid written instrument." 10 Cal. Jur. 916, § 186; 10 R. C. L. 1016, § 208; Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) 656, § 434. There are, however, equally well-recognized exceptions to this rule, as, for instance, where an instrument has been procured through fraud, coercion, undue influence, or mistake. 10 R. C. L. 1056, § 251. But he who seeks to set aside an instrument which is valid on its face, upon any of these grounds, must specifically allege the facts upon which he relies. 12 Cal. Jur. 800, § 62; 10 Standard Enc. of Proc. 49, § 8; Hammond v. McCollough, 159 Cal. 639, 649, 115 P. 216. A complaint in a suit for divorce is insufficient to raise the issue of an alleged fraudulent conveyance from a husband to his wife, or from a third person to the wife, which merely recites the existence of the marital relationship and the possession of the community property by the spouses. Such general allegations utterly fail to warn the accused that she will be expected to defend against the serious charge of fraud. Regardless of the existence of fiduciary relationship, one who is accused of fraud or undue influence is entitled to be informed of the charge by specific averments which may enable him to refute the charge and adequately prepare his defense. 12 Cal. Jur. 800. It is true that in transactions between a husband and wife the law presumes the existence of confidential relationship. Civ. Code, § 158. This fiduciary relationship also precludes either spouse from procuring an unfair advantage over the other by means of fraud, mistake, or undue influence. During the existence of this relationship, where an unfair advantage has been obtained, under appropriate pleadings, the transaction will be deemed to have been secured without consideration and by means of undue influence. Civ. Code, § 2235; 13 Cal. Jur. 860, § 54. Where such undue influence and advantage is alleged, the burden is cast upon him who has the advantage to show that it was fair and free from fraud or undue influence. 13 Cal. Jur. 860, §§ 54–56; Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, 194 Cal. 73, 80, 227 P. 715; Henley v. Bursell, 61 Cal. App. 511, 516, 215 P. 114; Williamson v. Williamson, 41 Cal. App. 721, 183 P. 301; Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 133, 143, 204 P. 583. But the mere existence of the relationship of husband and wife does not create a presumption of fraud or undue influence, in the absence of the procuring of an undue advantage, nor does it constitute a prima facie showing of such conduct. Before this presumption may be indulged it must appear that the marital confidence was violated and that an undue advantage was thereby secured. Yordi v. Yordi, 6 Cal. App. 20, 91 P. 348; Dimond v. Sanderson, 103 Cal. 97, 37 P. 189; 13 Cal. Jur. 862, §§ 55, 56. Clearly, if a wife were to obtain, without consideration, an absolute conveyance of property from her husband, by means of false promises which she did not intend to perform, the transaction would constitute actual fraud. And if the wife obtained, without consideration, an absolute conveyance of property from her husband upon a promise to reconvey it, and, subsequently, upon request failed and refused to do so, her conduct would constitute constructive fraud. Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 P. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189. But, manifestly, relief from such a fraudulent transaction may be secured only in a proceeding which presents the issue of fraud by specific pleadings. We have been pointed to no decision in the California Reports, nor elsewhere, holding that this serious charge of fraud may be raised without pleading the fiduciary relationship, the circumstances of the fraud, and the undue advantage secured. Upon the contrary, the cases cited indicate that the issues of fraud, lack of consideration, and undue influence were invariably raised by definite pleadings. In Brison v. Brison, supra, it is said:

> "The complaint shows that the * * * promise upon which plaintiff relies was false and 'in bad faith,' and 'made with intent to deceive.'"

In the case of Falk v. Turner, 101 Mass. 496, therein quoted with approval, it is said:

> "It is averred that the plaintiff 'had at all times confidence in his said wife and her devotion and fidelity to him,' and that he made the deed 'having confidence in his said wife, and in her said representation and promises, and relying upon the same.'"

In Kohn v. Kempner, 59 Cal. App. 621, 211 P. 805, the court said:

> "Appellants contend that the complaint is insufficient because it does not allege that the plaintiff relied upon the promise of his wife to reconvey or believed that she would perform it. The allegation in this connection is that the conveyances were made to Mrs. Kohn 'upon her express promise to reconvey to plaintiff upon his demand.'"

In Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 P. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162, where a fiduciary relationship existed, and an action was brought to set aside a deed of conveyance upon the ground of fraud, it was held that both the relationship and the fraud must be alleged. In that case evidence of fraud was received over objection, and the case was therefore reversed. The court said:

> "No actual fraud was alleged. A material ingredient of actual fraud is the fraudulent intent, and this must be alleged as one of the facts constituting the fraud. * * * The facts constituting fraud must be averred in cases of constructive as well as of actual fraud. Golson v. Dunlap, 73 Cal. 164, 14 P. 576."

We therefore conclude that where a deed of conveyance is made to a wife, in which deed the character of the property is specifically declared to be "separate property," a rebuttable presumption is thereby created to the effect that it is her separate property, and that she holds the legal title thereto. This presumption may be overcome by the husband only on the theory that the deed is not what it purports to be, and was executed through fraud, mistake, or undue influence, and that the wife therefore holds but an equitable title for the benefit of the community. The invariable rule under such circumstance requires these issues to be raised by appropriate pleadings.

For the foregoing reasons the portion of the judgment determining property rights is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial upon the sole issue as to the property rights. Inasmuch as the trial court was of the opinion that although the legal title to the property was in the wife, yet she held it for the community, and that the equitable title was in the community, it is directed that the plaintiff be permitted to amend his complaint upon timely and proper application therefor adding appropriate allegations of fraud, mistake, or undue influence, presenting the issue of the equitable ownership of the property, if he be so advised.

PEOPLE v. WOOD. (Cr. 1012.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 22, 1928.

1. Intoxicating liquors ⟹132—Law making possession of still felony held as legislation independent of and separate from state Prohibition Act (Wright Act; St. 1927, p. 497).

St. 1927, p. 497, making the possession of a still for use in manufacture of liquor a felony, held as legislation entirely independent of and separate from state Prohibition Act (Wright Act [St. 1921, p. 79]) though effecting a change in penalty for act therein described.

2. Statutes ⟹133—Law submitted to people under referendum reservation held not direct legislation as bearing on right to amendment by Legislature (Const. art. 4, § 1).

Submission of law to people for approval or rejection under referendum reservation in Const. art. 4, § 1, held not to constitute direct legislation as bearing on right to amendment by Legislature.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⟹132—State law making possession of still a felony held not invalid because imposing heavier penalty than federal law (St. 1927, p. 497; Volstead Act [27 USCA]; Const. U. S. Amend. 18).

St. 1927, p. 497, making possession of still for manufacture of liquor a felony held not invalid because of imposing a heavier penalty than is authorized for a like act by the Volstead Act (27 USCA), passed for purpose of enforcing Eighteenth Amendment to Federal Constitution.

4. States ⟹4—State police power not authorizing that forbidden by national law is paramount.

Police power of state is paramount where it does not authorize what national law forbids.

5. Statutes ⟹64(1)—Invalidity of subsidiary section does not affect validity of other provisons.

Invalidity of one section of act having no interdependence with other sections thereof and being subsidiary to main purpose of act and not essential to its validity does not have effect of invalidating other and more important provisions thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

C. C. Wood was convicted of possessing a still for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Fraser and H. L. Ford, both of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was charged by information filed in the superior court of Humboldt county with the crime of willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously having in his possession and under his control, on or about the 25th day of October, 1927, in said county, "a still, designed, used, and intended for use in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes." Upon his arraignment upon said charge, the defendant entered a plea of guilty thereto, waived the statutory time for the pronouncement of judgment, and was thereupon sentenced by the court to pay a fine of $1,000 and to be imprisoned in the state prison.

Notwithstanding the foregoing proceedings or the fact that judgment was passed upon him upon his plea of guilty to the information, the defendant has taken this appeal from said judgment. Counsel for the defendant, however, in their brief introduce their argument in support of the appeal by the statement that the defendant employed them to prosecute this appeal for the reason that he and others, including counsel, entertain serious doubt as to the constitutionality of the act under which the defendant was proceeded against.

The act upon the provisions of which the information filed against the defendant is based was passed by the Legislature of 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 497), and went into effect on July 29th of that year. The first section of said act reads as follows:

> "Any person whether acting in his own behalf or as the agent, servant, officer or employee of any person, firm, association or corporation, who shall be the owner of or have any interest in or who shall operate or cause to be operated or knowingly have in his possession or control, any still, still worm, still cap, still condenser or stilling device of any kind, designed, used or intended for use in the manufacture or production of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than one thousand dollars ($1,000) nor more than five thousand dollars ($5,000), and by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one year nor more than five years."

The penalty fixed by said statute is heavier than the penalty prescribed for the same act by the National Prohibition Law.

[1, 2] It is claimed by counsel for the defendant that the foregoing act involves an attempted amendment of the state Prohibition Act, commonly known as the Wright Act (Stats. 1921, p. 79), and that, inasmuch as said act was, after its enactment by the Legislature, submitted to the people for approval or rejection, under the referendum reservation contained in article 4, § 1, of the Constitution, and approved by the people at the general election in November, 1922, it thereupon in effect became and that it involves direct legislation by the people themselves, and therefore not subject to amendment by the Legislature. This contention is obviously unsound. In the first place, it is to be noted that the act does not purport to be an amendment of the state Prohibition Act, effective in due time after its approval by the people in November, 1922, but, while having reference to or bearing direct connection with the subject-matter and the object of said act, and effecting a change in the penalty for the act therein described, it is, as legislation, entirely independent of and separate from said act; secondly, notwithstanding that an act of the Legislature may, under the power of referendum reserved by the people in their Constitution to themselves, be referred to the people after its passage by the Legislature and approval by the Governor for their approval or rejection, such act is no less an act of the Legislature than if it were never so submitted. In other words, an act so passed and referred does not constitute the "direct legislation" which the people, by article 4, § 1, of the Constitution, have reserved to themselves the power and right to inaugurate. But said section of the Constitution itself directly answers the proposition. Among other things, it provides:

> "No act, law or amendment to the Constitution, initiated or adopted by the people, shall be subject to the veto power of the Governor, and no act, law or amendment to the Constitution, adopted by the people at the polls under the initiative provisions of this section, shall be amended or repealed except by a vote of the electors, unless otherwise provided in said initiative measure; but acts and laws adopted by the people under the referendum provisions of this section may be amended by the Legislature at any subsequent session thereof."

[3] But it is further contended that the statute is invalid because it imposes a heavier penalty for the act denounced in the section of the statute under which the defendant was proceeded against than is authorized for a like act by the so-called Volstead Act (27 USCA), passed by Congress for the purpose of enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment to the national Constitution; that the Wright or state Prohibition Act, so far as penalties are concerned, is, by its own express terms, the congressional act referred to, and that it follows, therefore, that it is incompetent for the Legislature of the state to prescribe any different penalties for the violation of the state prohibition law from those which the Volstead Act proscribes or the Congress may hereafter prescribe. This contention seems to be founded on the following language of section 3 of the Wright Act:

> "Whenever Congress shall amend or repeal the Volstead act, or enact any other law to enforce the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, then the provisions of sections one and two of this act shall apply thereto."

[4] The courts of this as well as of other jurisdictions, state and federal, have time and again declared, as unquestionably they were required to declare, in view of the established proposition that the federal and state governments involve and exercise wholly and entirely separate and independent sovereignties, that the Congress has no power to control or regulate the exercise or administration of the state's power of police or its local internal affairs. Indeed, even in the matter of the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution, the general government may not interfere with the manner in which, by virtue of its police power, the state may elect to proceed. As is said by Presiding Justice Finch, in Re Volpi, 53 Cal. App. 229, 199 P. 1090:

> "The police power of the state, therefore, is paramount where it does not authorize what the national act prohibits, and through its inherent reserve power it has the right to legislate in such manner [referring to the ordinance in that case under attack]. The state may prohibit, but it may not authorize."

Again, it is said in the Volpi Case, citing Commonwealth v. Nickerson, 236 Mass. 281, 128 N. E. 273, 10 A. L. R. 1568:

> "Legislation by the states need not be identical with that of Congress. * * * The states need not denounce every act committed within their boundaries which is included within the inhibition of the Volstead Act, nor provide the same penalties therefor. It is conceivable that a state may forbid under penalty acts not prohibited by the act of Congress."

In People v. Pagni, 69 Cal. App. 94, 98, 99, 230 P. 1001, 1002, it is said:

> "The Wright Act is to be regarded as though it had been enacted by our Legislature without regard to or independently of any consideration of the Volstead Act, and it is, therefore, too clear for argument that its language and all its provisions are to be viewed and construed without reference to the source from which they were taken—in other words, construed as purely a state statute and not as having anything to do or any connection with the act of Congress whose penal provisions it has adopted. These propositions follow from the impregnable premise that there does not exist a relation of interdependence between the two sovereignties, the federal and the state, with respect to the matter of providing for the punishment of crime against their respective sovereignties, each in that particular being entirely independent of the other and capable, according to its own plan, of protecting its own sovereignty against transgressors of public law or of punishing those that may transgress it."

provisions of said act, since there is no interdependence between section 3 and the other sections thereof. In other words, the provision of section 3 is "subsidiary to the main purpose of the act and not essential to its validity. * * * It was not the controlling consideration prompting the enactment of the law." People v. Capelli, 55 Cal. App. 461, 467, 203 P. 837, 839.

The case which counsel seem to rely upon (In re Mingo, 190 Cal. 769, 214 P. 850) is not in point here.

There is no merit in the appeal from any viewpoint.

SPERANCO et al. v. BRYAN. (Civ. 6231.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 2, 1928.

1. Mortgages 🔑369(8)—Whether notice of sale under trust deed was posted in conspicuous place as required held question for court.

In action to set aside sale under a trust deed, whether notice of sale was posted in a conspicuous place on the premises sold as required, held for determination of the trial court in exercise of its judicial function.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence could not be disturbed on review, where supported by evidence.

Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence could not be disturbed on review, where there was evidence to support it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by Louis Speranco and others against Julia J. Bryan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Scott, of Oakland, for appellants.

J. W. O'Neill, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. [1, 2] Action to set aside a sale under a trust deed. The sole contention of plaintiffs at the trial was that the notice of sale under the trust deed was not posted in a conspicuous place upon the premises sold. The trial court, in substance, found that the notice was properly posted, and judgment went for defendant. Appellants contend that the proof of posting was too limited and does not sustain the finding for the reason that, at the particular place on the premises where the notice was posted, the land was elevated and covered with flowers and shrubbery. There is no merit in this claim. The evidence upon the subject was somewhat conflicting, but it is amply sufficient to support the finding. The question of whether or not the notice was posted in a conspicuous place is one upon which minds may differ, and it must be determined by the court in the exercise of its judicial function. Elder v. Frevert, 18 Nev. 278. Such determination cannot here be disturbed, where there is evidence to support it. There is no merit in the appeal.

CALL PUB. CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COM'N OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 6195.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 10, 1928.

Master and servant 🔑367—Agent employed to distribute papers was not independent contractor, making newsboy distributors his servants, within Compensation Act (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance & Safety Act of 1917).

Agent of newspaper, employed to distribute papers, receiving definite compensation for services in addition to profits and being subject to dismissal with or without cause, and being under direction of officers, was not an independent contractor, although given authority to hire and fire newsboys, and newsboy injured in course of employment was employee of newspaper within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, p. 831.

Certiorari to Review an Order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Allen Edgar Young, compensation claimant, opposed by the Call Publishing Company, the employer, and another. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation. Application of the employer for a rehearing was denied, and it brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

John Francis Neylan, John C. Costello, Frank J. Creede, and Henry G. Sanford, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. It appears from the petition: That on the 1st day of January, 1927, the State Compensation Fund insured petitioner, the Call Publishing Company, against liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended). That on the 25th day of May, 1927, Allen Edgar Young sustained an injury in a collision with an automobile while delivering newspapers in the city of San Mateo, resulting in a fracture of the left femur and a lacerated wound on the left ankle. That on the 30th day of June, through his guardian ad litem, Young filed an application for industrial benefits with respondent Industrial Accident Commission, wherein it was alleged that he sustained his injuries in the course of and arising out of his employment, while employed as a newspaper carrier by the respondent Call Publishing Company, and accordingly prayed that it be determined that the insurance carrier be held responsible for the benefits provided for under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The application came on for hearing before the commission, and on August 17, 1927, it made findings and award.

It determined: (1) That Young, who was 14 years of age, while employed as a newspaper carrier, on May 25, 1927, at San Mateo, by the Call Publishing Company, sustained injury occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment while delivering his papers, proximately resulting in a fracture of the left femur, and a lacerated wound of the left ankle. That at said time said employer's insurance carrier was State Compensation Insurance Fund, and both employer and employee were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831). (2) That F. W. McKnight was not the employer on said date. (3) That said injury caused temporary total disability from May 25, 1927, indefinitely, entitling the employee to $4.17 a week, based on minimum wages provided by said act. (4) That the employee is entitled to be reimbursed for his reasonable medical expense, to be determined subsequently by the filing of itemized bills in duplicate, if the parties are unable to adjust the same out of court. The award was entered accordingly. Petitioner herein asked for a rehearing upon the ground that the evidence did not justify the findings of facts and that the commission had acted in excess of its authority in making the findings and award. The application was denied, and this proceeding was thereafter instituted, and the same contention is here made.

It appeared at the hearing before the commission that the Call Publishing Company, at the time of the injuries sustained by the applicant, and for many years prior thereto, owned, published, and distributed a large metropolitan daily evening newspaper in San Francisco and in neighboring vicinities. In order to facilitate and expedite the distribution of its newspapers, and the collecting of subscriptions, the insured made and executed various contracts in different locations. About April 21, 1927, an oral contract was executed by the Call with one F. W. McKnight, under which the latter was given the agency for the distribution of the insured's newspapers in the district between Beresford and the city of South San Francisco. No salary agreement was arranged for at this time. McKnight was to receive his lists of customers from the Call, paying $1.85 per 100 for the papers, and for which he charged the subscribers 75 cents per month, the difference between the two figures representing the profit of McKnight under the contract. At this time all the expenses incurred by McKnight in the distribution of the papers and the collection of subscriptions were assumed and paid by him. The receipts for the first month being small, McKnight was given an allowance by the Call of $97 for said month, in order that he might receive some compensation out of his venture. The former agent of the route had employed four or five carriers, one of whom was the injured applicant herein, to assist in the distribution of the papers, and these assistants were retained by McKnight when he took over the agency. Under the arrangement as above set forth, there was little or no profit, and, as the result of a conference had between the parties some time between May 1st and 10th following, it was agreed that McKnight was to receive $22.50 a week from the Call, in addition to any profit that he might make on a sale of the papers. Some time in June, 1927, this amount was raised to $32.50. No definite period was agreed upon as to how long this arrangement was to continue, the sole requirement in this respect being that McKnight was to give the Call 30 days' notice of any intention on his part to discontinue with the arrangement. McKnight testified in this connection that the Call had the right to fire him at any time. Additional facts show: That all bills were made out by the Call upon its own stationery without cost to McKnight. That he was subject to the general direction in the performance of his duties by the city circulation manager of the Call. That, when extras were printed, McKnight was directed by an officer of the Call to put on more boys for street sales, so as to dispose of the papers. That all papers were to be delivered to the satisfaction of the customers, and it was McKnight's responsibility to see that this was done. The list of subscribers kept by McKnight was the property of the Call. It also appeared that McKnight paid all expenses under the different arrangements, and that he had the right to hire and fire the newsboys.

Under these facts petitioners claim that McKnight was an independent contractor in so far as the publishing company is concerned, and that the injured employee was his servant. There is no merit in the contention. The evidence shows conclusively that McKnight was a mere agent of the company, employed for the purpose of distributing its papers. He received a definite compensation for his services, in addition to any profit that might arise under the arrangement. He was subject to dismissal at any time with or without cause, and was under the direction of the officers of the company. True he had authority to hire and fire the newsboys, but they were employees of the publishing company and not his. An extended discussion of this case would answer no useful purpose. The facts speak for themselves. The principles applicable to cases of this character are well considered and discussed in Press Publishing Co., I. A. C., 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820.

The award is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NUNO. (Cr. 1577.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 2, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⚿1160—If trial court denies new trial on conflicting evidence, generally appellate courts will not interfere.

In criminal prosecution, generally appellate courts will not interfere with trial court's granting new trial on conflicting evidence.

2. Criminal law ⚿935(1)—Trial court, concluding evidence in criminal prosecution is insufficient to support verdict, has duty to grant new trial.

Trial court, concluding that evidence in criminal prosecution is insufficient to support verdict, has duty to grant new trial.

3. Criminal law ⚿1156(2)—Granting new trial for insufficient evidence will not be disturbed on appeal except for abuse of discretion.

In criminal prosecution, where trial court decides testimony is insufficient to support verdict, it has duty to grant new trial, and its action in so doing will not be reversed on appeal except on showing of abuse of discretion.

4. Criminal law ⚿1158(1)—That evidence would have supported conviction does not render granting new trial error.

In criminal prosecution, fact that evidence would have supported conviction if trial court had denied new trial does not render trial court's granting new trial error.

5. Homicide ⚿316—Granting new trial after conviction of manslaughter held not abuse of discretion under evidence.

After conviction of manslaughter, granting of new trial held not abuse of trial court's discretion under evidence indicating that defendant shot into ground to frighten deceased and that bullet glanced and struck him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward T. Bishop, Judge.

Matthew K. Nuno was convicted of manslaughter, and from an order granting a new trial, the People appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: PRESTON and LANGDON, JJ., voting for a transfer.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, and John D. Richer, Deputy Attys. Gen., and Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Leo Aggeler, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Defendant, a Japanese, was accused by information filed by the district attorney of the crime of murder and was convicted of manslaughter. He made a motion for a new trial, which was granted upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. From this order the district attorney has appealed.

The defendant was in charge of an orchard situated on Duarte road, Arcadia. He had been having trouble in protecting the orchard from numerous petty thieves. The deceased, Victoriano Sanchez, and two other Mexican youths entered defendant's orchard and began stealing plums. Defendant's attention was called to the three boys while they were in the orchard, but before he could reach them they left and went down the road a short distance and began eating part of the plums. Defendant drove up with his automobile accompanied by his wife and children. Sanchez was the largest of the Mexican boys and was considerably larger than the defendant. The testimony of the other two boys, Torres and Barrios, who testified for the people, differs from that of the defendant. They stated that after some conversation the defendant grabbed the arm of Sanchez, whereupon all three ran into an orange orchard. Defendant followed them a short distance and then went to the automobile and procured a gun. He then pursued them, firing four shots. At the time of the shooting several rows of trees were between the boys and defendant. Barrios testified that he did not see defendant point the gun. Torres testified that defendant pointed the gun at the boys, but was impeached by a showing that at the preliminary examination he had testified that he could not see the defendant above the waist. Defendant testified, in substance, that upon reaching the boys he asked their names and addresses, to which he received evasive answers; that when the boys laughed and refused to tell their names he took hold of the largest boy and held him by the arm; that he did this because he wanted to arrest him and get the police; that while he was holding the deceased he told his son, 9 years of age, to leave the automobile and go to the gasoline station near by and get the motor officer; that thereupon the deceased jerked away and all three boys ran into an orange orchard; that defendant ran after deceased and tried to catch him, but failing, went back to his car and got his gun; that his purpose was to catch the defendant and arrest him, and that he had taken his gun with him so that he could arrest the boys more easily; that when he procured the gun he ran back into the orange grove and shot it into the ground about five feet in front of him; that he did not point the gun at the boys nor in their direction, nor were they in sight when he shot; that he shot only to scare the boys so that they would not return to his orchard; that he was not angry and never intended to shoot any of the boys; that he did not know the deceased was injured until later in the day.

Dr. Frank R. Webb, the autopsy physician, testified that the bullet entered at a point about level with the right ear and at about four inches behind the ear; that at that place the skull is a thin-plated bone, thinner than the base of the skull; that the bullet after penetrating this portion of the skull did not hit any hard substance until it came to the place of exit on the left temple about one inch in front of the border line of the ear, where it lodged just beneath the skin; that the point of entrance was an elongated or an oval hole; that if the bullet had entered in a perfectly direct line one would expect to find a rounded opening rather than an elongated one. Edward C. Crossman, after qualifying as an expert on small firearms, testified that he obtained the gun from which the shot was fired from the custodian of criminal records on a court order for the purpose of making experiments; that he made various tests by shooting through bone at various distances for the purpose of determining if shooting a bullet through bone would cause it to be in the condition in which the bullet in question was found; that the bullet fired into the skull of Sanchez was a metal-cased bullet and the base and one side of the bullet were flattened and the nose of the bullet indented; that the bullet was scarred and scratched, all of which was shown by photographs; that all of the bullets which the witness had shot through bone of various thicknesses had a uniform flattened appearance at the point and the bases were perfectly round in every case; that in his opinion the bullet in question struck some object and glanced before it hit the skull of the deceased, the base of the bullet having been flattened badly on one side, which indicated to him that the bullet must have tumbled end over end; that in his opinion the bullet could not have been scarred and gouged as it was simply by being shot into a human skull in the way shown in the skull of deceased. There was some evidence that a sign had been placed against one of the plum trees bearing the words: "If you steal plums again I will shoot you." Defendant testified that he had instructed his son to make a sign to keep people from stealing plums, but that he did not tell the boy what to put on the sign and did not know what was written upon it.

[1] Appellant cites several cases in which verdicts of manslaughter were returned upon evidence showing that the defendants had accidentally discharged firearms and in which the judgments were upheld after the trial courts had denied motions for new trials. In appellant's brief this statement is found:

> "These cases, however, on facts not as strong as those in the case at bar, held that the evidence was sufficient to justify a verdict of manslaughter. It therefore must follow that if the evidence in the case at bar was sufficient to justify a verdict of manslaughter, then the trial court abused its discretion in granting a new trial."

[2-4] This is not a correct statement of the law. The cases are innumerable in which it is held that if the trial court denies a motion for a new trial upon conflicting evidence the appellate courts will not interfere with the ruling. The rule is entirely different, however, where the trial court after listening to the testimony concludes that the evidence is insufficient. In such cases it is the duty of the trial court to grant a new trial, and its action in so doing will not be reversed except upon a showing of an abuse of discretion. We are not merely to decide whether or not the judgment would have been upheld if the trial court had denied the motion for a new trial. The showing must be far stronger to justify a reversal in a case where the trial court in the exercise of its discretion has granted a new trial. In People v. Chew Wing Gow, 120 Cal. 298, 52 P. 657, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Temple, says:

> "It is claimed by the Attorney General that the judge in granting a new trial abused the discretion reposed in him by the law. It is made his duty to grant a new trial if in his opinion the verdict is against the evidence. This is one of the most important duties which the trial judge has to perform, and, since no efficient review of his action can be had, it is peculiarly incumbent upon the judge to weigh the evidence with care, and grant a new trial when, in his opinion, the interests of justice require it. In my opinion, there is no more prolific cause of the miscarriage of justice than the reluctance of trial judges to grant new trials in criminal cases. This court can review the evidence only so far as it is necessary to pass upon points of law raised; and, although there are cases in which it is assumed that this court will on appeal review such an order as that involved here, no case can be found in which an order granting a new trial in a criminal case for insufficiency of the evidence was reversed."

[5] It is manifest that the trial judge after hearing the evidence must have concluded that the testimony of the defendant, re-enforced by that of the expert witnesses, was worthy of credence. In granting the motion for a new trial he did not abuse the discretion reposed in him by law.

The order granting the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

MAHONEY v. NATIONAL SURETY CO.★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 9, 1928.

Rehearing Denied March 10, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 9, 1928.

1. Courts ⚷198—Jurisdiction of superior court sitting in probate can be exercised only after compliance with statute.

Jurisdiction of superior court sitting in probate is limited, and can be exercised only after compliance with statutory requirements.

2. Executors and administrators ⚷184—After widow had acknowledged to administrator receipt of insurance money, her waiver of claim of exemption of insurance money was ineffectual.

Attempted waiver by widow of claim of exemption of insurance money held ineffectual, where she had previously acknowledged to the administrator that she had received the insurance money.

3. Executors and administrators ⚷181—Superior court in probate held without jurisdiction to deny widow's application to set aside insurance as exempt property.

Superior court, sitting in probate, held without jurisdiction to deny application of widow, duly made and noticed, to set aside insurance money, which was exempt property.

4. Executors and administrators ⚷527(1)—Where exempted insurance policy was sole asset of estate, surety on administrator's bond held not liable for administrator's failure to pay claim for services.

Where widow's attempted waiver of claim of exemption of insurance policy, which was the sole asset of the estate, was ineffectual because she had acknowledged receipt of the money to the administrator, surety held not liable on administrator's bond for failure to pay claim for services, since there were no funds properly chargeable to the administrator out of which debt could have been paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by I. G. Mahoney against the National Surety Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Knight, Boland & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman, Nye, Surr & Spicer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. Jose J. Robledo died, leaving him surviving a widow, Irene Robledo, and for estate a policy of insurance amounting to $1,988.06. On November 12, 1920, Nathan C. Coghlan was appointed as administrator of his estate, and took the oath and gave bond, upon which the defendant National Surety Company was the surety. John Harloe was attorney for the administrator, and James M. Carroll was attorney for the widow. The check for the insurance money was turned over to Carroll for collection, for the reason, it appears, that he was depositor in a local bank, which was correspondent of the bank upon which the check was drawn. The money was never paid over to the administrator. It is stipulated that the insurance policy was the sole asset of the estate.

On the 2d day of February, 1921, the widow filed in the estate proceedings her petition asking that the insurance money be set aside to her as exempt property. The petition was set for hearing on February 18, 1921, at 10 o'clock a. m., and due notice of the hearing was given; the proofs filed in the estate proceeding being introduced in evidence at the trial of this action. No written opposition to the granting of the petition was filed in the proceeding at any time. On May 3, 1921, Coghlan filed an account, as and for his first and final account of his administration of the estate, crediting himself with the payment of $1,988.06 to Irene Robledo. The account was fixed and noticed for hearing on May 27, 1921. On May 17, 1921, Goldman, Nye, and Surr, attorneys, filed exceptions to the account setting out as the basis of their right to except that they had performed extraordinary services for the administrator, not specifying their character, which were of the reasonable value of $694.40, which the administrator had agreed to pay, and, further, as representing themselves and other named creditors of the estate, whose claims had been allowed and filed, aggregating the sum of $694.40.

On May 20, 1920, the widow filed, at whose instance does not appear, her waiver of claim of exemption of the insurance money. Her receipt for this money, of date February 18, 1921, was filed as a voucher accompanying the administrator's account.

There appears in the record in the estate proceedings an order reciting that the petition of Goldman, Nye, and Surr for the allowance of attorneys' fees "coming on duly for hearing upon due notice this 13th day of April, 1921," and that it appeared that they had performed services of great value to the administrator which were reasonably worth the sum of $694.40, and directed the administrator to pay the same forthwith. The order concludes, "Done in open court this 27th day of May, 1921," and is indorsed by the clerk, "Filed May 23, 1921."

The following entry appears in the minutes on the date May 27, 1921: "Application for settlement of account and petition to exempt insurance money denied." No appeal was taken from any of these orders. This is all the evidence introduced from the proceedings in the matter of the estate of Robledo.

Goldman, Nye, and Surr assigned their claim for extraordinary services to their stenographer, for collection, taking no action as to their allowed claim against the estate. Demand was made upon the administrator and his surety, the defendant here, payment was refused, and this action was brought upon the bond. The trial was before the court without a jury, and judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appealed; the record coming before this court on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The statement of the evidence which follows is from the oral testimony at the trial, most of it from plaintiff's witnesses, none of it denied by them.

Some part of the money received from the insurance policy, perhaps all of it, was paid over by Carroll to the widow, probably before the date fixed for the hearing of her petition. On February 18, 1921, the date fixed for its hearing, in the afternoon of that day, she signed a receipt to the administrator for the full amount, in the presence of her attorney, Carroll, and Harloe, attorney for the administrator, and delivered it to the latter. Shortly after 10 o'clock in the morning of that day, in the courtroom of the department in which the petition was noticed for hearing, Harloe, the administrator's attorney, called the attention of the judge presiding to the petition, stating that the administrator had no ground for opposition to it, whereupon the judge made the statement that the petition was "granted." Some 20 or 30 minutes thereafter, and after Harloe had left the courtroom, Goldman appeared, and upon inquiry was told by the court clerk that the petition had been granted. He then addressed the court, and stated that he wished to oppose the petition, and was told by the judge that, if he would notify the other parties, the court would postpone action until 2 o'clock in the afternoon. He did not notify them, and nothing further appears to have been done in the matter by the court, or any one else, until May 27th, upon the hearing of the administrator's account.

Goldman, Nye, and Surr performed no services, extraordinary or otherwise, for the administrator, and were at no time employed by him. Coghlan so testified, without objection, at the trial. Goldman and Nye, both of whom were witnesses for the plaintiff, made voluntary statements clearly indicating that they procured the allowance to cover their own, and other claims which they represented, against the estate.

The only evidence of compliance by the attorneys with the requirements of section 1616, Code of Civil Procedure, of a written application for allowance of their fees, and of notice of the application, is the recital in the order for its allowance and payment. Coghlan testified, again without objection, that no notice was given to him of any such application.

[1] While the jurisdiction of the superior court, sitting in probate, is limited, and can only be exercised after complying with the statutory requirements for its exercise, yet, when exercised within its probate powers, its findings and orders are probably not subject to collateral attack.

[2, 3] Having acknowledged to the administrator receipt of the insurance money, the widow was without authority thereafter to waive her claim, and the waiver was ineffectual. The order of the court denying the petition to set aside the insurance money was void. The requirement upon the court to set aside exempt property upon application of the widow, duly made and noticed, is mandatory, and the court is without jurisdiction to make an order denying it. Estate of Ballentine, 45 Cal. 696; County of Los Angeles v. State, 64 Cal. App., page 296, et seq., 222 P. 153.

The order apparently actually made by the court on February 18th was the only one which could be made.

[4] From the foregoing it follows that there were no funds properly chargeable to the administrator out of which to pay plaintiff, and that his surety is not liable.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to make findings and decision in accordance herewith, and to enter judgment for the defendant.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting testimony are conclusive, where record contains supporting evidence.

Where there is ample evidence in record to sustain trial court's findings on conflicting testimony, appellate court cannot disturb them.

2. Evidence ⚷584(3), 598(1)—Testimony of one witness is sufficient to establish fact, notwithstanding evidence of witness' bad reputation and contradictory testimony by several witnesses.

Testimony of one witness entitled to credit is sufficient to establish a fact in a civil case, even though contradicted by several witnesses and although there is evidence that reputation of the sole witness is bad.

3. Evidence ⚷314(1)—Defendant's testimony of instructions to agent and agent's report held hearsay and properly excluded on issue of tender of pasturage money.

In action involving question of whether defendant's agent tendered plaintiff money at a certain time for pasturage for defendant's horses and mules, defendant's testimony as to instructions given agent and testimony of agent's report held properly excluded as hearsay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action by Anna G. Leffingwell against Frank Faubion, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Craig, of Los Angeles, and J. F. Seymour, of Riverside, for appellant.

Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. A contract was entered into by plaintiff and defendant, whereby plaintiff agreed to furnish pasturage for certain horses and mules of the defendant at the rate of $2 a head per month. Five colts were to be pastured at the rate of $1 a head per month. Some of the animals were turned into plaintiff's pasture on November 6, 1921, and others on November 17, 1921. By the terms of the agreement, defendant was to remove his stock as soon as possible after the commencement of the rainy season. Plaintiff alleges that the stock was not removed until February 23, 1922. She asks judgment for $353.30 for pasturage and an additional sum of $500 claimed to be due on account of damages done to her premises by the presence of the stock during the rainy season. Defendant alleges that on December 21, 1921, he tendered to plaintiff the sum of $100 and offered to remove his stock. He claims that there was due at that time only the sum of $98.80. Defendant filed a cross-complaint, in which he claims that he has suffered damages in the sum of $777 occasioned by the conduct of plaintiff in not properly taking care of his stock. The trial court found that there was due plaintiff the sum of $342 for pasturage. The court found against plaintiff on her claim for alleged damages to her premises and against defendant on his claim for alleged damages to his stock. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he now appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

A sharp conflict is presented by the evidence on several points, the number of animals pastured, the amount due on December 21, 1921, the facts concerning the alleged tender of that date, and the date on which the stock was removed. On all these points the findings are in favor of plaintiff and are fully sustained by the evidence. Appellant states in his brief:

> "It is for the court to determine whether the animals were pastured until February 23, 1922, or whether they were pastured until January 15, 1922, with the exceptions noted, and, further, if there were 41 horses and 5 colts, as claimed by the plaintiff, or 36 horses and 5 colts, as claimed by the defendant. The only witness for the plaintiff as to the number of horses pastured, and the time of pasturage, was the plaintiff herself, while on the part of the defendant as to the number of horses pastured and the time of pasturage there was the testimony of the defendant and A. Frosseth, Leon D. Gates, Frank Goodall, and the stipulated testimony of Mr. Charlie Salisbury."

The record discloses this testimony by the plaintiff:

> "Q. How many horses, mules, and colts altogether were on your pasture? A. 46. Q. And those are the defendant's horses that you have testified with respect to? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long did the 46 animals remain on your pasture land? A. Until about the 23d of February. Q. What year? A. 1922. Q. When were they removed, if at all? A. It was in the night of February 23d."

On the subject of the alleged tender, plaintiff testified as follows:

> "Q. I will ask you then if it is not a matter of fact that some time later during that day that Mr. Salisbury returned to your home and offered you $100 in payment for the pasture? A. He came, but he didn't offer it to me, but he said this—he said, 'Frank won't come because somebody beat him up and he don't want to venture out, but he will pay you the first month on the 18 horses that were brought in there, and then you can fight it out with Frank for the balance, but he will pay you because he has to pay you.' Now he says, 'He can pay you that,' but he never offered me any money. I never saw any money, and this man was never in the house that I know of in my life; I don't know that he was, if he was he didn't go there as a witness with Charley Salisbury. He stayed out in the road if he was there."

[1, 2] The trial court found that defendant did not tender the sum of $100 on December 21, 1921, as claimed; that the sum due at that time was more than $100; that defendant did not then demand possession of his stock. The findings having been made upon conflicting testimony and there being in the record ample evidence to sustain the findings, the action of the trial court cannot be disturbed. Appellant lays stress upon the fact that plaintiff's testimony is not corroborated, while that of the defendant is corroborated by several witnesses. It is well settled that the testimony of one witness entitled to credit is sufficient to establish a fact in a civil case, even though it be contradicted by the testimony of a number of witnesses, and this notwithstanding the reputation of the sole witness was declared to be bad by several other witnesses. Manifestly the judge believed the testimony of the one witness in this case.

[3] Defendant contends that the trial court erred in refusing to allow him to prove his instructions to the agent whom he sent to make the alleged tender. The court sustained an objection to this testimony, as also to testimony concerning the report to defendant by the agent, on the ground that it was hearsay and not binding on the plaintiff. The court did allow, however, testimony showing that the money taken by the agent to the premises of plaintiff was in fact the property of defendant. The action of the court was not erroneous.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ST. CLAIR v. BRIX et al. (Civ. 6070.)★

Rehearing Denied March 7, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 5, 1928.

1. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑60(1)—Plaintiff's filing request and order for default judgment held not to render granting defendant's prior motion to dismiss for lack of prosecution error.

Filing of request and order for entry of default judgment, which was not entered, did not give plaintiff absolute right to default judgment so as to render granting defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of due prosecution, noticed prior to motion for default, error.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑80—On granting motion to dismiss for want of prosecution, refusing to thereafter pass on motion for default judgment held proper.

Where, when motion to dismiss for want of prosecution was noticed there was no motion for default pending, considering motion to dismiss first was proper, and, on dismissal of action which had been pending more than seven years without plaintiff's attempting to secure default, refusal to pass on plaintiff's motion for entry of default was not error.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑60(1)—Court, without legislation, has general discretionary power to dismiss for want of prosecution where no answer has been filed.

Court, independent of legislation, has general discretionary power to dismiss for want of prosecution, in action in which no answer has been filed.

4. Appeal and error 🔑948—Appellant from judgment of dismissal for want of prosecution has burden to establish affirmatively abuse of discretion.

Appellant from judgment dismissing action for want of prosecution has burden to establish affirmatively that dismissal was abuse of trial court's discretion.

5. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑73—In considering motion to dismiss for want of prosecution, trial court had right to consider all facts appearing in affidavits and record.

In passing on motion to dismiss case for want of prosecution, trial court had right to consider all facts appearing in affidavits and record, including fact that plaintiff's offer to extend defendant's time to answer had inception, at least in part, in desire to secure defendant's stipulation to certain facts, and that, while threatening default some seven years later, he was still attempting to secure stipulation in refence to taking of deposition.

6. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑73—In passing on motion to dismiss for want of prosecution, trial court can consider plaintiff should use due diligence to expedite case.

In passing on motion to dismiss for want of prosecution, trial court has right to consider duty rests on plaintiff at every stage of proceedings to use due diligence to expedite his case to final determination.

7. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑60(1)—Granting defendant's motion to dismiss action which had been pending over seven years held not abuse of discretion.

Where action had been pending over seven years, although plaintiff's attorney had offered to extend defendant's time to answer through desire to secure stipulation to certain facts, and although threatening default, some years later was still attempting to secure stipulation in reference to taking of deposition, dismissing case on defendant's motion for want of prosecution, filed prior to plaintiff's request for order for entry of default judgment was not abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by E. S. St. Clair against H. H. Brix. On the death of defendant, Emma M. Brix and others, administratrix and administrators with the will of H. H. Brix, deceased, annexed, were substituted as defendants. From a judgment of dismissal for want of prosecution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fenston, Williams & Hansen, Chester O. Hansen, and Ray W. Hays, all of Fresno, for respondents.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of dismissal for want of prosecution. This action, originally begun in Kern county, was by stipulation transferred to Fresno county, the original complaint being filed therein on May 5, 1915. Issue was joined on November 22, 1916, the case set for trial for April 26, 1917, and thereafter reset for December 4, 1917. By reason of the death of the original defendant, plaintiff was permitted to file and did file on November 26, 1917, an amended and supplemental complaint, substituting defendant's administrators as parties defendant and alleging due presentation and rejection of the claim upon which plaintiff's original cause of action was based. Defendants were granted ten days in which to answer.

On November 26, 1917, M. B. Harris of Fresno, then one of the attorneys of record for defendants, wrote Anderson and Borton of Bakersfield, attorneys for plaintiff, advising them that the court would not set the case for trial until it was at issue, and saying that he would therefore have to wait until the filing of defendants' answer before arranging for the trial. Anderson and Borton replied on November 27, 1917, suggesting the possibility of stipulating to certain facts, and concluding:

> "You might find it desirable, if we attempt to ascertain and stipulate these facts, to postpone answering the amended complaint until we have settled upon the stipulated facts. Should you see fit to do so, you can regard this letter as an indefinite extension of time to answer, while we are investigating the question of stipulation."

Mr. Harris answered on November 30, 1917:

> "I think we can probably stipulate to the matters suggested in your letter. As soon as I can, I will have these facts investigated, and will then write you definitely. Meantime, we will understand that my answer need not come in until we either stipulate or decide not to stipulate, it being understood of course, that this only means a reasonable delay on my part."

During the ensuing six years, plaintiff's prosecution of the cause consisted in his counsel writing four letters to Mr. Harris in reference to dates of trial and the filing of an answer. Replies were received to two of them.

On February 19, 1924, Mr. Borton wrote Mr. Harris in reference to taking the testimony of a certain witness and inclosing a stipulation to be signed by counsel. By letter dated February 25, 1924, Mr. Harris advised that Mr. Earl J. Fenstenmacher of Fresno was now defendants' attorney, though formal substitution had never been filed, and that Mr. Borton's letter and papers in the case had been turned over to him. Mr. Borton received no further letter from Mr. Harris. On December 4, 1924, Mr. Borton went to Fresno, called at Mr. Fenstenmacher's office, and, finding he was absent from the city that day, left word with his clerk that defendants had been in default for seven years, and that he desired a stipulation for the taking of a deposition. Having received no word from Mr. Fenstenmacher, Mr. Borton, under date of December 11, 1924, wrote him reminding him on his visit and asked him to file his answer and sign the stipulation. On the same date Mr. Borton wrote Mr. Harris, saying he had in mind to take a default if Mr. Fenstenmacher did not answer, but that he hesitated to do so in a case where Mr. Harris was attorney of record without giving full and sufficient notice. He asked Mr. Harris to urge Mr. Fenstenmacher to file an answer and sign the stipulation.

On December 15, 1924, Mr. Borton received a letter from Mr. Fenstenmacher in reply to his of December 11th. In it Mr. Fenstenmacher said:

> "We are now looking into the matter and will again communicate with you in regard to the same, within the next few days."

When Mr. Borton next heard from Mr. Fenstenmacher it was on January 9, 1925, when he received notice of motion to dismiss for want of prosecution. The same day the court made its order granting defendants time to appear.

Thereafter, and on January 14th, plaintiff's attorneys delivered to the clerk for filing a request and order for the entry of defendants' default. The clerk filed this request on January 20th, but did not enter the default. Subsequently plaintiff moved the court to enter the default of the defendants and for judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendants. This motion was argued and submitted at the same time defendants' motion to dismiss was presented, to wit, on January 23d. On January 17th the court extended defendants' time to appear, and on February 5th and February 14th, respectively, the court made orders granting defendants ten days' additional time in which to file their answer. No answer, however, was ever filed, and on March 18, 1925, the court made the following order:

> "Defendants' motion for an order of court dismissing the above-entitled action having been heretofore argued herein, and submitted to the court for its decision, and by the court taken under advisement; and the court, now being fully advised in the premises, renders its decision, wherein it is ordered that said motion be and it is hereby granted, and said action is hereby dismissed."

The court did not otherwise pass upon plaintiff's motion for default, and a judgment of dismissal was entered, from which plaintiff appeals.

Appellant contends (1) that he had an absolute right to the entry of a default on January 14th, when the request for default was handed to the clerk; (2) assigns as error the court's action in "denying the motion of plaintiff to enter the default of defendants"; and (3) complains that the making of the order of dismissal constituted an abuse of discretion.

[1] In view of the rule laid down in Grigsby v. Napa County, 36 Cal. 585, at p. 589, 95 Am. Dec. 213, the matter of plaintiff's absolute right to the entry of a default by the clerk is immaterial. In that case defendant noticed its motion to dismiss for want of due diligence the day before summons was served. Before the motion was heard, plaintiff caused the default of the defendant to be regularly entered. At the time defendant's motion was presented, plaintiff offered to prove damages and moved for final judgment. The court nevertheless granted the motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court, in upholding the trial court's action, held:

> "The order dismissing the cause took effect by relation from the time when the notice of the motion was served. * * * The mere noting of the default did not, in law, preclude the court from entertaining the motion to dismiss."

[2] This case also appears to effectually dispose of appellant's second point, namely, that the trial court erred in denying, or rather in refusing to pass upon, plaintiff's motion for entry of default.

To the same general effect is the case of Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, at p. 220, 138 P. 1002, 1004:

> "The situation existing at the time the motion" (to dismiss for want of diligence in prosecution) "was noticed is that which controls its determination."

It is to be borne in mind that from November 26, 1917, the date of the filing of plaintiff's amended complaint, until January 14, 1925 (five days after the filing of defendants' motion to dismiss), a period of more than seven years, plaintiff made no attempt to secure a default. Such was the situation existing when the motion to dismiss was noticed. There being no motion for a default pending at the time the motion to dismiss was noticed, the trial court very properly first considered defendants' motion. Having seen fit to dismiss the action, the application for default fell.

The remaining question is whether or not the trial court, in view of the circumstances as they existed at the time the motion to dismiss was noticed, was guilty of an abuse of discretion in granting such motion.

[3] It is agreed by counsel, and indeed is well settled law, that in the court, independent of legislation, is vested general discretionary power to dismiss for want of prosecution in actions in which no answer has been filed. Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, 138 P. 1002; Overaa v. Keeney, 169 Cal. 628, 147 P. 466.

[4] It is also well settled that it is incumbent upon the appellant to establish affirmatively that there has been an abuse of discretion. Grigsby v. Napa County, supra.

[5] In the exercise of its discretion the trial court had a right to, and presumably did, take into consideration all the facts appearing in the affidavits and the record (People's Home Savings Bank v. Sherman, 150 Cal. 793, at p. 796, 90 P. 133), including the fact that plaintiff's courteous offer to extend defendants' time to answer had its inception, at least in part, in a desire to secure defendants' stipulation to certain facts, and that, while threatening a default some seven years later, he was still attempting to secure a stipulation—this time in reference to the taking of a deposition. From this it would appear that at no time was plaintiff prepared for immediate trial. A letter from plaintiff's counsel, bearing date March 20, 1923, written after a period of inaction of almost two and a half years, may also have been considered significant: "My client spoke to me recently and said that he was prepared to try the case now."

While it may seem harsh that a plaintiff who has refrained from taking a default for a long period of time is ultimately in effect himself defaulted, the complete answer under the rule last above stated is that his predicament is due entirely to his own lack of diligence rather than to defendants' neglect.

Had plaintiff's interests demanded, or had his attorneys earnestly desired an early trial, it was easily within their power, during at least the first year or two of defendants' default, to secure either a trial on the merits or to obtain a justifiable default. By written notice to the effect that a default would have to be taken unless an answer was filed within a stipulated time, plaintiff would have complied both with the rule of due diligence and the requirements of legal ethics.

[7] In the light of the foregoing discussion and the rule that an "enactment to prevent unlimited postponement of trials is to an extent one of public policy as well as of private concern to litigants" (City of L. A. v. Sup. Ct., 185 Cal., at p. 405, 197 P. 79), we believe the court in no wise abused its discretion in granting the motion to dismiss.

GOTTSTEIN v. HOLMES. (Civ. 5505.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 9, 1928.

1. Taxation 🔑788(4)—Deed to state is conclusive evidence of regularity of auditor's extension of tax (Pol. Code, § 3787).

Extension of tax on real property by auditor is no part of assessment, and deed to state is conclusive evidence of regularity, under Pol. Code, § 3787.

2. Taxation 🔑428—Fraction which auditor must drop in extending tax is one resulting from multiplication of assessed value by tax rate (Pol. Code, § 3731).

The fraction which Pol. Code, § 3731, requires auditor to drop in extending tax is one resulting from multiplication of assessed value of property by tax rate.

3. Taxation 🔑621—Charge of 50 cents against each of lots separately assessed by tax collector in sale of property held not excessive (Pol. Code, § 3770).

Where lots were separately assessed, charge of 50 cents against each lot by tax collector in sale of property held not excessive, since Pol. Code, § 3770, requires tax collector to collect such amount on each lot of land separately assessed.

4. Taxation 🔑788(5)—After issuance of tax deed, it is conclusively presumed that collector stamped words, "Sold to the state," on tax statements (Pol. Code, § 3787).

After issuance of tax deed, it is conclusively presumed, under Pol. Code, § 3787, that collector stamped on tax statements issued by him subsequent to sale words, "Sold to the state," with date of sale.

5. Taxation 🔑734(9)—Contention that there was no showing of notice by mail of tax sale to person to whom property was last assessed held not to show invalidity of sale (Pol. Code, §§ 3785b, 3787).

Contention that there was no showing of notice by mail of tax sale to person to whom property was last assessed held not to show invalidity of sale, since provisions of Pol. Code, § 3787, are, by section 3785b, made applicable to deeds executed by tax collector conveying land sold to state to purchasers after 5-year period of redemption.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action in partition and to quiet title by John Gottstein against Nellie K. Holmes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph S. Campbell, of San Diego, for appellant.

Herbert C. Kelly, of San Diego, for respondent.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff became the purchaser of two lots in the city of San Diego, in 1923, at a sale by the tax collector of San Diego county of property sold to the state for delinquent taxes. This action was commenced in partition of the lots between plaintiff and his grantees of an undivided interest, and, incidentally, to quiet the title as to the defendant appealing, and other persons. Appellant, Holmes, answered, asserting title in herself with a cross-complaint to quiet title. At the conclusion of the trial interlocutory judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and the cross-defendants, from which defendant, Holmes, appeals.

The grounds presented by appellant in support of her contention for reversal of the judgment are errors in the assessment and other proceedings, which, it is claimed, invalidated the sale to the state and the sale to plaintiff, and title in herself by prescription.

The sale to the state was for the delinquent taxes of 1917. The assessment roll for that year was introduced in evidence by defendant appellant. This showed that the lots were assessed separately to the same owner, but the auditor extended the tax on the sum of their assessed valuations, the total tax being $1.59. This total he divided into two parts, one of 80 cents, the other of 79 cents, and entered them in the several columns as first and second installments of the tax, respectively. It is the contention of appellant that this invalidated the assessment, and therefore made void the deed to the state. This contention cannot be sustained.

[1, 2] In the first place, the extension of the tax by the auditor is no part of the assessment of the property, and, assuming that it was improperly done, it is one of the proceedings, of the regularity of which section 3787 of the Political Code provides that the deed to the state shall be conclusive evidence. But the fraction which section 3731 of the Political Code requires the auditor to drop is one resulting from the multiplication of the assessed value of the property by the tax rate. In this case there was no such fraction resulting.

[3] It is also claimed by the appellant that the charge of 50 cents against each of the lots assessed, by the tax collector in his sale of the property, was excessive. The lots were, however, separately assessed, and section 3770 of the Political Code requires the tax collector to collect "fifty cents on each lot, piece, or tract of land separately assessed."

The items above mentioned appear upon the delinquent assessment roll, and it is the contention of appellant that the sale was void because for an amount in excess of that authorized by law. As we have seen, the amounts were in exact conformity with the law.

[4] It is also contended by appellant that the failure of the collector to stamp on the tax statements issued by him subsequent to the sale in 1917 the words, "Sold to the state," with the date of the sale, invalidated the sale. This, however, is one of the things which, after the issuance of the tax deed, is conclusively presumed to have been done, under the provisions of section 3787, Political Code. Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234, 90 P. 936.

[5] The provisions of section 3787 are, by section 3785b, expressly made applicable to deeds executed by the tax collector conveying lands sold to the state to purchasers after the 5-year period of redemption. This disposes of appellant's contention that there was no showing of notice by mail, of the sale, to the person to whom the property was last assessed.

The final contention of appellant that she had acquired title as against the owners of the tax title, by adverse possession, requires no refutation. The statement of it is sufficient.

NORTON et al. v. BEDELL ENGINEERING CO. et al. (Civ. 3390.)★

Rehearing Denied March 3, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 2, 1928.

1. Mechanics' liens 🔑5—Statutory procedure to establish and foreclose mechanic's lien must be substantially complied with (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, remedy for securing payment of claim through mechanic's lien is statutory, and procedure required by statute must be substantially complied with.

2. Mechanics' liens 🔑271(15)—Mechanics' lien foreclosure complaint held defective for failure to show that claim specified kinds of material and labor (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, complaint seeking to establish and foreclose mechanic's lien, whose allegations as to notice of mechanic's lien did not state specifically kind of materials and labor furnished, was defective on objection to introduction of evidence.

3. Mechanics' liens 🔑271(15)—Proposed amendment to complaint held not to supply allegations showing that lien claim specified the nature of the work and materials (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, where complaint, seeking to establish and foreclose mechanic's lien, did not allege notice of mechanic's lien specifically stated materials and labor furnished, proposed amendment, merely alleging that plaintiffs furnished to defendants labor and materials actually used in construction of building, did not remedy complaint in that respect so as to make evidence admissible thereunder.

4. Pleading 🔑428(4)—Failure to demur to complaint seeking to foreclose mechanic's lien held not to waive right to object to introduction of evidence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 434, 1187).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, failure to demur to complaint in proceeding to foreclose mechanic's lien, which was insufficient under section 1187, did not waive right to object to introduction of evidence.

5. Mechanics' liens 🔑271(15)—Complaint, based on claim of mechanic's lien setting out neither copy of notice of lien nor allegations of material statements contained therein, fails to state cause of action for foreclosure of lien (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Complaint, based on claim of mechanic's lien, which sets out neither copy of notice of lien required by law nor allegations of material statements therein contained, required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, fails to state cause of action for foreclosure of lien.

6. Mechanics' liens 🔑139(1)—Statute held not to excuse omission to state materials furnished or work performed in notice of mechanic's lien (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1187, 1203).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1203, is intended to relieve mechanic's lien claimant against error or mistake occurring in figures or facts in notice of lien, but it does not purport to relieve one from absolute omission for materials furnished or work performed in notice of lien required by section 1187, and in complaint.

7. Mechanics' liens 🔑134—Unless claimant files notice containing statutory statements, he is not entitled to mechanic's lien (Code Civ. Proc. § 1187).

Unless claimant filed his notice containing statements required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, he is not entitled to mechanic's lien.

Suit by Thomas and Walter Norton, doing business as Norton & Norton, against the Bedell Engineering Company and others, in which Frank G. Raichle and G. W. ★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

appellants in support of their claim for a mechanic's lien. The objection was sustained on the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien.

The complaint was originally filed against the Bedell Engineering Company and a number of fictitious defendants. The defendant corporation suffered default. Frank G. Raichle and G. W. Dulany, Jr., were substituted at the trial as parties defendant, and filed separate answers specifically denying all the material allegations of the complaint. The complaint alleged that the "above-named defendants * * * (were) owners of * * * lots 46, 47, 48 and 49, tract No. 4685, of Los Angeles"; that between December 13, 1922, and February 27, 1923, plaintiffs supplied defendants with labor and materials pursuant to contract, of the value of $1,990, no part of which has been paid; that said work consisted of installing electric fixtures in defendants' building on said premises. The only allegations in the complaint with reference to the notice of lien required by law to be filed, are found in paragraph 5 as follows:

> "That thereafter, to wit, on April 11, 1923, and within 30 days after the filing of notice of completion of said structure on said building upon which said labor and fixtures were furnished, and within the time provided by law, plaintiffs caused to be filed in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, California, in book 2048, page 186, of official records of said county, a mechanic's lien for said labor and material. and that said lien has not been released or satisfied in any way."

The complaint failed to specify any of the material statements which may have been contained in this notice of lien, as required by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

At the trial it was conceded by appellants that their contract for labor and materials was not made with these respondents, but was made solely with the defendant corporation Bedell Engineering Company. The question of the liability under this contract, in the cause of action based upon assumpsit, is not involved on this appeal. Appellants' counsel, Mr. Stone, announced in court: "We do not care to proceed on anything except the foreclosure of our lien." When appellants' first witness was called, these respondents objected to the introduction of any evidence in proof of the alleged mechanic's lien upon the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for a mechanic's lien, for the reason that it omitted to allege any of the material facts required to be stated in the notice of lien under the provision of section 1187, supra.

Thereupon the appellants asked leave to amend their complaint by adding to paragraph 5, above quoted, the following language:

> "That said mechanic's lien claim set forth that plaintiffs actually furnished to the defendants the labor and material actually used in the construction of said building, and that said labor was actually done and performed, that said material was actually furnished, and actually entered into the erection and construction of said building so described."

And further:

> "That the said lien set forth the names of the owners as the defendants in this action. That it further set forth that said owners contracted for said labor and materials, and caused said structure to be erected. That it further set forth the date the said labor and material was furnished. That it further set forth the terms, time given, and conditions of said contract for said labor and the payment therefor. That it further set forth that said contract had been fully performed on the part of the claimants, plaintiffs in this action. That it further set forth the date on which the said material and labor was delivered and rendered, and when they ceased to furnish the same. That it further set forth the date of the completion of said building. That it further set forth the exact amount due after allowing all offsets and credits. That it further set forth the fact that the plaintiffs claim the benefit of the law of the state of California relative to liens, mechanic's and laborers upon real property. And further that the claim is duly verified."

To this application to amend the court said:

> "Your proposed amendment is still defective. * * * You can't amend the complaint to state anything more than the lien shows."

To which the appellants' attorney replied:

> "I have dictated the complaint as it is in the lien; the lien does not state the kind of labor or materials—I concede that. * * *"

Whereupon the court denied appellants' application to amend, in the following language:

> "I think this (complaint) * * * is still defective as a lien, therefore I deny you leave * * * to amend."

Subsequently, findings and a judgment were duly filed and entered in the cause in favor of the respondents and against appellants denying the validity of the alleged mechanic's lien.

[1-3] Conceding, for the purpose of this appeal, that the complaint included the statements heretofore quoted which appellants offered by way of amendment, still it is fatally defective with respect to several material allegations which are necessary in order to state a cause of action based upon a claim of mechanic's lien. The remedy for securing the payment of a claim by means of a mechanic's lien is statutory, and the procedure provided by law must be substantially complied with. 17 Cal. Jur. 16, § 6. Section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a claimant furnishing labor or materials for any work, improvement, or structure, in order to secure the benefit of the statutory lien, must, within 60 days after the completion of the contract, file with the recorder of the county in which the property is situated a verified claim, setting forth, among other things:

> "* * * A statement of his demand after deducting all just credits and offsets, the name of the owner or reputed owner, if known, a general statement of the kind of work done or materials furnished by him, or both, the name of the person by whom he was employed or to whom he furnished the materials, and a description of the property sought to be charged with the lien sufficient for identification. * * *"

It will be observed that the original complaint failed to allege any of the foregoing necessary statements required by the statute. Nor does the proposed amendment supply these deficiencies. There was no pretense of alleging the kind of work done, or materials furnished. In fact, appellants' counsel frankly admitted:

> "The lien does not state the kind of labor nor materials (furnished), I admit that."

All that the proposed amendment does state with respect to the nature of the labor or materials furnished, is that "plaintiffs * * * furnished to the defendants the labor and material actually used in the construction of the building." There is no intimation of the nature of either the labor or materials furnished. It cannot be ascertained from the allegations of the complaint, as to the contents of the notice of lien, whether compensation is sought for lumber, hardware, paint, plaster, or brick, nor whether the labor performed was that of a carpenter, plumber, painter, or brick mason. This is a fatal defect, without the allegations of which the complaint failed to state a cause of action upon a mechanic's lien. Even if the notice of lien were offered in evidence, it would be insufficient upon which to base an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Upon appellants' own admission as to this defect in their notice of lien, they would necessarily fail on the merits of their cause. Nor does the proposed amendment contain a statement of any of the other material averments required by the statute. It is a recitation of mere conclusions. No definite facts are stated. The amendment, therefore, fails to remedy the defects of the original complaint with respect to the contents of the notice of lien.

[4, 5] The respondents did not waive their right to object to the introduction of evidence by their failure to demur to the complaint. "This objection that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is not waived by failure to demur, and may be taken at any stage of the case." Section 434, Code Civ. Proc.; Bell v. Thompson, 147 Cal. 694, 82 P. 327. A complaint based upon a claim of a mechanic's lien, which sets out neither a copy of the notice of lien required by law, nor allegations of material statements therein contained, which are required to be stated by the provisions of section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, utterly fails to state a cause of action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien. 19 Standard Enc. of Proc. 672d; Hicks v. Murray, 43 Cal. 515; Davis v. Treacy, 8 Cal. App. 395, 97 P. 78; 17 Cal. Jur. 187, § 132. In Hicks v. Murray, supra, Chief Justice Wallace, writing the opinion, says:

> "It is true that we can see that the statement itself is not defective in the particular of ownership—but this will not aid the pleading upon the point. * * * It has so often been determined that unless the facts essential to the support of the case be alleged upon the record [in the pleadings] evidence upon such omitted facts cannot be heard or considered."

In the case of Davis v. Treacy, supra, which is quite similar in its facts to the instant case, and wherein a general demurrer was sustained upon the ground that the complaint failed to state essential facts required to be recited in the notice of lien, the court said:

> "There is absolutely nothing in the complaint to show what plaintiff's claim or 'lien,' as he styles it, filed with the county recorder, contained. * * * The complaint in this respect utterly fails to show a compliance with the provisions of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and for this reason fails to set forth a cause of action for the foreclosure of a mechanics' or laborers' lien."

Appellants contend that it is unnecessary for the notice of lien or complaint to state the kind of work done or materials furnished, and in support of this assertion they rely upon the case of McClain v. Hutton, 131 Cal. 132, 61 P. 273, 63 P. 182, 622. But this case is not authority upon that proposition, for the reason that it was decided in 1900 and section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, was amended in 1919 to specifically require this particular statement to be made.

[6] Nor does section 1203, Code of Civil Procedure, relieve a claimant from the necessity of complying with the requirements of section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure. The former section above mentioned provides that:

> "No mistake or errors in the statement of the demand, or of the amount of credits and offsets allowed or of the balance asserted to be due to claimant, nor in the description of the property against which the claim is filed, shall invalidate the lien."

[7] This section of the Code is intended to relieve a claimant against error or mistake occurring in the figures or facts recited in the notice of lien, but it does not purport to relieve one from an absolute omission to state such facts. Such a construction would have the effect of abrogating the requirements of section 1187 entirely. Clearly, this was not the intention of the Legislature. Evidently the saving clause of section 1203 was to relieve one from the unimportant errors occurring with respect to an effort to specify the exact balance due to the claimant, or the amount of credits to be allowed, or inaccuracy in the description of the property sought to be charged with the lien. This section of the statute does not relieve the claimant from stating those matters which are made essential to the statement of the claim, 17 Cal. Jur. 146; Schultheiss v. Hunziker, 42 Cal. App. 73, 183 P. 347. Unless the claimant has filed his notice containing the statements required by statute, he is not entitled to a lien. 17 Cal. Jur. 127, §§ 82-84; Santa Monica L. & M. Co. v. Hege, 119 Cal. 376, 51 P. 555; Wagner v. Hansen, 103 Cal. 104, 37 P. 195; Hogan v. Bigler, 8 Cal. App. 71, 96 P. 97. In the instant case, it is not mere error which is complained of in the statement of the kind of work performed, or materials furnished, but there is an absolute omission to specify this essential information in both the notice of lien and the complaint. Under such circumstances, section 1203, Code of Civil Procedure, furnishes no relief. For this reason the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. ROSS. (Cr. 1398.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 9, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⟹1159(5)—Where testimony regarding alibi was conflicting, jury's verdict was controlling on appeal.

In rape prosecution, where substantial conflict existed between testimony of witnesses whose identification of accused and of machine he was operating was positive and testimony given by accused's witnesses in support of his alibi, verdict of jury must be held controlling on appeal.

2. Criminal law ⟹1159(2)—Jury's finding in criminal case will not be disturbed on appeal unless it is without evidentiary support as matter of law.

Jurisdiction of appellate court in criminal case is limited by Constitution to review of questions of law alone, and, although testimony given in case will be carefully examined for purpose of ascertaining whether it is legally sufficient to sustain verdict rendered, jury's finding will not be disturbed unless it can be said, as matter of law, that same is without evidentiary support.

3. Criminal law ⟹1159(4)—Appellate court cannot pass on credibility of witnesses or determine weight of testimony.

Where two reasonable inferences are deducible from evidence, one looking to defendant's guilt and the other to his innocence, jury's verdict is conclusive on appeal, since appellate court has no power to pass on credibility of witnesses or to determine weight to be accorded their testimony.

4. Criminal law ⟹824(3)—Failure to instruct regarding assault with intent to commit rape in rape prosecution held not error, in absence of request.

In rape prosecution, where defendant neither proposed nor requested giving of instruction relating to assault with intent to commit rape and jury was fully and fairly charged on law appertaining to all issues of fact which were contested, failure to instruct on lesser crime was not error, in absence of request.

5. Criminal law ⟹763, 764(1)—Court's stating there was no serious denial that rape was committed held not error, where evidence proved crime and defense was alibi.

In rape prosecution, court's stating to jury that there was no serious denial that rape was committed by some one, and that it would not dwell on subjects of resistance, force, or violence, held not error, where evidence proved commission of crime and defense was an alibi.

6. Criminal law ⟹775(6)—Instruction regarding alibi, containing statement that jury should scrutinize evidence with care, held not erroneous.

In rape prosecution, instruction that jury might consider evidence upon alibi in case with care and should scrutinize evidence with care held not erroneous because of statement regarding scrutinizing evidence with care.

7. Criminal law ⟹823(6)—Instruction that defense of defendant was an alibi held not misleading because of word "defense," in view of other instructions.

In rape prosecution, instruction that defense of defendant was an alibi and that jury might consider evidence upon alibi in case with care and should scrutinize evidence with care, etc., held not misleading because of use of word "defense," in view of other instructions on burden of proof, reasonable doubt, and presumption of innocence.

8. Criminal law ⟹811(4)—Instruction regarding alibi held not objectionable as stressing facts adduced by prosecution in opposition to alibi.

In rape prosecution, instruction regarding alibi held not objectionable as stressing facts adduced by prosecution in opposition to alibi, but mentioning none proved by defendant in support of alibi, where in same instruction court stated that it was not attempting to repeat all testimony bearing on subject of alibi, and that it was jury's duty to consider all evidence, and especially where defendant did not request instruction embodying facts upon which he relied in support of alibi.

9. Criminal law 🔑911—Motion for new trial is addressed to trial court's discretion, exercise of which includes power to determine truth of matters on which motion is based.

Motion for new trial is addressed to sound discretion of trial court, the exercise of which includes power to determine truth of matters on which such motion is based.

10. Criminal law 🔑1156(1)—Trial court's decision on motion for new trial will not be disturbed on appeal unless there has been clear abuse of discretion.

Motion for new trial is addressed to sound discretion of trial court, exercise of which includes power to determine truth of matters on which such motion is based, and its decision thereon will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears that there has been a clear and unmistakable abuse in exercise of such discretion.

11. Criminal law 🔑940—New rape trial based on affidavit of witness seeking to correct testimony regarding milk tags delivered with milk to store at time defendant, relying on alibi, claimed to be there held properly denied, where witness did not remember to whom milk was delivered.

In rape prosecution, where defense was that defendant was in charge of store at time of alleged offense, motion for new trial based on affidavit of witness seeking to correct testimony given at trial to effect that he had not written memorandum reading "12 to 12:30" on milk tag which was delivered to store with milk on day of commission of offense held properly denied, since such question was unimportant where witness was unable to remember to whom milk was delivered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

J. E. Ross was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan Merenbach, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. Appellant was found guilty of the crime of rape, and has appealed from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial. His defense was that he was not present at the time or place of the alleged crime, and on this appeal he contends that the testimony offered in support of his alibi, when considered with other circumstances shown by the evidence, proves that he is the victim of mistaken identity, and that, therefore, the verdict is contrary to the evidence.

It appears from the record that the crime was committed upon a young married woman named Di Fiori in her home on a small ranch just outside the city of San Jose, where she lived with her husband and infant child. On the day in question, October 18, 1926, she had been left alone with her baby while her husband went to San Jose to repair his automobile. About 10 minutes past noon a strange man called and inquired for her husband, stating that he was a salesman from Cuthbert's garage and wanted to interest him in the purchase of an automobile. The prosecutrix told him that her husband was in San Jose at Drake's garage, but was expected home soon for lunch. The man said he would return later and started to leave. Believing he had gone, she went into the bedroom to feed her baby. As she picked up the child, she heard the outside screen door open and some one walk into the house. She jumped up hurriedly and had proceeded as far as the foot of the bed when this same man suddenly appeared at the bedroom door armed with a pistol which he pointed at her and said:

> "Don't scream or I will shoot you. You know what happened to those other women will happen to you if you make any objections to what I am going to do."

In explanation of the foregoing threat it may be stated, as suggested in appellant's brief, that there was a manifestation of excitement and fear in certain parts of the state at this particular time on account of several women having been ravished and brutally murdered in their homes by an unknown criminal. Having these crimes in mind and being terrified by the man's threat, the prosecutrix made no outcry. Thereupon he forced her backward onto the bed and while pressing the pistol against her perpetrated the crime charged. As he left the room he threatened to "come and get" the prosecutrix if he saw "anything in the papers or anything like that." The prosecutrix followed him out of the house on to the porch for the purpose of ascertaining the number of the license plate on his automobile which he had parked in the yard, but upon observing her the man turned and pointing the pistol at her exclaimed, "Go back in the house or I will shoot you," whereupon she stepped back behind the screen door. Just then her husband drove up in an automobile and stopped on the highway at the entrance to their property to look into the mail box, and while he was doing so this man drove out of the property close to and waved his hand at him. As Di Fiori then drove toward the house he saw that his wife was much excited and crying, and she told him what had happened. Di Fiori quickly turned his machine around and took up the pursuit of the man, chasing him down the highway into San Jose, where the man followed a circuitous route for some distance and finally disappeared. During the chase down the highway and soon after leaving the scene of the crime the two machines were driven past two road employees of the county who were sitting on the side of the highway eating their lunch. The attention of these men was especially attracted to the first machine on account of the excessive rate of speed it was traveling, one remarking to the other, "That guy is coming like somebody was after him;" and for that reason, as they afterwards testified, they carefully observed the driver of the car and his machine, noting, among other things, that the machine bore no rear license plate. They also recognized Di Fiori, with whom they were acquainted, as he followed closely behind the first car. The prosecutrix definitely fixed the time of the commission of the crime at 10 minutes past 12, having looked at the clock just before she entered the bedroom to feed her baby, and her testimony as to the time was corroborated by that of her husband and of the county employees. The man was described by the witnesses as having worn a dark suit of clothes and a gray hat, and the machine as being a Ford coupé with white wire wheels. The husband also noted when the car passed closely by him at the entrance to his home that the rear license plate was missing, and that one of the rear tires was of the make known as a "Royal Cord." Full descriptions of the perpetrator of the crime and of his automobile were furnished the sheriff's office soon after the man disappeared on the streets of San Jose.

The day following the attack appellant was apprehended in a small grocery store in San Jose owned by appellant's mother-in-law and which appellant and his wife helped to operate, and was positively identified by the prosecutrix and her husband as being the perpetrator of the crime. They were equally positive in their identification of him at the trial. They also identified an automobile belonging to appellant's wife as being the one he was using at the time. It was a Ford coupé equipped with white wire wheels, the rear license plate was missing, and one of the rear wheels was mounted with a "Royal Cord" tire; and appellant admitted when arrested and also at the trial that he used this car in going to lunch about 11 o'clock in the morning, on the day the crime was committed. Moreover, appellant admitted that he owned a dark suit of clothes and a gray hat, the only discrepancy in the description of the clothing being that his suit was made of blue serge material, whereas the prosecutrix described the suit this man was wearing as being dark with a fine white stripe, but owing to the feeling of terror with which the prosecutrix was seized at the time of the attack, it is not strange that she was mistaken as to a minute description of her assailant's clothing. Soon after his arrest appellant denied ever having owned a pistol, but when told of a statement made by his mother-in-law to the effect that he had owned such a weapon, claimed that some time prior to the date of the crime he had given the pistol to a friend in Oakland. The two county employees also positively identified appellant as being the man who was being pursued down the highway, and they likewise identified his wife's automobile as being the car appellant was at that time driving.

With reference to appellant's alibi he testified that on the day in question he was in charge of the grocery store until about 11 o'clock in the morning, when he was relieved from duty by his wife so that he might go to lunch at the home of his mother-in-law, which the evidence shows, was located not far from the store, but about three miles distant from the home of the prosecutrix; that he drove to his mother-in-law's home in his wife's coupé and after washing and shaving, sat down to lunch; that after he had eaten he walked back to the store, arriving there about 10 or 15 minutes past 12, and that his wife then went home to lunch, leaving him alone in the store, where he remained the rest of the day. His testimony as to his movements was corroborated generally by that of his wife and her mother. However, at the time of appellant's arrest on the day following the commission of the crime, his mother-in-law stated to a deputy sheriff, according to the latter's testimony, that appellant did not arrive at her home for lunch on the preceding day until after half past 12, and upon cross-examination she would not deny having made such statement. An attempt was made also on behalf of appellant to prove by a dairy delivery employee that he delivered a quantity of milk to appellant personally at the store on the day in question between the hours of 12 and 1 o'clock, but his testimony was of little value, because he did not remember whether the milk was delivered to appellant or to his wife.

[1-3] It will be seen from the foregoing statement of the evidence that a substantial conflict exists between the testimony of the four witnesses whose identification of appellant and of the machine he was operating is positive, and the testimony given by appellant's witnesses in support of his alibi; and, therefore, in that state of the record, the verdict of the jury must be held as controlling on appeal. The jurisdiction of an appellate court in a criminal case, as has been frequently pointed out, is limited by the Constitution to a review of questions of law alone, and although the testimony given in a case will be carefully examined for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is legally sufficient to sustain the verdict rendered, the jury's finding will not be disturbed unless it can be said, as a matter of law, that the same is without evidentiary support. 8 Cal. Jur. 583; People v. Niino, 183 Cal. 126, 190 P. 626 Here, as shown, the evidence supporting the verdict consists of the positive identification by four witnesses of appellant and of the automobile he was using at the time; also of a number of incriminating circumstances relating to appellant's clothing and the ownership of the pistol. Even conceding, in view of the asserted alibi, that two reasonable inferences are deducible from the entire evidence, one looking to appellant's guilt and the other to his innocence, the verdict of the jury under such circumstances is conclusive on appeal (People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 184 P. 389; People v. Meyers, 39 Cal. App. 244, 178 P. 965; People v. Lewis, 141 Cal. 543, 75 P. 189) the appellate court having no power to pass upon the credibility of witnesses or to determine the weight to be accorded their testimony (People v. Haydon, 18 Cal. App. 543, 123 P. 1102, 1114).

[4, 5] Appellant further contends that the evidence is insufficient to establish the commission of any greater crime than an assault with intent to commit rape; that the court erred in not having instructed the jury with reference to the lesser offense, and also in stating to the jury that there was "no serious denial" that the act of rape was committed by some one, and for that reason it would not dwell upon the subjects of resistance, force, or violence. We find no merit in any of the points mentioned. Aside from disclosing ample evidence to prove that the crime of rape was committed, the record shows that at no time during trial did appellant claim that such crime was not committed, the attempt to exculpate himself from the charge being made solely upon the ground that he was not present at the time or place of its commission. The situation here is therefore the same as it was in the case of People v. Craib (Cal. App.) 249 P. 543, and consequently must be governed by the adverse ruling there stated. Moreover, appellant neither proposed nor requested the giving of any instructions relating to the lesser crime, and since it appears that the jury was fully and fairly charged upon the law appertaining to all issues of fact which were contested, its failure to instruct upon a subject now deemed essential by appellant was not error in the absence of a request for such instruction. People v. Anthony, 20 Cal. App. 586, 129 P. 968, and cases therein cited.

[6, 7] On stipulation the jury was instructed orally, and in view of appellant's denial that he was present at the time or place of the alleged crime, the court briefly charged the jury upon the subject of an alibi and in part said:

> "I have already indicated to you what the defense in this case is. The defense of the defendant is an alibi. You may consider the evidence upon the alibi in this case with care; you should scrutinize the evidence with care. You must, however, take in consideration the evidence of the defendant, and the evidence on his behalf, on the subject of an alibi. In connection with the evidence, you may and must consider all the other evidence and circumstances in the case; you must and may take into consideration the direct evidence of four witnesses as to the identity of this defendant. You can take into consideration the automobile that is in evidence, and which you viewed in the jail yard. You may take into consideration the evidence of the husband of the prosecutrix as to the tracks of the automobile that he found in the driveway, and his testimony as to the pursuit of that automobile and the person who drove it. You may take into consideration all of this evidence, pro and con, bearing upon this question of alibi. Alibi, as you know, is the fact of a person, accused of crime, being at another place and time to that charged in the information."

Appellant contends that it was error for the court to refer to an alibi as a defense, and complaint is also made of the court's statement that the jury should scrutinize the evidence with care, claiming that in both respects the instruction was violative of the rules declared in People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 P. 137, and People v. Girotti, 67 Cal. App. 399, 227 P. 936. We are unable to agree with either of the foregoing contentions. The vice of the instructions considered in the cases cited was in stating to the jury in effect that an alibi when "satisfactorily proved" or when "established" was a good "defense" in law, clearly implying, as the decisions in those cases point out, that an alibi was an affirmative defense which the defendant must establish or prove by a preponderance of evidence before he was entitled to an acquittal. Of course, such is not the law. People v. Derwin, 78 Cal. App. 781, 248 P. 1029. And in People v. Girotti, supra, and in the cases upon which the decision therein is founded, the erroneous instructions considered elaborated upon the proposition of a fabricated alibi as a defense, the jury being instructed that:

> "Experience has shown that an alibi as a defense is capable of being and has been occasionally successfully fabricated; and that even when wholly false its detection may be matter of very great difficulty; and that the temptation to resort to this as a spurious defense may be very great, especially in cases of importance—these are considerations attendant upon this defense which call for some special suggestions upon the part of the court."

And the instruction concluded with the statement:

> "You are to scrutinize the testimony offered in support of an alibi with care, that you may be satisfied that a fabricated defense is not being imposed upon you."

The instruction in the present case is not open to the objections which called for reversals in the case cited by appellant, for here the instruction contained no language casting suspicion or distrust upon appellant or upon the testimony relating to his alibi, nor did it in any manner suggest to the jury that the evidence offered in support of his alibi should not be fairly and properly considered; and although, as held in People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 325, 57 P. 1067, an alibi sought to be shown is not strictly speaking a defense, for the reason that the accused is entitled to an acquittal if there be evidence adduced sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to the fact, we do not believe, in view of the other instructions given in the present case upon the doctrines of burden of proof, reasonable doubt, and presumption of innocence, that the jury could have been misled by the use of the word "defense" in applying those doctrines.

[8] Nor do we think that the instruction under attack is subject to the further criticism made against it by appellant, to the effect that it stressed facts adduced by the prosecution in opposition to the alibi, but mentioned none of those proved by appellant in support of the alibi, for the reason that later on and as a part of the same instruction the court stated:

> "I am not attempting to repeat all of the testimony bearing upon the subject of alibi in this case, but I am commending to you and saying to you that it is your duty to consider all of the evidence and circumstances in this case bearing upon the subject of the alibi, because that is the principal question for you to determine. * * *"

Furthermore, if appellant deemed it advisable to have an instruction given embodying the facts upon which he relied in support of his alibi, he should have proposed such an instruction and having failed to do so we think he is not in a position now to complain.

[9-11] The motion for a new trial was based mainly upon an affidavit made by the dairy delivery employee wherein he sought to correct part of his testimony given at the trial to the effect that he had not written a memorandum reading "12 to 12:30" on the milk tag which was delivered with the milk on the day of the commission of the offense; and because of the facts averred in this affidavit it is claimed that the court abused its discretion in denying appellant's motion for a new trial. The question as to whether the memorandum mentioned was written on said tag by the witness or by some one else is not of great importance for the reason that the witness was unable to remember to whom the milk was delivered; and in any event, a motion for a new trial is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, the exercise of which includes the power to determine the truth of the matters on which such motion is based, and its decision thereon will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears that there has been a clear and unmistakable abuse in the exercise of such discretion. People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 116 P. 521; People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 325, 86 P. 671. In view of the equivocation with which the witness gave his testimony and the minor importance to be attached to the memorandum, the trial court was clearly justified in refusing to grant a new trial upon the strength of said affidavit.

After reviewing the entire record, we are unable to say that appellant has not had a fair trial or that the verdict rendered against him has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

PEOPLE v. PERFETTI. (Cr. 1010.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 25, 1928.

1. Infants 🔑20—Information charging furnishing intoxicating liquors to minor 18 years of age, which act tended to contribute to minor's becoming delinquent, held sufficient (Pen. Code, § 1004; Juvenile Court Law 1909, § 1, subds. 8, 11, 13, and Juvenile Court Law 1915, § 21, as amended by St. 1921, p. 773, § 1).

Where defendant did not call court's attention to claimed defects in information, as he was entitled to under Pen. Code, § 1004, information charging him with furnishing intoxicating liquors to a minor child of age of 18 years, which unlawful act tended to, and did, encourage, cause, and contribute to minor becoming and remaining a person as described in Juvenile Court Law (St. 1909, p. 213), § 1, subds. 8, 11, 13, held to state facts sufficient to charge offense under Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1225), § 21, as amended by Laws 1921, p. 773, § 1.

2. Indictment and information 🔑147—When particulars of offense are not stated with clarity, or information duplicitous, defendant must demur (Pen. Code, § 1004).

When particulars of offense, or more than one offense was charged, or if the particular results of defendant's actions were not stated in information with sufficient clarity to satisfy him, or to enable him to more ably present his defense, it was his duty, under Pen. Code, § 1004, to demur.

3. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Defendant's substantial rights were unaffected because information for contributing to delinquency of minor did not state result of minor's use of liquor (Juvenile Court Law, § 1; Pen. Code, §§ 950, 951, 952, 1004, 1012, 1258, 1404).

Where defendant did not demur under Pen. Code, §§ 1004, 1012, to information for selling liquor to minor, which tended to contribute to minor's becoming a delinquent, as described by Juvenile Court Law § 1 (St. 1915, p. 1225), nor object to jurisdiction, or that information did not state offense, and since, under sections 1258 and 1404, reviewing court must disregard technical errors and departures from form, defendant's substantial rights were not invaded or denied within sections 950, 951, and 952, because information did not completely state the ultimate result of the minor's use of intoxicating liquor.

4. Criminal law ⊂⇒970(7)—Defendant, having failed to demur to information, could not urge in arrest of judgment that information did not conform to Penal Code (Pen. Code, §§ 950, 951, 952, 954, 1185).

Where defendant did not demur to information charging him with sale of liquor to minor, which tended to contribute to minor's delinquency, he could not, in arrest of judgment under Pen. Code, § 1185, urge that information did not conform to Pen. Code, §§ 950, 951, 952, 954, requiring offense to be described in ordinary and concise language.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

C. Perfetti was convicted of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 262 P. 477.

W. F. Cowan and J. O. Kroyer, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted on an information charging acts tending to contribute to the delinquency of a minor child, and appeals from the judgment of conviction.

The appeal is based upon three grounds, to wit: (1) That the information fails to state facts sufficient to charge the offense denounced by section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law; (2) that the information is defective, in that it fails to specifically show what offense, or offenses, the defendant is guilty of under section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law; and (3) that the information does not conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code.

[1] The charging portion of the information is in these words:

> "That the said E. Perfetti and C. Perfetti, on or about the 11th day of September, A. D., one thousand nine hundred and twenty-seven, at and in the county of Sonoma, state of California, did then and there willfully and unlawfully give, sell, and furnish certain intoxicating liquors, to wit, white wine containing more than one-half of 1 per centum of alcohol by volume to Wesley Daniels, a minor child then and there under the age of 21 years, to wit, of the age of 18 years, which willful and unlawful act and course of conduct, as aforesaid, did thereby, then, and there manifestly tend to, and did, encourage, cause, and contribute to the said Wesley Daniels becoming and remaining such a person as described in section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

No demurrer to the information was filed by the defendant, but, after the conclusion of the trial, the defendant interposed a motion for a new trial, and also a motion in arrest of judgment. The transcript shows only the following in relation to the motion in arrest of judgment, to wit: Motion of Mr. Cowan on behalf of defendant in arrest of judgment under section 1185, Penal Code. Upon this appeal the appellant calls our attention specially to two cases. The first of which we will consider is that of People v. Pierro, 17 Cal. App. 742, 121 P. 689, in which case it was held that the defendant was entitled to have the information set forth the particulars of the issue which he was called upon to meet as to whether the child had in fact become a delinquent, and that, if the child had not in fact become a delinquent, a case could not be made out against the defendant. In citing this case as an authority to support the insufficiency of the information upon which this defendant was tried, appellant apparently overlooked the fact that the case of People v. Pierro, supra, was decided upon the wording of section 26 of the Juvenile Court Law approved March 8, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 225), which presupposed that the child had already become a delinquent. The holding in that case was to the effect that, under the terms of the Juvenile Court Law of 1909, before a defendant could be convicted of a misdemeanor for contributing to the dependency of a minor under the age of 18 years, the fact that such minor had become a dependent thereunder, or that there had been an adjudication of such dependency, must be distinctly alleged and proved. This provision of the law was eliminated when the Juvenile Court Law, approved June 5, 1915, was enacted (St. 1915, p. 1225). The acts made punishable by section 26 of the Juvenile Court Law of 1909 are written into section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law as it now stands (St. 1921, p. 773, § 1), and the necessity for either charging or proving that the minor has become a delinquent is omitted therefrom, and in place thereof we find the following: That if the person charged does any act which "would cause or manifestly tend to cause any * * * person to become or to remain a person coming within the provisions of any of subdivisions 1 to 13 * * * of section 1 of this act, shall be guilty," etc. Under such circumstances further consideration of the case of People v. Pierro, supra, is unnecessary.

Our attention is next called to the case of People v. Lamanuzzi, 77 Cal. App. 301, 246 P. 557, in support of the contention that the information is insufficient. In the Lamanuzzi Case the information charges that the defendant "did willfully, unlawfully and knowingly commit certain acts, to wit, sell and furnish wine, said wine being then and there fit for use for beverage purposes, and then and there containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, to Budd Stoffers, which caused and tended to cause the said Budd Stoffers, a minor child of the age of seventeen years, to visit a place where intoxicating liquor was sold, bartered, exchanged and given away, to have intoxicating liquor in his possession, which said intoxicating liquor was then and there fit for use for beverage purposes and then and there contained more than one-half of one per cent. of alcohol by volume." Defendant demurred generally and specifically to the information, setting forth that the facts did not constitute a public offense, and that the pleading did not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code. The demurrer was sustained, and the people appealed. The court, in considering the information, among other things, said:

> "That the information charged respondent with acts which were in violation of certain provisions of section 397b of the Penal Code," and that "it not being directly alleged therein that the acts tended to bring the minor within any of the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law, unless the allegations that the act caused or tended to cause the minor to have intoxicating liquor in his possession and to visit a place where intoxicating liquor was sold, bartered, exchanged and given away, may be said to be equivalent thereto," —and it was held to be insufficient. The opinion further refers to cases where the information or indictment has been held insufficient on demurrer in failing to allege that the acts tended to encourage the minor to come within the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law, and cites the exception as being cases where the information, from the facts set forth, necessarily led to such conclusion. It is further set forth in the opinion that it was not alleged that the possession of the minor, following the sale and delivery, was unlawful, and calls attention to the fact that the language of section 397b of the Penal Code is sufficiently broad to include a sale or delivery of intoxicating liquor to a minor under the age of 18 years upon a physician's prescription, etc., and to the fact that such possession would not in every case be unlawful or inconsistent with an innocent and proper purpose, nor would the fact of an illegal sale or delivery, followed by possession, under all circumstances necessarily or manifestly tend to bring the minor within the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law, and then finally holds that, where the ultimate facts necessary to a complete description of the offense have been omitted from the pleadings, and such facts do not follow as a necessary conclusion from the allegations contained therein, a demurrer to the information is properly sustained. A comparison of the information upon which the defendant in this cause was tried and convicted, with the information in the Lamanuzzi Case, shows that they are readily distinguishable. In the case at bar the information is founded solely and exclusively upon the Juvenile Court Law. In the Lamanuzzi Case the prosecution appears to have been based upon section 397b of the Penal Code, which describes a separate and distinct offense from that denounced in section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law. We may point out the further distinction that in the information upon which the defendant was tried and convicted it is specifically charged that the defendant unlawfully sold and furnished certain intoxicating liquor, etc., to the minor, and that such conduct did then and there manifestly tend to, and encourage, cause and contribute to the said minor becoming and remaining a person described in section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law. The opinion in the Lamanuzzi Case apparently overlooks the fact that, when intoxicating liquor is unlawfully sold to a minor, the possession of such liquor by the minor immediately become a misdemeanor (see People v. Avila [Cal. App.] 248 P. 693), which fact immediately brings the minor within the terms of subdivision 13 of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law. There is another distinction to be borne in mind between the decision in the Lamanuzzi Case and that which should be had herein, in this: In the Lamanuzzi Case a demurrer was interposed by the defendant setting forth that the information therein did not conform to sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, while in the case at bar no demurrer was interposed. The defendant apparently was content to go to trial upon the information as it stood without calling attention to any of the defects in the information, which he is entitled to do under section 1004 of the Penal Code, when the trial court would be called upon to determine whether the information did actually contain all the particulars of the offense as required by said sections. That the information in the case at bar charges a public offense seems to us unquestionable. It first charges the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, and then charges a sale and delivery to a minor in such manner that the possession of the intoxicating liquor so purchased by the minor would constitute a misdemeanor on the part of the minor. The information in the case at bar is identical with that in the case of People v. Baker, 38 Cal. App. 28, 175 P. 88, save and except as to the concluding clause, to wit:

> "A person under the age of 21 years who habitually uses intoxicating liquors, and who is leading or is in danger of leading an idle, dissolute, lewd and immoral life; contrary," etc.

That this may be a further description of the crime charged may be admitted, but that it tends to add anything to the offense committed by the defendant does not seem to follow. The act of the defendant is in unlawfully furnishing intoxicating liquor to the minor. The result of the act is wholly immaterial, if it tends toward producing any of the conditions of the minor mentioned in section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law. Whether such a result actually follows is wholly immaterial under section 21 of that act as it now reads. In the Baker Case it was also held that the intent of the seller was immaterial, since the law contemplates the effects of selling, and its tendency to cause the minor to become a delinquent, and not the intent or motive of the seller. While the appellant argues that it is the result, and not the act itself, which brings the accused within the provisions of section 21, such is not the law. If the act of the defendant tends toward such a result, the crime is committed. It certainly is not the law that a defendant cannot be prosecuted until he has actually ruined the minor. The Juvenile Court Law in all its intendments is preventive of the ruination of minors, and not simply the punishment of those who have ruined him after the minor has become a charge upon the state. The simple reading of the information in this case leads unavoidably to the conclusion that the manifest tendency of the acts charged against the defendant is to cause the minor to become a person such as is referred to in subdivisions 8, 11, and 13 of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law. The tendency, in selling intoxicating liquor to a minor, is to cause him to become an habitual user thereof. The tendency of the habitual use of intoxicating liquors by a minor is to cause him to become an idle and dissolute person, and also the violation of law in the disregard thereof by the seller, as well as causing the minor to have unlawful possession thereof likewise, induces the minor to become a person violating the laws of the state. That a public offense is charged in the information is thus shown beyond question.

[2] When the particulars of an offense, or if in this case the particular results of the defendant's actions, were not stated with sufficient clarity to satisfy the defendant or to enable him to more ably present his defense, it was his duty to demur thereto, as provided by section 1004 of the Penal Code, or, if more than one offense was charged, it was such duty.

[3] Upon this appeal the appellant urges urges that the information does not conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, in that the statement of the acts constituting the offense is not made in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable him to understand what is intended in this case, under what particular subdivision of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law the minor should be classed. Section 1012 of the Penal Code further provides that, when the objections mentioned in section 1004 of the Penal Code, which refers to sections 950, 951, 952, and 954, appear on the face of the information or indictment, objection thereto must be taken by demurrer. If the defendant does not demur, there remain only two objections: (1) That the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter; and (2) that the indictment does not state a public offense. Again, section 1258 of the Penal Code requires this court to give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties. Also the judgment of this court must be controlled by section 1404 of the Penal Code wherein the law is set forth that:

> "Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this Code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor an error or mistake therein, renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right."

It cannot be successfully argued that the failure of the information to state whether the minor was in danger of becoming an habitual user of intoxicating liquors, or a dissolute or an idle person, or one addicted to the commission of misdemeanors, affected the defendant, as the defendant's act or acts would be the same in any case. It is only a question of a difference in results that might follow the defendant's acts. The defendant is not on trial for what might occur to the minor, or as to what might be the ultimate effect of the minor's use of intoxicating liquors. The defendant was placed on trial for acts which manifestly tended to produce certain results, to wit, to bring the minor under the provisions of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law. Whether the defendant succeeded or failed is wholly immaterial. If this is true, then no substantial rights of the defendant have been either invaded or denied by reason of the information not completely stating the ultimate result of the use of intoxicating liquor by the minor.

[4] This brings us to a consideration of the appellant's motion in arrest of judgment. The motion is made in general language, and may be insufficient in not specifying the grounds thereof, but, assuming the motion in itself to be adequate, the ruling of the court thereon could not have been otherwise. Section 1185 of the Penal Code, after providing for the interposing of a motion in arrest of judgment, further specifies:

> "It may be founded on any of the defects in the indictment or information mentioned in section 1004, unless the objection has been waived by a failure to demur."

No demurrer was interposed by the defendant in this case. Thus all the objections which have been urged upon this appeal are completely unanswered by this section, under the terms of which the appellant must be held to have waived any of the alleged defects. After sitting still and taking chances on the verdict of the jury, he cannot now come into this court and urge that sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, as well as 954 thereof, were not complied with. The authorities that an appellant is precluded from raising such objections upon appeal after having failed to demur are too numerous for citation, but may be found in the annotations to section 1085, Penal Code, of Kerr's Cyc. Codes 1920, and supplements thereto. Two late cases, however, may be referred to: People v. Lauman, 187 Cal. 214, 201 P. 459, where it is held that failure to demur constituted a waiver of all the objections which we have been considering herein. Also, in the case of People v. Welton, 190 Cal. 236, 211 P. 802, the subject is fully considered. There the information read, omitting the formal parts:

> "Did then and there unlawfully, willfully, wrongfully, deliberately and feloniously print, publish, edit, issue, circulate and publicly display books, papers, pamphlets, documents, posters and written and printed matter containing and carrying written and printed advocacy, teaching and aid and abetment of and advising criminal syndicalism."

No demurrer was interposed, and, upon motion in arrest of judgment, it was urged that the information did not conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, in that the particular circumstances of the alleged offense were not set forth, etc. The court held that, as no demurrer was interposed, the objection was waived.

The objection that the testimony is insufficient to support the verdict is so manifestly untenable that consideration thereof is unnecessary.

The order and judgment of the trial court are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MARTINSON et al. (Cr. 1013.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 25, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⟹1111(1)—Reviewing court is bound by record, not by statements in oral argument.

The reviewing court is bound by the record, and not by statements in oral argument.

2. Criminal law ⟹1166½(12)—Defendants held not prejudiced by court's reference to witness' false testimony in different case or to attorneys therein not shown to be defendants' attorneys.

Where similar prosecution had preceded prosecution for contributing to the delinquency of a minor, court's pronouncement of judgment in preceding case, and referring to testimony of witness therein as having been palpably false, and reference to attorneys indicating they should have known of falsity, was not prejudicial to defendants' own trial, where witness referred to was not called by defendants, and attorneys in former trial were not shown by the record to be same attorneys engaged by defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

O. A. Martinson and another were convicted of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, and they appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 262 P. 474, 477.

W. F. Cowan and J. O. Kroyer, both of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendants were convicted, after trial, upon an information charging them with acts tending to contribute to the delinquency of a minor child, interposed a motion in arrest of judgment, and also a motion for new trial, both of which were denied. The information in this case is word for word with that set out in the case of People v. C. Perfetti, 264 P. 318, this day decided by this court, save and except it charges the sale of "jackass" brandy. All of the objections considered in the Perfetti Case are presented in this case. No demurrer was filed, and the objections are raised on a motion in arrest of judgment. The conditions are exactly the same as in the Perfetti Case, and the authorities there cited and the reasons there stated apply, and, upon the authority of the Perfetti Case, we hold that the objections sought to be raised upon this appeal are untenable; all having been waived by failure to demur.

In addition to presenting the same technical objections as were presented in the Perfetti Case, the defendants upon motion for a new trial in this case sought to raise the objection that the trial court was guilty of such misconduct as prevented the defendants from having a fair and impartial trial. It appears that the case of People v. Perfetti had been tried preceding the trial of the Martinson case, and that, upon the day set for pronouncing sentence in the Perfetti Case, the trial court, in pronouncing judgment, referred to the testimony of one of the witnesses in the Perfetti Case, to wit, a witness by the name of Guenza, as having been palpably false, and pointed out the particulars showing the falsity of such testimony, and referred to the attorneys in the Perfetti Case in language indicating that intelligent attorneys ought to have known of the falsity of the defense. This is the substance of the trial court's language in commenting upon the testimony in the Perfetti Case. The affidavit to which we have referred, omitting the remarks of the court, is in the following words and figures:

"State of California, County of Sonoma—ss.:

"O. A. Martinson and Ione Martinson, being first duly sworn, each deposes and says:

"That affiants state that the trial of the above-entitled cause was commenced November 10, 1927, and at the close of court on said day continued by consent of all parties until Monday, November 14, 1927, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. That at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. November 14, 1927, affiants and their counsel and the jurors impaneled in the above-entitled cause were present in court and sitting in seats in the courtroom within the hearing of the judge, as spectators. That, promptly at 10 o'clock of said last day, said court called the case of the People of the State of California v. C. Perfetti, who had been convicted in said court on the 9th day of November, 1927, of a misdemeanor in furnishing to a minor under the age of 21 years intoxicating liquors, thereby contributing to the delinquency of said minor at said time and place the court made the following statement from the bench: * * * That said statement was made by said court in the presence of the jury impaneled and sworn to try the cause of which these defendants was accused, and all of said jurors did hear the statements so made by said court.

"That upon the conclusion of said remarks and the pronouncing of judgment against said defendant C. Perfetti in said action above mentioned, the court directed the members of the jury sitting in trial of these defendants to take their place in the jury box. That thereupon these defendants offered evidence of themselves and another witness to prove that the said defendant O. A. Martinson did not see, and that said Wallace Cordray was not in the presence of said O. A. Martinson at the time of said alleged sale of liquor, and that said defendant Ione Martinson testified in her own behalf that she refused to sell any liquor to the said Wallace Cordray, and the testimony of said affiants consisted substantially of a denial of the testimony of the said Wallace Cordray, and these affiants had, and there was, no other evidence which was known to them which could be offered in support of their defense. The foregoing affidavit is made in support of the motion of defendants for a new trial herein.

"Wherefore affiants pray that their action for new trial may be granted.

"O. A. Martinson.
"Ione Martinson."

[1] The witness Guenza was not called as a witness in the Martinson case. The affidavit is absolutely silent as to whether the defendants did or did not desire to use the testimony of the witness Guenza. There is nothing in the affidavit which we have set forth, nor is there anything in the record in the Martinson case indicating that the attorneys in the Martinson case were the attorneys representing the defendant in the Perfetti Case. There is nothing in the affidavit, nor is there anything in the record, indicating that the jurors in the Martinson case knew who the attorneys were in the Perfetti Case. Upon oral argument herein it was stated that the attorneys were the same, but this court is bound by the record, and not by oral statements. We call attention to the further fact that there is not a word in the affidavit nor a word in the record tending to show that the jurors referred to in the affidavit were influenced in any particular by the remarks of the court. No objection was made at the time, and whatever of merit, if any merit at all there be in the appellant's contention in relation to the remarks of the court, the record shows that the appellants sat idly by, and were willing to take their chances upon the result of the trial before the jury already impaneled. Even though the question were presented to us in such form that it might be considered, there are many authorities which would justify holding the objection raised by the affidavit untenable. In the case of Johnson v. State, 59 Ga. 189, in considering remarks of the trial court upon a charge to the grand jury, in the presence of trial jurors, the Supreme Court of that state said:

> "The charge to the grand jury was proper. It was right to exhort them to put down crime. That is their business as the grand inquest of the county, and the only criticism that can be made upon the whole affair is that the judge spoke in presence of the traverse jury, and painted a class of offenders, to which this defendant seemed to belong."

[2] We will not extend this opinion by consideration of the cases cited in the memorandum of authorities submitted by the district attorney of Sonoma county, but will simply cite them as supporting the contention that the defendants have not suffered any prejudice by reason of the remarks of the trial court. Landthrift v. State, 140 Ala. 114, 37 So. 287; People v. Threewitt, 251 Ill. 509, 96 N. E. 242; State v. Little, 174 N. C. 793, 94 S. E. 97; People v. Murphy, 68 Cal. App. 738, 230 P. 21. While the testimony is conflicting, it contains sufficient, if believed by the trial jury, to amply support the verdict. It cannot be assumed that the remarks of the court in referring to the testimony of a witness in a different case and to the testimony of a witness not called in this case, or to the attorneys in the Perfetti Case, not shown by the record to be the same attorneys as were engaged in the Martinson case, affected the jury in its decision of the cause now under consideration.

Thus, the record not showing that the defendants were accorded other than a fair and impartial trial, the order and judgment of the trial court are affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. WELCH et al. (Cr. 1550.)

Division 1, California. Feb. 4, 1928.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,

1. Indictment and information 🔑125(5½)—Information charging "conspiracy" to commit burglary, grand larceny, robbery, and other crimes held to charge only one offense (Pen. Code, §§ 182, 184).

Information charging defendants with criminal conspiracy to commit crime of burglary, grand larceny, robbery, assault with deadly weapon, assault with intent to commit murder, and to violate Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1970, § 2, held not subject to objection that it charged several offenses, since criminal "conspiracy," as denounced by Pen. Code, §§ 182 and 184, for purposes of instant case, is agreement between two or more persons to commit crime, and gravamen of offense is agreeing or conspiring together to commit crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conspiracy.]

2. Conspiracy 🔑43(1)—That several crimes specified in information as object of conspiracy made determination of punishment difficult did not make information charging conspiracy bad.

Where information charged conspiracy to commit crime of burglary, grand larceny, robbery, assault with deadly weapon, and other crimes, fact that with several crimes specified as object of conspiracy serious difficulty would arise in determining period of imprisonment that might be fixed as punishment did not make information bad, since punishment was question for prison board to determine and not trial court.

3. Indictment and information 🔑119—Information charging assault with deadly weapon with intent to commit murder charged crime, even if words "with a deadly weapon" be treated as surplusage (Pen. Code, § 217).

Information charging defendants with crime of assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to commit murder, charged offense defined in Pen. Code, § 217, treating words "with a deadly weapon" as surplusage.

4. Conspiracy 🔑40—Defendant, co-operating with party with whom he was handcuffed in reaching automobile and extracting revolver, aided and abetted him in shooting.

Defendant, co-operating with party with whom he was handcuffed in aiding him to reach automobile and extract revolver, aided and abetted him in shooting at officers.

5. Conspiracy 🔑41—Where persons conspire to carry out common design, each conspirator is liable for every act of confederates done during life of conspiracy in furtherance of accomplishment of plan.

Where two or more persons conspire to carry out a common design, each one of conspirators is liable for every act of his confederates done during life of conspiracy and in furtherance of accomplishment of common plan.

6. Homicide 🔑257(1)—Evidence held to support conviction for assault with intent to commit murder (Pen. Code, § 217).

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for crime of assault with intent to commit murder, in violation of Pen. Code, § 217.

7. Criminal law 🔑736(1)—Where testimony was conflicting on whether accused's testimony in another case was induced by promise of immunity, evidence was properly admitted, leaving question for jury.

Where testimony given by one of defendants in another case, in which defendant has appeared as witness for state against codefendant, was objected to on ground that testimony had been adduced by promise of immunity from punishment, and testimony on point was conflicting, it was within province of court to overrule objection, and, after evidence was read to jury, instruct them that matter involved issue of fact for them to decide.

8. Criminal law 🔑1202(3)—Evidence held to support conviction for possessing revolver capable of being concealed on person after having been previously convicted of felony (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1970, § 2).

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction of defendants for having in their possession, or under their custody, revolver capable of being concealed on person, after having been previously convicted of felony, in violation of Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1970, § 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy Hight, Judge.

George Richard Welch and another were convicted of criminal conspiracy, assault with intent to commit murder, possession of deadly weapon, and prior conviction of felony, and they appeal. Affirmed.

George E. Stoddard, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer and John L. Flynn, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. Appellants were charged by information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, in count I with the crime of criminal conspiracy; in count II with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder; in count III defendant Welch was charged with having in his possession, custody, and under his control, a revolver capable of being concealed on his person, he having been previously convicted of a felony; and in count IV defendant Grace was charged with the same offense which Welch was charged with in count III.

The information was attacked by demurrer upon the following grounds: First, that the court had no jurisdiction of the offense charged; second, that the information does not substantially conform to sections 950, 951, and 952, of the Penal Code; third, that more than one offense is charged in said information, and the information does not conform to section 954 of the Penal Code; and, fourth, that the facts stated in the information do not constitute a public offense.

The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants put upon trial before a jury, which resulted in verdicts of guilty upon each of the counts. The jury also found as true the allegations contained in counts III and IV, that each defendant named therein had been previously convicted of a felony.

From the judgment of conviction and the order denying their motion for a new trial the appeal is taken.

Appellants specify three counts upon which they urge a reversal of the judgment: First, that the court erred in overruling their demurrer; second, that the verdicts are contrary to the evidence; third, that the court erred in allowing the introduction in evidence of the testimony of defendant Welch given in a previous trial.

[1] The first point urged involves count I, which, omitting unimportant portions thereof, reads as follows:

> "The said George R. Welch and the Vernon Young Grace are accused by the district attorney of and for the county of Los Angeles, state of California, by this information, of the crime of criminal conspiracy, a felony, to commit the crime of burglary, a felony, grand larceny, a felony, robbery, a felony, assault with a deadly weapon, a felony, assault with intent to commit murder, a felony, and violating section 2 of Act 1970 of the Statutes of 1923 [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923], a felony," etc.

The gist of the criticism laid against this count by the demurrer is that it charges that the conspiracy was formed to commit six separate and distinct crimes, when as a matter of law but one crime may be charged as the object of the alleged conspiracy. The main reason urged in support of this contention is that the statute provides as punishment for the offense of conspiracy to commit a crime the same punishment that is provided for the commission of the crime, and where a count, as in the instant case, charges a conspiracy to commit six different and separate offenses for which crimes different penalties are provided by the statute, there is no measure or method provided by law to determine which penalty to impose.

The first inquiry suggested as we approach a consideration of this question is: What are the essential elements that constitute the offense of criminal conspiracy? For the purposes of the instant case, a criminal conspiracy as denounced by section 182 of the Penal Code may be defined as an agreement between two or more persons to commit a crime. Section 184 of the Penal Code further provides that—

> "No agreement amounts to a conspiracy, unless some act, besides such agreement, be done within this state to effect the object thereof, by one or more of the parties to such agreement."

Manifestly, there is nothing indicated in either of these two sections that a charge of criminal conspiracy must be limited to an agreement to commit but one crime. The gravamen of the first element of the offense is the agreeing or conspiring together to commit a crime. It is this element which distinguishes the crime of criminal conspiracy to commit robbery from the crime of robbery itself which involves the overt act. The iniquity of the conspiracy is the corrupt agreeing together of two or more persons to do by concerted action something unlawful. It may be, and not infrequently happens, that but one or a portion of the number who actually plan the evil design take part in the overt act that accomplishes the intended crime. Forsooth, the most dangerous members of the conspiracy, without whose malignant hearts and shrewd minds the crime would not have been instigated, are adroit enough to refrain from actual participation in the overt act. Unquestionably, the purpose of the law in making it an offense to conspire to commit a crime is to reach every one who in any way participated in forming the evil plan, irrespective of who or how many carry out the design, and well may this be a protection to society, for a group of evil minds planning and giving support to the commission of crime is more likely to be a menace to society than where one individual alone sets out to violate the law.

It would seem to do violence to reason to hold that, where several persons agreed to rob a bank and as a part of the plan they determined to shoot any one who resisted or interfered, they may not be charged in one count with criminal conspiracy because, forsooth, their evil designs contemplated murder as well as robbery. The part of the plan to be armed with loaded revolvers and commit an assault with intent to kill, if need be in carrying out the robbery plan, is just as much a part of the crime which the statute denounces as that part which contemplated the robbery. The fact that neither the actual robbery nor the actual shooting is an essential element in the crime of criminal conspiracy, further emphasizes the fact that the crime of criminal conspiracy consists in the planning and scheming together, and there would seem to be no reason to hold that the charging of a part of the evil plan would properly state a cause of action, when the charging of the entire plan does not state a cause of action.

This view finds support in the case of People v. MacPhee, 26 Cal. App. 221, 146 P. 523, where the court says:

> "It is the first contention of the appellants that the indictment is defective in the fact that it charges the defendants with two crimes, viz. a conspiracy under section 182 of the Penal Code, and also the offense of receiving bribes under section 68 of the Penal Code. We cannot agree with this contention. The indictment is sufficient to charge the offense of a conspiracy to commit or connive at the commission of the several kinds of offenses enumerated in section 182 of the Penal Code; the language of that section is inclusive and elastic enough to permit the framing of an indictment charging a conspiracy to do or permit the doing of any or all of the illegal acts referred to therein; and the fact that the parties to the conspiracy succeeded in perpetrating the acts of crime or fraud specified in the section, which thus became crimes under those other sections of the code forbidding these specific offenses, would not in any wise relieve the conspirators from their liability under section 182 of the Penal Code. To hold otherwise would be to practically nullify that section by making success in the consummation of its enumerated acts of fraud and crime a defense to the conspiracy by which that success was made possible."

In the case of People v. Johnson, 22 Cal. App. 364, 134 P. 340, the indictment contained two counts, one charging a conspiracy to falsely accuse one Loveland of the crime of issuing checks without sufficient funds, and the second charged a conspiracy to pervert and obstruct justice and the due administration of the law. In discussing the merits of a demurrer filed to the indictment, which was overruled, the court says:

> "To do all of the things enumerated in the different subdivisions of section 182 of the Penal Code amounts to a single offense only, and it is quite plain that the district attorney might have joined in one count of his indictment all of the matters which were made the subject of the two counts. That he did choose to separate them and state with more particularity the charge in the way which is exhibited by the indictment did not violate any of the rules of criminal pleading, or any of the specific provisions of section 954 of the Penal Code."

This line of reasoning finds support in the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U. S. 204, 39 S. Ct. 249, 63 L. Ed. 561. One of the counts of the indictment charged a conspiracy to commit numerous specific acts, each of which constituted a separate offense under the Espionage Act of June 15, 1917 (50 USCA § 31 et seq.; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 10212a–10212h). In sustaining the ruling of the district court overruling a demurrer filed to the indictment on the ground that the count in question stated a conspiracy to commit a number of offenses, Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the court, said:

> "Countenance we believe has been given by some courts to the notion that a single count in an indictment for conspiring to commit two offenses is bad for duplicity. This court has given it none. * * * The conspiracy is the crime, and that is one, however diverse its objects."

Our Supreme Court furnishes support for similar conclusions in the case of People v. Gosset, 93 Cal. 641, 29 P. 246, and People v. McClennegen, 195 Cal. 445, 234 P. 191.

Appellants cite the case of People v. Barnard, 63 Cal. App. 562, 219 P. 756, in support of their contention. While there is language in the opinion in that case which is susceptible to a construction that would give aid to appellants' theory, it clearly appears from a reading of that case that facts and matters were there involved and which unquestionably were determinative of the case which do not appear in the instant case. To discuss these points in detail would seem to extend this opinion to undue length, and we deem it sufficient to say the case is readily distinguished from the instant case.

[2] We now come to the point urged that, with several crimes specified as the object of the conspiracy, serious difficulty will arise in determining the period of imprisonment that may be fixed as punishment for the crime. But this is a question for the prison board to determine and not the trial court. All of the offenses charged as being the object of the conspiracy are felonies, and the minimum period of incarceration provided for the least serious is one year in a state prison. This determines the place of imprisonment, and to the prison board under our indeterminate sentence law is left the question of determining the extent of sentence. It is quite possible that the query will never become acute, for the reason that the prison board may see fit to fix a period of incarceration within the maximum provided for the least serious offense specified as the object of conspiracy, in which even appellants would have no legal cause for complaint.

We are of the opinion that the demurrer was properly overruled.

[3] The next point urged by appellants, that "the verdict is contrary to the evidence," relates to count II, which charges the defendants with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. The offense intended to be charged in this count is undoubtedly that denounced by section 217 of the Penal Code, which declares:

> "Every person who assaults another with intent to commit murder, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years."

It will be noted that the information has the added language, "with a deadly weapon," not found in the above-quoted section, but which does constitute a part of the crime defined in section 245 of the Penal Code. However, treating this added language as mere surplusage, there is still charged in the information all the essential elements of the offense defined in section 217 of the Penal Code.

There is evidence in the record tending to establish the following state of facts: Early on the evening of May 29, 1926, in response to a telephone call that three men in a Hudson brougham were seen acting in a suspicious manner in the vicinity of Second and Temple streets in the city of Long Beach, Officers M. A. Smith and Albert Haas were detailed to round up the suspected trio. As the officers approached a gasoline service station situate on the corner of Temple and Broadway streets, they observed standing on the service station grounds a Hudson brougham having the license number given by the informant. As the officers approached the Hudson car, they observed two men in the car, defendant Welch and one Walter Gale. Drawing their revolvers, the officers ordered the two men to put up their hands. They were promptly handcuffed and ordered out of the car. Officer Haas asked the men where the third man was, but the two refused to make any reply. Thereupon the service station man informed the officers that the third man was in the lavatory. Officer Smith remained with the two handcuffed men while Officer Haas went over to the lavatory and there placed the third man, who proved to be the defendant Grace, under arrest. In the meantime, Officer Smith searched the Hudson car and found a .38 caliber loaded revolver lying on the floor of the car under the driver's seat. While the officers were discussing the manner of proceeding to the police station with the three men, Gale and Welch worked their way from where they were standing over to the Hudson car, and Gale, reaching inside of the Hudson car, extracted a loaded revolver and ordered the officers to put up their hands. Immediately Gale began shooting, he and Welch maneuvering in such a way as to keep the Hudson car between them and the officers. The officers returned the fire, but without effect. When Gale had emptied his revolver he and Welch made their escape by jumping over a low fence which was built along the boundary line of the service station grounds and succeeded in secreting themselves in the adjoining property. During the shooting Grace took no part in the affray, nor did Welch do any shooting, although he apparently co-operated with Gale in reaching the car in order to get the revolver. Gale was subsequently apprehended.

It also appears from the testimony that Welch and Grace were acquainted in the northern part of the state and came to Long Beach upon the suggestion of Grace that the Long Beach territory furnished a good opportunity for burglary jobs. They met Gale at Long Beach, and the three men, with one McDonald and two young women, lived in a house on Prospect avenue in Long Beach for a number of weeks. During this period of time, Welch and Grace did a job of shingling and some plastering; otherwise the trio found their main source of livelihood in burglarizing houses and selling their loot to Afana Bros., who appear to have made a business of acquiring stolen goods.

On the night of the shooting, Welch, Gale, and Grace left the house where they were living with the purpose of doing a burglary job. They picked out a house occupied by one Merithew as the object of their attack. While reconnoitering about the place, they were observed by a neighbor, John T. Houser, who became suspicious of their conduct and reported them to the police station. The trio realized they were the object of Houser's scrutiny, and deemed it advisable to drive away from where they were discussing the situation in front of the Merithew house. It was their theory that by going away they would thus lull the suspicions of Houser and return later and complete the job. As they were driving about waiting for the opportune time to return to the Merithew house, Grace, who was driving the car and apparently the owner of the car, or at least exercised ownership over it, drove up to the service station where the shooting took place, for the purpose of going into the lavatory. While there, the officers came up and the shooting followed.

[4] There is abundant evidence to support the theory of the prosecution that Grace, Gale, and Welch were making a business of burglarizing unoccupied houses; that on the night in question, when they started out to rob the Merithew house, they carried with them two loaded revolvers to be used unquestionably in the event that any one should interfere with their evil design. A reasonable inference to be drawn from the fact that they had the loaded revolvers on a burglary job is that they were prepared to and would shoot to kill any officer or other person who interfered with them or apprehended them. Welch co-operated with Gale, with whom he was handcuffed, in aiding him to reach the automobile and extract the revolver, and thus clearly aided and abetted Gale in the shooting.

[5] It is a well-settled rule of law that, where two or more persons conspire to carry out a common design, each one of the conspirators is liable for every act of his confederates done during the life of the conspiracy and in the furtherance of the accomplishment of the common plan.

We can hardly conceive of a situation where this rule would be more clearly applicable than in the instant case. The use of the loaded revolvers carried in the Hudson car by any one or two of the trio to prevent arrest or interference was just as clearly a part of the common design of the conspirators as was the breaking into the house and stealing its contents, and, when Gale attempted to kill the officers, Welch and Grace were just as much responsible for the act of shooting as they would be of burglary if Gale had entered the house for the purpose of burglarizing it, leaving Welch and Grace outside to watch. This principle and its application to the facts in the instant case is recognized and declared in the case of People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 92 P. 861, and also in the case of People v. Wheaton, 64 Cal. App. 58, 220 P. 451.

[6] We are of the opinion that the verdict of guilty as to the charge contained in the second count is abundantly supported by the evidence. In fact, we are moved to suggest that it is difficult for us to understand how the jury could have arrived at any other verdict from the evidence.

[7] The third point urged by appellants is that the court erred in overruling their objection to the reading of the testimony given by defendant Welch in another case. The defendant Grace had previously stood trial for burglary, and in that case defendant Welch appeared as a witness for the state. In his testimony in that case Welch related his acquaintance and relations with Grace and gave the details of a number of burglaries which he and Grace committed in Long Beach. He detailed the events of the evening on which the shooting occurred. The prosecution in the instant case offered such portions of Welch's testimony given in the previous trial as were pertinent to the issues involved. Defendants objected on the ground that the testimony of Welch, given at the previous trial, was induced by a promise of immunity from punishment. The trial court took evidence upon that question. It would avail nothing here to go into the details of the testimony offered by appellants and by the state to meet that issue. Inasmuch as there was a conflict in the testimony on the point, it was well within the province of the court to overrule the objection. Subsequently, by stipulation, the same testimony that was offered upon the question in the absence of the jury was read to the jury, and the court properly instructed the jury that the matter involved an issue of fact that came within their province to decide. In view of the verdict of the jury, we must presume that they concluded the testimony given by Welch was not induced through a promise of immunity. In the case of People v. Black, 73 Cal. App. 13, 17, 238 P. 374, 375, the court, in considering a similar question, said:

> "In our opinion the whole question resolves itself into one merely of conflicting evidence, the determination of the result of the conflict resting finally in the trial court. * * * The evidence upon the point being in conflict, it must be assumed that the confessions were properly admitted."

[8] The last and final point urged by appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to establish a violation by appellants of section 2 of Act 1970 of the Statutes of 1923 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923). This act makes it a felony for any person who has been previously convicted of a felony to have in his possession or under his custody or control any pistol, revolver, or other firearm capable of being concealed on his person. Appellants contend that there is no evidence in the record to show that either of them had a revolver in his possession or in his custody or control. The evidence without dispute does show that there were two loaded revolvers in the Hudson car, one found under the driver's seat by the officers, and the other extracted from some place in the rear of the car by Gale and which Gale used in the shooting. The evidence further shows that Grace was the driver of the car and at least exercised ownership over it. To say that under the evidence appellants, while they were driving in the car, did not have in their possession or custody or under their control the revolvers that were then in the car, unquestionably carried to aid in the burglary job that was the object of the evening trip, would do violence to reason. In addition, there is the testimony of the witness Lillian O'Farrell, who was one of the two women who resided with the appellants in the house on Prospect avenue in Long Beach, that she saw both the appellants with revolvers, and that appellants were in the habit of carrying revolvers with them when they went out on their burglary jobs. There is no merit in this point.

As we find no merit in the record, the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

GRAY v. SOUTHERNE et al. (Civ. 4863.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 2, 1928.

1. Mortgages 🔑106—In determining whether promises were concurrent, court could look to entire transaction.

As to mortgage where there was promise to pay, and promise on part of grantor to convey water supply, court could look to entire transaction to determine whether promises were concurrent, and need not be governed by technical rules in ascertaining intention of parties.

2. Mortgages 🔑415(2) — Purchase-money mortgagee who had promised to furnish water held not entitled to foreclose until tender of water right.

In action to foreclose mortgage, where mortgagee had sold property with understanding he furnish water, held that promise to pay under mortgage and promise to furnish water were concurrent, and there could be no foreclosure until tender of water right.

3. Equity 🔑39(1)—Equity held to have duty to remove cloud on title created by mortgage attempted to be foreclosed nearly 27 years after issuance.

In action to foreclose mortgage about 27 years after it was given, where at time of giving mortgage mortgagee promised to supply mortgagor with water right, which was never done, held that mortgage constituted cloud on real property, and, lien being unenforceable by reason of laches, it was duty of court to order removal of cloud.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by A. C. Gray against Maude Southerne, administratrix of the estate of Claude E. Southerne, sometimes known as C. E. Southerne, deceased, and others to foreclose mortgage. From judgment for defendant plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sapiro, Levy & Hayes and Boyd Oliver, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

William Guthrie, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. On November 2, 1896, one R. E. Blackburn agreed by an instrument in writing to sell to Claude E. Southerne about fourteen acres of land known and described as lots 1 and 2 of block E, Blackburn's addition to Ontario, for the total sum of $1,800, payable in installments. A part of this contract reads as follows:

> "And it is further agreed by the said party of the first part (Blackburn) that he will furnish with said land a supply of water under pressure for domestic purposes equal to thirty gallons for each acre daily, said water to be piped along the street opposite said lot ——, whence it shall be taken at the expense of said party of second part. And said party of the first part shall, upon the execution and delivery of said deed of said lots as aforesaid, also deed to said party of the second part the said supply of water in the quantity specified, or else such an interest in the corporation stock of a water company as shall represent said water supply, and also a pro rata interest in the pipe system and rights of way for the distribution of water on said Blackburn's addition in the same proportion as said lots bears to the whole of the land in Blackburn's addition; it being understood that the cost, if any, of maintaining said water system shall be borne by the several owners thereof in proportion as their respective interests bear to the whole."

On April 22, 1897, Blackburn deeded to Southerne the land and in the deed covenanted as follows:

> "The said R. E. Blackburn hereby covenants, he shall and will on full payment of the notes given by said party of the second part, for part purchase price of said land and secured by mortgage on said land, deed for use on said land a supply of water under pressure for domestic purposes equal to thirty gallons per acre daily, said water to be piped along said lots Nos. 1 and 2, block E, whence it shall be taken at the expense of said party of the second part, and also deed a pro rata interest in the pipe system and rights of way for the distribution of water on said Blackburn's addition to Ontario in the same proportion as said lots bears to the whole of the land of said Blackburn's addition; it being understood that the cost (if any) of maintaining said pipe and water system and said water supply shall be borne by the several owners thereof as their respective interests bear to the whole."

Southerne, at the time, executed the two notes here sued upon for the balance of the purchase price, one for $600 and the other for $630, to fall due in three and four years, respectively, secured by a mortgage upon the real property. Blackburn endeavored to drill a well which proved a failure. At no time did he furnish or deliver any water or have any water to furnish or to deed. Southerne and his family lived on the property for a short time during the year 1898, during which period by courtesy of the city of Ontario they received water from that source, but, that city being obliged to discontinue the service on account of their own shortage, the Southernes were compelled to move. Testimony was introduced that the land was worth, at the time of its sale, without water, somewhere between $10 and $20 per acre and that it would have cost in the cheapest form $1,000 to sink a well and install equipment for a domestic supply of water. Blackburn assigned the notes to plaintiff on November 9, 1898, Southerne died on March 20, 1899, and Maude Southerne, the purchaser's widow, was appointed administratrix of his estate as late as May 7, 1919. Complaint was filed for the foreclosure of the mortgage in July, 1922. The defendant, Maude Southerne, as administratrix, answered, denying all of the allegations of the complaint, and alleging as a further defense that Blackburn agreed to supply water for irrigation or domestic purposes, that he had wholly failed to supply or deed water therefor, and that the consideration for the notes totally failed.

The court rendered its judgment denying foreclosure and ordering that the mortgage be canceled, for the reasons that the consideration had totally failed, and further that plaintiff had lost his right to foreclose by reason of laches. The plaintiff appeals from this judgment.

The appellant assigns as reasons for the reversal of the judgment that there was no laches, that there was no obligation on the part of plaintiff's assignor to deed a water supply until after payment in full of the notes, or, considering the covenants of the contract to be still in force, that there has been neither a rescission nor claim for damages.

[1, 2] This last-mentioned argument we think misses the mark. We may look to the entire transaction of the parties to determine whether the promise to pay and the promise to deed rights to a water supply were concurrent. We need not be governed in our solution of the problem "by any technical rules, but by ascertaining, if possible, the intention of the parties." Ernst v. Cummings, 55 Cal. 179-183. The original agreement for the sale of the land not only required a grant of the water rights upon the execution and delivery of the deeds, which delivery was to be made upon completion of the payments, but also to furnish the water during the life of the contract, and in addition required Blackburn to cultivate the land and set it with deciduous fruit trees during the planting season 1896-97. Furthermore, the testimony established that as dry land the real estate value was very small—somewhere between $140 and $280. Undoubtedly the parties originally intended that payment should be made by defendant upon the furnishing of the water. When we turn our attention to the deed we find that the covenant is very similar to the covenant in the contract, except that it does not specifically provide that water be furnished prior to consummation of the contract, but it does provide that there shall be deeded "for use on said land a supply of water," etc., which was to be done "on full payment of the notes," whereas in the contract the parties used the expression "upon the execution and delivery of said deed of said lots, * * * also deed to said party of the second part the said supply of water," which in turn was to be "upon the completion of the terms of this contract." So far as the use of words is concerned, the only difference is found in the words "on" and "upon." We therefore conclude that the parties did not intend to make a distinction, and yet by no construction could it be said that the covenants were not dependent in the original contract. We are of the opinion that by a fair reading of the covenants of the deed and mortgage they were also concurrent, and especially so when read in the light cast upon them by the prior agreement and the surrounding conditions. Therefore, until there had been a tender of the water right on the part of Blackburn or his assignee, there could be no foreclosure of the mortgage. Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 420, Bohall v. Diller, 41 Cal. 532; Naftzger v. Gregg, 99 Cal. 83, 33 P. 757, 37 Am. St. Rep. 23; Howard v. Higgins, 137 Cal. 227, 69 P. 1060.

[3, 4] It now remains for us to consider whether the court was within its right in directing the cancellation of the mortgage. For nearly 27 years no right to a supply of water was tendered, nor was Blackburn ever able to tender a right thereto, for the reason that he had none to tender. The defendant for that period of time was either under the necessity of securing a different source of supply or of going without the use of the property, which latter he was finally forced to do. To say that no prejudice has been suffered by the defendant as a result of the delay is to argue in the face of all reason and understanding. To argue that there was no change of position is to shut our eyes to the facts. Doubtless Southerne in his lifetime, and his widow since, would gladly have paid the amount of the notes upon receiving water rights pursuant to the covenant, and doubtless had come to the conclusion by reason of the fact that it was impossible to deliver the water rights, that this chapter had been closed, and that they had no reason to concern themselves with the possibility of the appearance of a modern "Rip Van Winkle." Certainly there has been such a great delay, accompanied by such circumstances as to awake an abhorrence on the part of equity, in taking action—and plaintiff has voluntarily submitted himself to this branch of our judicial system in seeking to foreclose his mortgage. Under these circumstances, the mortgage would constitute a cloud upon real property—a lien which would be unenforceable by reason of laches and the impossibility of tendering performance of a concurrent condition, but nevertheless a cloud. It was not only the right, but the duty, of the court under such circumstances to "wipe the slate clean" by ordering the removal of the cloud. 7 C. J. 1189; Wiard v. Brown, 59 Cal. 194. Or, as said in Swan v. Talbot, 152 Cal. 142-147, 94 P. 238, 240 (7 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1066):

> "It is, indeed, the duty of a court of equity, when all the parties to the controversy are before it, to adjust the rights of all and leave nothing open for further litigation."

For very apparent reasons it is unnecessary for us to discuss whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the court in finding that the value of the water rights was at the time of the purchase the sum of $1,230, although it is obvious that the difference between the value of the land and the purchase price would leave considerable value to be put upon the water rights.

FOYE et al. v. SIMPKINSON. (Civ. 4638.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 8, 1928.

Landlord and tenant 🔑214—Though lease was surrendered by mutual consent, lessor was entitled to payment advanced to be credited on last month's rent.

Where property was leased for three years at named monthly rental, and, in addition to regular monthly rental, additional sum of $375, to be credited on account of last month's rent, though lease was surrendered by mutual consent, additional payment being advance payment of rent, became absolute property of lessor, which he was entitled to keep.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by J. Edward Foye and another against Lydia P. Simpkinson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, of Pasadena, for appellants.

John M. Thomas, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. The determination of the appeal in this case hinges upon one point. A house lease provides:

> "That for and in consideration of the payments of the rents, and the performance of the covenants contained herein, on the part of the said parties of the second part [plaintiffs and appellants], and in the manner hereinafter stated, said party of the first part does hereby lease, demise and let * * * for the term of three (3) years * * * at the monthly rent or sum of three hundred and seventy-five ($375.00) dollars, payable monthly in advance, * * * and in addition to the regular month's rent an additional sum of three hundred and seventy-five ($375.00) dollars to be credited on account of the last month's rent under this lease."

Many months prior to the expiration date of the lease term, the parties signed the following indorsement on the lease:

> "By consent of all parties hereto the foregoing lease is hereby terminated and possession of said premises and furniture surrendered as of date of May 24, 1921."

Plaintiffs contended in the trial court, and so contend here, that the $375 paid for the last month's rent should be returned to them. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal upon the judgmenet roll alone.

The law applicable to this case has been so often considered by the appellate courts of this state that we shall not attempt to review it here. Mr. Chief Justice Waste, when presiding justice of the First District Court of Appeal, collated the cases, and very clearly distinguished them in Curtis v. Arnold, 43 Cal. App. 97, 184 P. 510. Mr. Presiding Justice Finlayson of the Second District Court of Appeal did likewise in Wetzler v. Patterson, 73 Cal. App. 527, 238 P. 1077. Mr. Justice Waste in the above referred to case says:

> "If the money be regarded as given in consideration of the covenants of the lease when paid, the title thereto passed to the lessor; if it is to be regarded merely as an advance payment of rent, the lessor is entitled to retain it."

Mr. Justice Finlayson quotes this language with approval. Under the principles applied in these cases and numerous others cited and commented upon therein, the payment of the last month's rental in the instant case was clearly an advance payment of rent, and the lessor was and is entitled to keep it. McArthur v. Kluck, 75 Cal. App. 785, 243 P. 453; Pedro v. Potter, 197 Cal. 751, 760, 242 P. 926, 42 A. L. R. 1165. There is no element of forfeiture here, as in Parish v. Studebaker, 50 Cal. App. 719, 195 P. 721 and Jack v. Sinsheimer, 125 Cal. 563, 58 P. 130, and no element of deposit as security, as in Rez v. Summers, 34 Cal. App. 527, 168 P. 156.

It will be observed that the cases hereinabove cited have one and the same point of fact different from the instant case. A default has been in evidence, while here the leasehold was surrendered by mutual consent. Inasmuch as the leading cases adopt the principle that, if the money was paid in consideration of the covenants of the lease, or merely as advance payment of rent in accord with a requirement of the lease, it thereupon becomes the absolute property of the lessor, this difference in fact does not change the principle of decision. By the terms of the lease this payment of the $375 for a subsequent month's rental was fixed at a specified time, and accrued at such time exactly as the due date accrued on every other month's rental.

> "It is difficult to understand how, rent having become due at the commencement of the rent period, it can cease to be due because the tenancy subsequently comes to an end." 1 Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant, p. 1180.
> "I need only say that, in my opinion, the landlord was entitled by the terms of his contract to retain rent paid in advance although subsequently to the receipt of the rent he became entitled to reenter and did so." Ellis v. Rowbotham, 1 Q. B. 740, 744.
> "A surrender may be effected by express words, evincing such agreement, or may be implied from conduct of the parties going to show that they have both agreed to consider the surrender as made." 24 Cyc. 1382.
> "A surrender has no effect upon the liability of the tenant for rents accrued at the time of the surrender, and this is true though the rent was payable in advance for a period beyond the time of the surrender, and a fortiori rent paid in advance cannot be recovered on surrender." 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 295.

"The surrender of a term does not effect the discharge of the tenant from rent which has already accrued and become payable, even though the rent was payable in advance for a period beyond the time of the surrender." 36 Corp. Jur. § 1149, p. 340.

There is nothing before us, and presumably there was nothing before the trial court, upon which could be based a conclusion that the written surrender did not express the complete understanding of the parties, nor that they did not intend that it should finally close all of the relations created by, and arising from, the lease.

Judgment affirmed.

In action to restrain plaintiff, who had purchased lot under deed restricting buildings to dwelling houses and garage or "outbuildings," from erecting buildings for chicken farm, refusal of court to permit introduction of evidence of attending circumstances held error; such evidence being admissible to explain intention of parties or to show change of conditions.

3. Covenants ⚷51(2)—Determination whether certain building is "outbuilding" usually depends upon location and use.

Determination of whether certain building is an "outbuilding," as term is used in deed, usually depends upon its location upon lot or tract of land upon which residence house is situated, and upon uses to which such building is put.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul Burks, Judge.

Action by Pauline Ruprecht and others against S. J. Nicholson to enforce covenants of deed as to building restrictions. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Superseding opinion in 261 P. 1026.

T. C. Gould and Louis G. Guernsey, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Mitchell, Silberberg & Davis, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued to restrain defendant from erecting or maintaining upon defendant's premises buildings other than residences and outhouses permitted by the deeds of conveyance under which both parties held. Plaintiffs had judgment as prayed, and defendant has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

The covenant under which plaintiffs sued was included in all the deeds of conveyance to all the lots of a tract of land owned and subdivided by the common grantor. The provision which plaintiffs claimed was breached reads:

> "Buildings restricted to dwelling houses and the buyer shall not construct any dwelling house upon said tracts to cost less than $3,000.00 * * * provided that the buyer may erect a garage or other outbuildings, the same to be built and located at the proper point on said tract for such building."

The complaint alleged that the defendant, disregarding this restriction, had erected on one of the lots purchased by him "unsightly chicken houses and barns for use in conducting a chicken ranch, and ever since has maintained and operated said chicken houses and barns on said property in conducting a chicken ranch." The trial court found that this allegation was true; that the buildings were used only in the business of raising chickens for commercial purposes; that they were not appurtenant or subservient to a dwelling house; and that they were not "outbuildings" within the meaning of the term as used in the deeds.

[1, 2] The crux of the case is the intention of the parties as expressed in the proviso in the deeds permitting the erection of outbuildings upon the premises. In approaching this question we should have in mind the admonition found in McBride v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 152, 156, 215 P. 678, 680, where it is said:

> "The intention of the parties should be 'determined by a fair interpretation of the grant or reserve creating the easement' (citing cases). 'It seems to us that in all these cases it is better to get at the intention of the grantor from the language of the deed, interpreted in the light of the attending circumstances, than to conjecture the intent from the circumstances and then to make the language of the deed bend to that.'"

The real contention of the respondents in the present case is not that these chicken houses are not outbuildings in the ordinary sense of the term, but that all the deeds should be construed as prohibiting the use of any portion of the premises for commercial purposes. The language of the deeds differs in this respect from the customary language of deeds or contracts containing stipulations reserving premises for residential purposes only and prohibiting the use of the premises for business purposes. The customary language is that the premises are to be "used for residential purposes only"; that no part of the premises may be "used for business purposes"; that the land "is to be used for residential purposes only, and that no apartment house, store, or other place of business may be erected," or that "the premises shall be used for residential purposes only; that no apartment house, flat, hotel or any building other than a first-class private residence with the customary outbuildings shall be erected." Because of the uniformity of the use in similar deeds and contracts of these specific limitations of the premises to residential purposes, the failure of the deeds in suit to contain any limitation of that character adds to the uncertainty of the language used in these deeds. This being so, it was incumbent upon the trial court to determine the meaning of the restriction in the light of the intention of the parties at the time the contract was made, and for this purpose it was proper to receive evidence of the attending circumstances. This, however, was not done. When the appellant endeavored to show the surrounding circumstances as evidenced by the conditions of the locality in which the tract was situated, the offer of proof was, upon objection of the respondents, rejected. Without any evidence of any character touching upon the circumstances surrounding the execution of the deeds, the trial court determined, upon the face of the instruments alone, that it was intended to prohibit the erection of any building of any character upon the premises which might be used for commercial purposes. The question which comes before us at this time is therefore one of law only—whether the trial court drew the proper conclusion of law from the face of the instrument itself.

The word "outbuilding" or "outhouse" has a well-known and defined meaning. The definition of an outbuilding as given by Century Dictionary is, "A building near or subordinate to a main building;" of an outhouse is, "A small house or building separate from the main house; an outbuilding; specifically, in law under the definition of arson a building contributory to habitation, separate from the main structure, and so by the common-law rules a parcel of the dwelling house or not, according as it is within or without the curtilage." Bouvier defines outhouses as "buildings adjoining or belonging to dwelling houses." The term comes to us from the common law, where the outhouses located within the walls or fences of the curtilage received the same consideration as the main building in criminal proceedings covering burglary and arson. It is said in Hultin v. Klein, 301 Ill. 94, 133 N. E. 660, 20 A. L. R. 230:

"The question of curtilage is of no importance in this case. It was important at common law because the protection and privilege of the mansion house extended to all its branches and appurtenances within the curtilage, and if a barn, stable, or warehouse were parcel of the mansion house and within the same common fence, though not under the same roof or contiguous, a burglary might be committed therein, otherwise not. 4 Bl. Com. 225. An outbuilding must be appurtenant and appertain to the main building. Though distinct from the main building, it must be subservient to it and contributory to the habitation. It must belong to or be intended to be used with the dwelling house."

[3] In those cases where the premises were inclosed within a manor wall or fence, a barn, shed, stable, garage, greenhouse, chicken house, pigsty, storehouse, smokehouse, ice or meat house were all outhouses or outbuildings within the meaning of the term as applied to criminal proceedings for arson or burglary. In this country, where the wall or fence is generally not used, the determination of the question whether a certain building is an outbuilding or an outhouse usually depends upon its location upon the lot or tract of land upon which the residence house is situated and upon the uses for which such building is to be put. Thus what might be an outbuilding or an outhouse upon a farm might not be an outbuilding upon a small city lot. Manifestly, upon a farm a stable for the care of horses, cows and other stock, buildings for the housing of chickens, smokehouses for the curing of meat, and storehouses for food or farm implements, would all be outbuildings or outhouses in the ordinary use of the term, and their character as such would not be changed if the farmer should sell some of the produce of his farm.

In the present case, it is in the evidence that the lot owners of this tract have uniformly constructed upon their lots chicken houses for the purpose of raising chickens and it seems to have been the view of the trial court that these chicken houses were outbuildings within the meaning of the deeds, but that, because the appellant had constructed more of these buildings than was necessary to house chickens for his own personal use, he had thereby violated the restrictions in the deeds. The finding was made that the buildings erected upon the other lots within the tract were not as obnoxious to the restrictions as are the buildings of the appellant, and that the chicken houses erected by the appellant were not outhouses within the meaning of the deeds, because they were not appurtenant or subservient to a dwelling house. In this some connection, however, it was found that the restrictions in the deeds were violated by the appellant in the erection and maintenance of the buildings upon his lot "other than the dwelling house, the garage, and small chicken house or equipment sufficient to house and raise chickens for use only in connection with the use of the property for dwelling purposes and which are subservient to and appurtenant to the dwelling house." The judgment which followed upon these findings restrained the appellant from maintaining any of these buildings for commercial purposes and required him to remove from the premises all the buildings "except such portion of them as may be reasonably required for raising, housing or keeping chickens or poultry for domestic use only, but not in any manner for commercial purposes."

Conceding, as we must, that a barn, shed, or chicken house located upon the lot is an outhouse of the main residence when used solely for the pleasure and subsistence of the family, the question arises: What do those buildings become when the head of the family sells or gives away milk from the cow or eggs from the chickens? The trial court put its stamp of approval upon the chicken houses of one of the lot owners who had room for some 50 chickens and of another lot owner who was keeping 500 or 600 chickens, but it denounced the appellant's use of his buildings, which were prepared for housing between 2,000 and 3,000. It certainly cannot be a question of degree as to how obnoxious the raising of chickens might be to one of the complaining lot owners whose right of action rests upon the covenants found in these deeds, irrespective of any actual damage coming to him from any claimed breach. If it was intended by the parties that the grantees should be permitted to erect chicken houses sufficient to house 50 or 500 chickens, but no more, that restriction should have been inserted in the deeds. Any way we look at it, it is apparent that the interpretation placed upon the deeds by the trial court is not justified by the language of the deeds, but that to reach that interpretation it is necessary to read into the deeds a stipulation that the premises could not be used in any manner for commercial purposes and that the outbuildings permitted to be erected on the premises should be little ones. To reach such a construction of the deeds it is necessary to make a contract for the parties which they did not make themselves and which is not justified by the language employed.

We have said that the trial court did not receive any evidence of the surrounding circumstances upon which any light could have been thrown upon the intention of the parties as expressed in the language of the deeds. The appellant did offer evidence to show that the property was on the outskirts of the city of San Gabriel, in a section surrounded by a sewer farm, a dairy, and chicken ranches, and that the whole section was devoted to chicken raising and small suburban farms. This tender was refused by the trial court upon the ground that it was immaterial what was done in adjacent territory. This evidence was offered to prove the allegation in the answer:

> "That said property is located in a country district upon the outskirts of an incorporated city and in a territory devoted to farming and poultry raising; that said property is not adapted for a high-class residential section and has its greatest value in its use for the purpose of chicken raising and similar uses; that in the same section many large chicken ranches are located."

We feel that the trial court erred in denying to appellant the right to prove these allegations. If a subdivision of this character were to be laid out on the outskirts of the well-known chicken raising city of Petaluma, with no further restrictions than appear in these deeds, it would take a queer process of judicial construction to interpret those restrictions as preventing the raising of chickens for commercial purposes. The fact, if it be a fact, that the tract was located in such a neighborhood, would have been a circumstance attending the execution of the contracts which would have aided the court in determining the intention of the parties and in reaching an interpretation of the language of the deeds. The offer of proof was indefinite as to the time when these conditions existed, and we are unable to tell whether appellant relied entirely upon the conditions existing when the subdivision was made or whether he sought to prove a change of conditions after the execution of the deeds. Under either theory the evidence was admissible: First, to show the character of the territory in which the subdivision was located as bearing upon the intention of the parties in the use of the term "outbuilding" in the deeds if this condition existed at the time the subdivision was made; and, second, if the condition was a result of changes "in the uses to which property in the neighborhood is being put, so that such property is no longer residence property" (Miles v. Clark, 44 Cal. App. 539, 549, 187 P. 167, 171), the evidence was admissible upon the theory that, because of this change in conditions, it would be oppressive and inequitable, to give effect to the restrictions (Downs v. Kroeger [Cal. Sup.] 254 P. 1101).

It does appear that the subdivision was laid out in acre lots 137 feet wide by approximately 300 feet deep; that it was located "nine miles from the county courthouse"; that it was advertised as a desirable location for surburban home places with "fine soil—grows everything; plenty of pure water; cheaper than less desirable property much further out; building restrictions assuring high-class improvements"; and that, while the lots were being offered for sale, a blackboard was displayed in front of the office of the subdivider in the tract which carried the sign: "Suitable for chicken ranches." These are all "attending circumstances" bearing upon the question of the intention of the parties which they endeavored to express in the grant, and they would seem sufficient to compel an interpretation of the deed contrary to that found by the trial court. But the fundamental error is that the appellant was not permitted to make proof of other circumstances which would have supported his construction of the deeds.

WHISTON et al. v. PELHAM. (Civ. 5508.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 9, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 9, 1928.

1. Mines and minerals ⚷74—Assignment of interest in whole of said well held to contemplate a completed oil well brought to substantially continuous production.

Where defendants conveyed to plaintiffs an interest in an oil lease and oil well to be drilled, completed, and put on production at expense of defendant, interest to be in the whole of said well, well was not completed until brought to substantially continuous production, and, where well when first put on production flowed only a short time, defendant could not charge plaintiffs' proportionate share for deepening it and bringing it to permanent production.

2. Mines and minerals ⚷74—Plaintiffs assigned per cent. of whole of oil well were entitled to per cent. of gross proceeds thereof.

Under conveyance to plaintiffs of 3 per cent. interest in oil lease and well being drilled on leased property and to be completed, and declaring 3 per cent. should be of whole of well and assigned out of assignor's interest, plaintiffs were entitled to 3 per cent. of gross proceeds of well and not to that percentage out of interest and share of their assignor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by R. Whiston and others against C. W. Pelham. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Spicer, Meacham & Mason and Bruce Mason, all of Long Beach, for appellant.

John B. Haas and John D. Home, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. This suit was brought by plaintiffs to require an accounting by defendant of proceeds of sale of oil and gas from an oil well in Long Beach, and for judgment for whatever might be found due them.

Defendant had sold and conveyed to plaintiffs R. Whiston and Celia Whiston, his wife, a 3 per cent. interest in an oil lease and in a well which was then being drilled on the leased property. In this conveyance the Whistons were named as parties of the first part and Pelham as party of the second part. The Whistons conveyed a part of their interest to the plaintiff Stevens. The conveyance by defendant Pelham provided:

> "The party of the second part hereby sells, conveys and assigns to parties of the first part a three per cent. (3%) interest in one certain oil and gas lease on lots 12, 13, and 14 in said block H to the party of the second part and his associates, given by J. W. Paulson et al. and C. W. Long, together with the same interest in one oil well now drilling on said location. Said well to be drilled, completed and put upon production at the cost and expense of party of the second part and his associates. Said three per cent. (3%) shall be of the whole of said well and assigned out of the interest and share of the party of the second part."

Under the arrangement made with the purchaser of the oil and gas, payments were made to Pelham for the whole of his original share, and he in turn made settlements with the plaintiffs for their part.

Defendant answered to the complaint alleging that he had fully accounted to plaintiffs for their part of the proceeds of such sales. In a separate defense he set out the total amount realized from sales, deducting the royalty payments under the lease, and expense of marketing the products and maintaining the well. He further set forth that he had sold the Whistons a 1½ per cent. interest in another well, out of his interest therein, the payments on account of sales to the extent of their interest, being made direct to the Whistons, without deduction for operating expenses, taxes, and maintenance, which was charged to him against his remaining interest. This was not alleged specifically as an offset or counterclaim, but was apparently so treated on the trial.

The court entered an interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiffs, and referred the accounting. Upon the filing of the referee's report, judgment was entered against the defendant for the amount ascertained to be due, and from this judgment appellant appeals.

[1] The controversy between the parties grew out of their differing ideas of what constituted a completion of the well, and of the construction of the meaning of the phrase "whole of the well" in the conveyance. When the well was first put on production it flowed only a short time, and the supply of oil became exhausted. Appellant and his associates expended a considerable sum of money in deepening the well and bringing it to permanent production. Three per cent. of this sum he charged to respondents in his settlements as part of the cost of maintenance. Respondents contend that the well was not completed until brought to substantially continuous production. Evidence was introduced in support of each of these views. Besides the appellant argued that the deepening of the well was in effect drilling a new well, the expense of which was, under the express terms of the conveyance, chargeable proportionally. The trial court, in construing the clause in its application to the facts, with such light as the expert evidence threw upon it, adopted, we think properly, respondents' view as the more reasonable.

[2] The other differences between the parties resulted from their differing contentions as to the meaning of the expression "three per cent. of the whole of the well, assigned out of the interest and share of the party of the second part," Pelham.

It will be noted that, by the assigning clause preceding this phrase, the interest in the well was vested in the plaintiffs. The later clause was evidently put in for the purpose of defining, or modifying in some way, the character or extent of the interest conveyed. It is quite apparent that the meaning of the language is not clear. The trial court took this view and admitted evidence of the circumstance of the transaction, and the negotiations between the parties.

The testimony of the appellant was to the effect that the clause was put in because Whiston feared that the contract might be construed as conveying 3 per cent. only of Pelham's interest in the well. Whiston, on the other hand, testified that the agreement was that his interest was to be 3 per cent. of the gross proceeds of the well. His version would appear to be confirmed by the statement in the contract that the 3 per cent. should be assigned out of the "interest and share" of Pelham, and by a further provision "that, in the event of any other well being drilled upon said lease, the parties of the first part are to pay their proportionate share of all expenses," not merely their share of the drilling expense.

The trial court adopted their view from the evidence, and its finding cannot be disturbed.

It follows that the judgment must be, and it is, affirmed.

LORENZ v. HUNT. (Civ. 3356.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 3, 1928.

1. Pleading ⚷417—Sustaining of demurrer is generally waived by amendment.

As a general rule, the amendment of a pleading after the sustaining of a demurrer thereto is a waiver of any error in the action of the court.

2. Assault and battery ⚷9—Advice of counsel in making forcible entry on plaintiff's premises held no defense in action for assault, unless attorney was informed of facts.

Matter presented as defense that defendant made forcible entry on plaintiff's premises acting under advice of attorney held immaterial, in plaintiff's action for injuries from assault, where defendant failed to allege that he had informed attorney of the facts, or that attorney had any knowledge thereof.

3. Trespass ⚷10—Action of deputy sheriff, purchasing land, in forcibly entering on premises and disturbing rightful possession of tenant without warrant or process, was wrongful (Pen. Code, § 418).

Where tenant from month to month had rightful and exclusive possession of land, forcible entry of deputy sheriff, purchasing property, made without warrant or process of any kind, was wrongful, regardless of his official capacity, since entry in official capacity would be abuse of authority, and entry as private citizen constituted misdemeanor under Pen. Code, § 418.

4. Assault and battery ⚷15—Tenant rightfully in possession of premises had right to use reasonable force to prevent forcible and unlawful entry by purchaser (Pen. Code, § 418).

Tenant rightfully in possession of premises had right to use reasonable force to prevent forcible and unlawful entry by purchaser of premises, where entry constituted misdemeanor under Pen. Code, § 418.

5. Criminal law ⚷27—If tenant resisted unlawful entry on premises by exhibiting loaded revolver not in necessary self-defense, without pointing it or attempting to shoot any one, offense at most was misdemeanor (Pen. Code, § 417).

If tenant, in rightful possession of premises, but not in necessary self-defense, merely exhibited loaded revolver as a bluff, without pointing it at person attempting unlawful entry, or attempting to shoot him or his associates, her conduct amounted to no more than a misdemeanor under Pen. Code, § 417.

6. Assault and battery ⚷35—Finding that deputy sheriff's arrest of tenant without warrant, after illegal forcible entry on premises which deputy had purchased, was made in bad faith, held justifiable, notwithstanding tenant may have exhibited revolver (Pen. Code, §§ 417, 418, 836, 837).

Where deputy sheriff purchased premises, and made forcible entry thereon, violating lawful possession of tenant contrary to Pen. Code, § 418, which makes such entry misdemeanor, finding that arrest of tenant by deputy sheriff without warrant or any process was not made in good faith, under section 836, but was made merely to serve private purpose of getting possession of premises, was justifiable, though tenant may have been guilty of misdemeanor, under section 417, in exhibiting loaded revolver, since deputy sheriff was first wrongdoer, and tenant would have had right to arrest him without warrant under section 837.

7. Appeal and error ⚷714(5)—Alleged error in excluding conversation unexplained in record held not reviewable on basis of statement in appellant's brief.

Alleged error of trial court in excluding answer to question, "What was the conversation?" held not reviewable, where record failed to indicate the subject-matter of the inquiry or what was sought to be proved, and statement in appellant's opening brief as to matter sought to be shown was unavailing.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

8. Evidence 🔑248(1)—Statements made by plaintiff's husband, not in plaintiff's presence, held not admissible as admissions against interest.

Proof of statements made by plaintiff's husband held not admissible as admissions against interest, where husband was not a party to the action, and statements were not made in plaintiff's presence.

9. Witnesses 🔑388(2)—Statements by plaintiff's husband in plaintiff's absence held not admissible for purpose of impeachment, where no foundation was laid.

Proof of statements claimed to have been made by plaintiff's husband, not made in plaintiff's presence, held not admissible for purposes of impeachment, where no foundation had been laid.

10. Assault and battery 🔑35—In tenant's action against purchaser of premises for assault and battery, findings as to tenant's right to possession, purchaser's forcible entry, and injuries inflicted, held sustained by evidence.

In action by tenant in possession of premises for personal injuries incident to arrest and assault and battery by purchaser, who made unlawful entry for purpose of putting his hogs in the inclosure, findings that plaintiff was entitled to possession, that defendant made unlawful entry, kicked her, and struck her with his fists, and finding relative to plaintiff's injuries, held supported by substantial evidence, trial court being in better position to pass on weight and credibility of witnesses.

11. Assault and battery 🔑40—$1,500 damages to woman for assault by deputy sheriff, striking her with black-jack, and handcuffing her, and forcing her in car, in making arrest, and for bruises, pain, and suffering and humiliation, held not excessive.

In action for assault and battery by female tenant against deputy sheriff in connection with defendant's forcible entry on premises, $1,500 actual damages for injuries resulting from assault with black-jack, bruising of plaintiff's wrists through use of handcuffs, and bruising of her legs when she was forced into automobile when arrested, and for indignity and humiliation in being driven through public street, and for resulting pain and suffering and shock to nervous system, held not excessive.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Findings supported by testimony are conclusive on appeal.

Findings of court, where supported by testimony, must be accepted as true on appeal.

13. Assault and battery 🔑39—Award of punitive damages for assault and battery held unauthorized, where complaint contained no allegation of malice, and made no demand for exemplary damages, though evidence showed malice.

Award of punitive damages, in action for assault and battery in connection with forcible entry on plaintiff's premises and wrongful arrest of plaintiff, held error, where complaint contained no allegation of oppression, fraud, or malice, and no demand for exemplary damages, even though evidence showed malice, and court found assault and arrest were malicious, inasmuch as such evidence is admissible in support of allegation of actual damages.

14. Assault and battery 🔑33—Evidence of defendant's malice and oppression is admissible to prove actual damages for assault.

Evidence tending to show malice and oppression in action for assault and battery is admissible in support of allegation of actual damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Carrie M. Lorenz against A. D. Hunt. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed as modified.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellant.
Erling S. Norby, of Marysville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action for personal injuries. Plaintiff was given judgment, and the defendant has appealed.

The defendant was a deputy sheriff at the time of the alleged injuries. April 15, 1924, he purchased about two acres of land on which there was a dwelling house. The plaintiff and her husband were then in possession of the premises as tenants from month to month, and they continued in possession as such tenants until after the infliction of the injuries. The evidence shows that their possession was rightful and exclusive. Without their consent or permission, the defendant put about 40 hogs on the premises in the latter part of August of that year. The plaintiff and her husband objected to the presence of the hogs on the lot, and it appears that the gate was left open at times, so that the hogs passed back and forth through it. The plaintiff made "complaint about the hogs to the health officer," and the latter informed the defendant he "would have to get them away from there."

A witness for defendant testified that in the evening of September 8th "there were no hogs in the corral at all. Mr. Lorenz said to me, 'The first one that comes in this gate, I will smash his head in with this club;' he had a club in his hand. * * * I went back, and reported the conversation to Mr. Hunt that night. I told Mr. Hunt the pigs were in the alfalfa, and Mr. Lorenz had turned them out, and Mr. Lorenz had threatened me with a club." About 10:30 o'clock in the forenoon of September 9th, during the absence of Mr. Lorenz, the defendant, with three other men, appeared at the Lorenz place for the avowed purpose of putting the hogs in the inclosure. The defendant testified:

> "I was going to put them in there regardless of what Mrs. Lorenz wanted or didn't want. I was going to put them in the corral, through the big gate, regardless of whatever resistance Mrs.

Lorenz might put up. I had to take them through the big gate. From the way the boys were treated the night before, I expected there might be some trouble. I most always carry the handcuffs with me and the billy; I never carry any other arms of any kind."

The plaintiff testified:

"Mr. Hunt came towards the gate, which was locked, and was attempting to open it. * * * I went out and told him not to open the gate, that his hogs were outside of the gate, to take them away, but not to come inside and not to drive them in, and he proceeded to untie the gate and open it, and I took hold of the gate and closed it. He took hold of the other side, and we fought over that gate. * * * At least he struck or hit me, shoved me over against the fence, * * * and I backed up probably 20 or 25 feet, and Mr. Hunt all the time threatening me, saying he was coming in * * * He * * * said he would fix me, he would lay me out, such remarks as that, cursing me, and was in a violent temper. He reached for his back pocket. I didn't know what he was reaching for; and, when he did that, I turned around and started toward the house, and he after me, and at that he said, 'I will fix you.' I went up a few steps further to an old stove in the yard and got this revolver * * * and came back with the revolver in my apron pocket. He says, 'You have a gun, have you?' I says, 'Yes, I have a gun, and I hope I don't have to use it,' and at that he made a grab for my wrist, got hold of my hand with the gun in my hand, and said, 'You are under arrest.' * * * He showed me his badge, said he was a deputy sheriff of Yuba county, and I was under arrest."

The remainder of the story may be told in the language of the following findings, which are fully supported by the evidence, although the evidence is conflicting in some important particulars:

"That on September 9th, 1925, at the home of the plaintiff in the county of Yuba, state of California, the defendant, A. D. Hunt, did then and there violently assault the plaintiff, striking her with his fists, striking her with a black-jack or policeman's billy, and did then and there twist and wrench her right hand, thumb, and wrist, and then and there forced handcuffs upon her, and twisted and pulled said handcuffs violently, so that said handcuffs cut and bruised her wrists, and dragged her by said handcuffs from her said premises to a road, and then violently forced her into an automobile; that, while forcing her into said automobile, and while her legs protruded from the open door, defendant forcibly and violently slammed said door against her legs between the ankles and knees thereof, so that the metal parts of said door cut and bruised her said legs; that defendant then forced the plaintiff to ride with him in said automobile, and, while she was so handcuffed, through and along the most public street in Marysville, in said county of Yuba, to the courthouse in said city, and then forced plaintiff to go into said courthouse, and kicked and beat and roughly handled her. By reason of all thereof plaintiff was rendered sick and sore, her wrists became bruised, black and blue, her right thumb became bruised, stiff and sore, and the plaintiff's legs, where said automobile door was jammed against them, became bruised, black, sore, and painful, and that said bruises and soreness and pain remained, and that plaintiff suffered pain and injury therefrom, for a period of many days thereafter, and that one of the said bruises on plaintiff's leg still remains and is apparent in the form of a slightly swollen and black and blue mark. That other parts and portions of plaintiff's limbs and body became and were for a period of many days thereafter, as a result of said assault, bruised, sore, and painful. That plaintiff suffered, by reason thereof, a severe shock to her nervous system, so that she was for the period of a week thereafter sick and sore, and that she was, for a period of approximately a week thereafter, under the care of a physician for the treatment of said injuries that she then suffered. That plaintiff suffered great mental pain and anguish, and was greatly humiliated and suffered by reason thereof, great shame.

"That the said plaintiff, Carrie M. Lorenz, did * * * have on her person a loaded revolver and that she did exhibit the same, but that she did so in the rightful and lawful defense of her said home. That defendant then and there was attempting to use all the force that it was possible for him to use to drive and place a number of hogs into and upon the premises occupied by the plaintiff as her home, and of which she was in possession, and rightfully entitled to the possession, and that plaintiff, in exhibiting said loaded revolver, only used such means as were necessary to keep the defendant from coming upon the said premises and placing the said hogs thereon. * * *

"That the * * * defendant had, at that time, armed himself with his deputy's badge, his handcuffs, and his policeman's billy, and, with four other persons, proceeded to the premises occupied by the plaintiff as her home with the intention of using all force that might be necessary to depossess the plaintiff of a part of the said premises, and to place a large number of hogs upon the said premises. That defendant had no right to enter upon said property or to place his hogs thereon. That, when he met with resistance rightfully asserted by the plaintiff, he did, without any right or authority, and maliciously and oppressively, place the plaintiff under arrest, and did then and there maliciously and oppressively commit upon the person (of) the plaintiff the assault and various acts constituting the assault and battery hereinbefore set forth in these findings; and various of the acts constituting said assault were committed in the presence of the plaintiff's grown daughter.

"That by reason of the foregoing facts, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $1,500, and is entitled to the further sum of $1,000 as exemplary damages."

[1, 2] The original answer contains denials of the allegations of the complaint which show liability on the part of the defendant. As a second and separate defense it contained a history of the alleged rights and acts of the parties which culminated in the plaintiff's arrest by the defendant. It also contained an allegation that the defendant consulted "an attorney at law, and was by said attorney advised to gather up his said hogs and place them back in the said corral." The court sustained the plaintiff's demurrer to the second defense, with leave to amend. Thereafter the defendant filed an amended answer, again denying the alleged acts showing wrongful conduct on his part, and, as a separate defense, he alleged that his arrest of the plaintiff was for a misdemeanor committed in his presence, in that she "did then and there in the presence of said defendant and two or more other persons, willfully and unlawfully draw and exhibit in a rude, angry, and threatening manner, and not in necessary self-defense, a certain deadly weapon, to wit, a loaded revolver." Appellant now complains that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the separate defense alleged in the original answer. As a general rule, the amendment of a pleading after the sustaining of a demurrer thereto is a waiver of any error in the action of the court. 21 Cal. Jur. 128. In this case, the separate defense, to which the demurrer was sustained, presented no issue which was not raised by the denials set forth in his first defense. In a case such as this, the defendant may show that he acted under the advice of counsel, based upon a full disclosure of the facts. Walker v. Chanslor, 153 Cal. 118, 124, 94 P. 606, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 455, 126 Am. St. Rep. 61. The defendant, however, did not allege that he had informed his attorney of the facts or that the attorney had any knowledge thereof. Under such circumstances the advice of counsel is immaterial.

[6] The appellant contends that plaintiff was committing a misdemeanor in his presence, and that, therefore, under the authority of section 836 of the Penal Code, in order "to preserve the peace and maintain order," he was justified in arresting the plaintiff without a warrant. Appellant overlooks the fact that he himself was engaged in the commission of a misdemeanor in the presence of the plaintiff, and that therefore she, as a private citizen, under section 837 of the Penal Code, was authorized to arrest him without a warrant. Under such circumstances it is unnecessary to determine which one had the superior right to arrest the other. The defendant was the first wrongdoer, and the court was justified in believing from the evidence that the arrest was not made in good faith "to preserve the peace and maintain order," as claimed by the appellant, but to serve his private purpose of unlawfully getting possession of the premises.

[7] A witness for the defendant testified that he had a conversation with the plaintiff on September 6th. He was then asked, "What was the conversation?" The court sustained the plaintiff's objection thereto. The ruling was clearly right. There was nothing in the question to indicate the subject-matter of the inquiry and the record is entirely silent as to what the defendant desired to prove by the witness. In his opening brief the appellant states what he sought to prove by this witness, but this statement should have been made to the trial court, and it avails appellant nothing to make it here for the first time.

[8, 9] The court sustained plaintiff's objection to proof of statements claimed to have been made by plaintiff's husband, but not shown to have been made in the presence of plaintiff. This was not error. Such evidence was not admissible as an admission against interest, because Lorenz was not a party to the action. Neither was it admissible for the purposes of impeachment, because no foundation had been laid therefor.

[10] Appellant attempts to show that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings by picking out such parts thereof as are most favorable to himself. Without stating appellant's contentions in detail, it is sufficient to call attention to evidence in opposition to the more important of them.

Relative to the possession of the premises by plaintiff and her husband the latter testified in part as follows:

"I did not have a lease to the property. I rented from month to month. * * * It was divided into two parts. We occupied all of it. * * * I first rented these premises from Haney, and in the month of September I also rented from Mr. Hunt, the defendant in this case. I occupied all the premises on the 9th of September, and I resided in a cabin on the south end of the premises. At one time, during the month of September, the north part of the premises, which was separated by a fence, contained a number of hogs. * * * They were supposed to belong to Mr. Hunt. * * * The hogs were not on the premises with my permission."

The plaintiff testified that:

"The cross fence * * * was about 18 inches high, and was not hog tight. Frank and I built it for chickens to keep the hens and baby chicks in. * * * I did not have any conversation with Mr. Hunt relative to any agreement to put his hogs on that property. I made no offer of any kind. There was no agreement and I told him repeatedly and told his men * * * to take his hogs out of there."

The court found that the defendant kicked the plaintiff. She first testified that he kicked her, and later she explained:

> "He didn't hit me with his foot but with his knee, and brought it against my rear as I went through the door."

The distinction does not seem to be material, viewed in the light of the many acts of violence with the court found the defendant committed.

The plaintiff testified:

> "He did not strike me at the time he put the handcuffs on; he did not hit me with his fist; he just pummeled me."

Appellant quotes all of this statement, except the words herein italized, and then argues that the statement shows that the court was in error in finding that the defendant struck the plaintiff with his fists. The very sentence, of which appellant quotes a part only, without indicating that anything was omitted, limits the answer to "the time he put the handcuffs on." Relative to other stages of the struggle, the plaintiff testified that the defendant "struck or hit me"; "dragged me out the gate"; "struck me in the stomach"; "struck me with his fist on the chest"; and "knocked me against the fence."

Appellant's statement that "there is no evidence whatever that the defendant was attempting to use all the force possible to drive the hogs in plaintiff's home or any other place" is fully refuted by his own testimony hereinbefore quoted.

Further analysis of the evidence is unnecessary. A careful reading of the transcript thereof shows that the findings are supported by substantial evidence on every material issue. It is true that much of the evidence is squarely contradicted by other substantial evidence, but the trial court was in a better position to pass upon the weight thereof and the credibility of the witnesses than is an appellate court.

[11, 12] It cannot be held that the amount awarded the plaintiff as actual damages is excessive. In addition to plaintiff's physical injuries, she suffered gross indignities and great humiliation at the hands of defendant, according to the findings of the court, which, being supported by the plaintiff's testimony, must be accepted as true on this appeal.

[13, 14] The complaint contains no allegation of oppression, fraud, or malice on the part of defendant nor any demand for exemplary damages. There is no basis, therefore, for the award of punitive damages. 8 Cal. Jur. 894. It is true that there is sufficient evidence to show malice, and the court found that the defendant's assault upon the plaintiff and her arrest by him were malicious and oppressive, but it cannot be held that the case was tried upon the theory that the question of punitive damages was in issue, because the evidence tending to show malice and oppression was admissible in support of the allegation of actual damages. "It is frequently the case that evidence which is admissible to establish one issue may tend to establish another issue than that for which it is offered, and it is a rule that evidence so introduced is available to establish any of the issues in the case. This rule is, however, limited to the issues which are to be tried. If the other issue that the evidence may tend to establish is not before the court the evidence must be limited to the actual issue. The fact of its introduction cannot be used to establish an issue that the parties have not made in their pleadings. The court would not be authorized to consider it as establishing an issue that was not before it for trial. Even a finding upon such evidence would be disregarded in determining the correctness of the judgment." Riverside Water Co. v. Gage, 108 Cal. 240, 245, 41 P. 299, 300; Crescent Lumber Co. v. Larson, 166 Cal. 168, 171, 135 P. 502.

The amount of the judgment is reduced from $2,500 to $1,500, with interest thereon, and costs as therein provided, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed, appellant to recover his costs of appeal.

NOBLE v. REID-AVERY CO. (Civ. 3403.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 7, 1928.

1. Contracts 🔑9(3)—Contract providing company should have exclusive agency for welding rods as long as it gave faithful service to trade held definite as to duration.

Contract by which it was agreed that company was to have exclusive sale of welding rods within certain territory as long as it was able to give faithful service to trade and produce business that warranted territory allotted to it and no longer held sufficiently definite as to time during which it was to be effective.

2. Appeal and error 🔑934(3)—On appeal from default judgment taken after failure to appear, allegations in answer are conclusively presumed to be true.

On appeal from a default judgment taken after failure to appear at time of trial, allegations in answer are conclusively presumed to be true.

3. Contracts 🔑9(3) — Generally failure of executory contract to state time for termination does not render it void for uncertainty.

Generally failure of an executory contract to state time presently definite for its termination does not render it void for uncertainty.

4. Specific performance 🔑28(1)—Greater certainty is required in agreement to be specifically executed in equity than in contract which is basis of action for damages.

Greater degree or amount of certainty is required in terms of agreement which is to be specifically executed in equity than is necessary in contract which is basis of action at law for damages.

5. Contracts 🔑10(2)—Contract for exclusive agency for welding rods, where company had made purchases and expended time and money in working up demand for goods, held not lacking mutuality.

Where, in compliance with contract granting it exclusive sale of welding rods within certain territory, company acting as exclusive agent made initial purchase and such additional purchases as were necessary and expended time and money in working up demand for goods, held that contract did not lack mutuality.

6. Contracts 🔑10(2)—Want of mutuality held no defense to action on executed contract for exclusive agency for welding rods.

Action on executed contract for exclusive agency for welding rods may not be defeated on ground contract was wanting in mutuality, since want of mutuality is no defense in case of executed contract.

7. Damages 🔑225—Judgment, awarding damages subsequent to commencement of action on contract for exclusive sale of welding rods, held proper under statute (Civ. Code, § 3283).

In action on contract for exclusive sale of welding rods, where judgment awarded damages subsequent to time of commencement of action, held such award was proper under Civ. Code, § 3283, providing damages for detriment after commencement of judicial proceeding.

8. Judgment 🔑143(7)—Refusal to reopen default judgment under statute after examination of conflicting evidence on confusion arising from substitution of attorney held not abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where attempt was made under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to obtain relief from default judgment on ground of confusion arising from substitution of attorney for defendant, refusal of relief by trial court after examination of conflicting evidence held not abuse of discretion.

9. Appeal and error 🔑957(1)—Judgment 🔑139—Relief from default judgment is matter of discretion with trial court, which will not be interfered with on appeal unless abused.

Ground of relief from default judgment lawfully taken is matter of discretion with trial court which will not be interfered with on appeal unless abuse of discretion clearly appears.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by J. M. Noble, doing business under the firm name and style of the Noble Company, against the Reid-Avery Company, for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Young & Young, Milton K. Young, Lyndol Young, L. R. Brigham, and William K. Young, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Goodwin Knight and Thomas Reynolds, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment by default in favor of the Noble Company, respondent herein, against the Reid-Avery Company, a corporation, appellant. The complaint alleges, in substance, that an agreement was entered into between the parties to this appeal, wherein the Noble Company was to purchase for resale from Reid-Avery Company a large quantity of welding rods, and would, from time to time, purchase additional amounts, as necessity required, and would pay for the same according to an agreed schedule of prices, and that, until the Noble Company had sold and completely disposed of said rods, and as long as it performed the terms of its agreement, the Reid-Avery Company would not sell similar rods or materials to any one in certain designated counties, in which counties the Noble Company was to have the exclusive and sole rights to sell such materials.

After the execution of said agreement, and while respondent had a large stock of rods on hand, appellant, Reid-Avery Company, so it is alleged, sold certain rods to others within the exclusive territory, whereby respondent sustained damage.

The answer of Reid-Avery Company denies that it entered into an agreement other than as set forth in its answer, and it is therein admitted:

> "That in May, 1923, there was an agreement made between the Reid-Avery Company and Atlas Foundry Company and the agent of Reid-Avery Company, for the Noble Company, to handle the output of the Reid-Avery Company of goods known as welding rods, on the terms and prices then agreed upon. * * *"

And in a separate defense it is further alleged, as being part of the terms and conditions of the agreement:

> "That it was distinctly understood at the time of the first order of goods by Noble Company, that they (Noble Company) should have the exclusive right to sell the goods and represent the Reid-Avery Company in that part of California known as Southern California, as long as they were able to give faithful service and a business management to the trade and produce the trade that was warranted in the territory allotted to them, and no longer."

Appellant contends that the judgment is erroneous by reason of the invalidity of the contract upon which the action is based; that damages were awarded which arose subsequent to the commencement of the action without the aid of supplemental pleadings, and justification of cancellation by appellant. Appellant also insisted that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to set aside the judgment of default entered against it.

[1, 2] The principal reasons urged against the validity of the contract is that it lacks definiteness, certainty, and mutuality, in that it is claimed that it cannot be ascertained from the contract what period of time appellant was to refrain from transacting business in the allotted territory, nor the duration of the sales agency conferred upon respondent by appellant. However, the duration of the contract seems to be settled by the allegations in the answer hereinbefore set forth, which not only is conclusively presumed to be true for the purpose of this appeal, but is fully borne out by the testimony of the witnesses in the case.

[3] Such provisions for the duration of the contract are sufficiently certain and valid. As a general proposition the failure of an executory contract to state a time presently definite for its termination does not render it void for uncertainty. 13 Cal. Jur. p. 271. In Sutliff v. Seidenberg, 132 Cal. 63, 64 P. 131, the agreement was to remain in force "as long as our goods find ready sale on this coast," and the court said it was not so vaguely expressed as to be wholly unascertainable. In the case of Gallagher v. Equitable Gas & Light Co., 141 Cal. 699, 75 P. 329, the court upheld a contract wherein the defendant agreed to furnish plaintiff gas for lighting purposes for an indefinite length of time, and plaintiff, in reliance on the offer, agreed to take the gas to light his hotel, and expended considerable sums of money in installing necessary gas fixtures. The court upheld the contract, and ordered the defendant to furnish the plaintiff gas "as long as plaintiff will continue to operate and use the same in said hotel."

[4] Appellant cites, in support of its contention that the contract is invalid for uncertainty, the case of Kurtz v. De Johnson, 42 Cal. App. 221, 183 P. 588, in which case the court refused specifically to enforce a contract of personal service, on the ground that its uncertainty rendered it unfair in its terms, but that was an action in equity to compel specific performance of the contract for personal services, which is a distinguishing point from the case at bar, this being an action at law for damages for breach of contract. That a greater degree or amount of certainty is required in the terms of an agreement which is to be specifically executed in equity than is necessary in a contract which is the basis of an action at law for damages, is declared in the case of Durst v. Jolly, 35 Cal. App. 184, 169 P. 449:

> "The law does not favor but leans against the destruction of contracts because of uncertainty; and it will, if feasible, so construe agreements as to carry into effect the reasonable intentions of the parties if that can be ascertained."

See McIllmoil v. Frawley, 190 Cal. 546, 213 P. 971.

[5, 6] The objection that the agreement lacks mutuality is successfully met by the record, which shows that respondent obligated himself to do, and in compliance therewith did various things, such as to act as exclusive sales agent, make initial purchases of rods, to make additional purchases sufficient to supply the trade, to expend time and money in working up a demand for the goods; and it furthermore appears that the obligations were executed, and want of mutuality is no defense in the case of an executed contract. 13 Cal. Jur. p. 334; Los Angeles Traction Co. v. Wilshire, 135 Cal. 654, 67 P. 1086.

[7] Section 3283 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Damages may be awarded, in a judicial proceeding, for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, or certain to result in the future."

Under this provision, proof of damage extends to all matters up to the time of verdict, which are the net result of wrongs done, and in this action, the theory of the plaintiff was, and with which the court agreed, that the termination of the contract and the repudiation of its promise by the defendant constituted a breach of the contract. A leading case upon this point is Hicks v. Drew, 117 Cal. 305, 49 P. 189, wherein the court, speaking of section 3283 of the Civil Code, said:

> "By this section of the Code, plaintiff was entitled to recover damages suffered subsequent to the filing of the complaint. * * * Neither was a supplemental pleading necessary to support such a recovery."

In Bryson v. McCone, 121 Cal. 153, 53 P. 637, the court says:

> "Damages which accrued after the suit was commenced were properly allowed. The plaintiff could not maintain another suit for damages which resulted from the breach which had already occurred. This cause of action was complete when the suit was begun, and the damages proved were the natural and necessary consequence of the wrong."

[8, 9] The final point urged by appellant is that they should be relieved from the default taken against them for failure to appear at the time of trial. Appellant moved for relief from the default judgment under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The briefs of the parties contained substantially all of the material evidence submitted to the trial court on this motion. All of the affidavits which were before the trial court are brought before this court for review, and the material portions of the oral testimony offered in support and in resistance of said motion are also brought to the attention of this court. The gist of appellant's motion, both in the trial court and on this appeal, seems to be that the confusion which occurred with reference to the filing of the substitution of attorneys was brought about through no negligence or culpability chargeable to defendant, and that the defendant was, through no fault of its own, prevented from being represented at the trial and from having its day in court by this misunderstanding. The trial court found, however, as a matter of fact, upon conflicting testimony, that defendant was not blameless in the matter of this substitution. Appellant endeavors to impress the court with the fact that the defendant and its agent were in nowise negligent, and seek to lay the blame upon a former attorney of defendant, stating that the substitution had been signed by the defendant and forwarded to the attorney, by whom it was received, and then, through the negligence of the attorney, lost or failed to find its way into the files of the court. This is one of the sharply disputed facts in the case, and the trial court on that issue of fact found against the contention of the appellant. Appellant is in no position to urge this court to believe a fact which the trial court found to be untrue. It is for the court below to say which it shall accept as the truth. It is fundamental that the grounds of relief from a default lawfully taken is a matter of discretion with the trial court, which will not be interfered with on appeal, unless an abuse of discretion is clearly shown.

We have carefully read and examined the affidavits and testimony offered in support of the motion to set aside the default, but we do not find that the court below abused its discretion.

From an examination of all of the authorities and the records in this case, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. BLACK. (Cr. 1582.)★

Rehearing Denied March 1, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 9, 1928.

1. Criminal law 🔑997—Court denying motion to dismiss amended petition for writ of error coram nobis was not bound to issue writ as prayed for.

Where defendant after conviction and sentence petitioned for writ of error coram nobis and thereafter filed an amended petition, court, in denying motion to dismiss amended petition, was not bound to issue writ as prayed for, where denial of motion to dismiss was not final determination of matter.

2. Criminal law 🔑1144(17)—In absence of record, it must be presumed that defendant was given hearing on amended petition for writ of error coram nobis.

Where, after sentence and conviction, defendant petitioned for writ of error coram nobis, and in hearing thereon testified as witness and introduced evidence and moved for permission to file amended petition, which was granted and case continued, since he was required to present any further evidence he had in support of amended petition at hearing, and since the record includes no statement of evidence received in superior court, it must be presumed that court denied writ after hearing evidence as shown by minute order.

3. Criminal law 🔑1141(2)—Record presented must be sufficient to enable reviewing court to determine if error was committed.

It is appellant's duty to present to reviewing court a record which will enable it to determine whether error has been committed.

7. Criminal law ⚷997—Writ of error coram nobis could not be invoked where petitioner made false statements to shield party promising to pay his fine.

Where defendant on plea of guilty of selling intoxicating liquor was sentenced to fine and imprisonment, he could not invoke writ of error coram nobis, alleging his plea of guilty was entered through duress, fraud, and deception, where, in accordance with prearranged plan, defendant made false statements to court concerning charge in endeavor to shield his employer, who had promised to pay his fine.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

S. H. Black was, on plea of guilty of selling intoxicating liquor, sentenced to pay fine and imprisonment. Writ of error coram nobis was denied, and he appeals. Affirmed. See, also, 264 P. 346.

Joseph Seymour, of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Appellant was accused by information filed by the district attorney of selling intoxicating liquor. He entered a plea of guilty on July 6, 1927, and on July 9, 1927, was sentenced to imprisonment for six months. On July 25, 1927, he filed in the superior court of Riverside county a petition for a writ of error coram nobis, in which he set forth that his plea of guilty had been entered by him "through the agency of duress, fraud, and deception." He alleged that one William Rush had been his employer at the Oasis pool hall in the city of Blythe; that Rush had told him before the entry of his plea that, if he would state to the court that he (appellant) had a lease on the premises and was running the business where the liquor was alleged to have been sold, it would avoid implicating the said Rush; that he (Rush) would pay any fine that would be imposed; and that appellant would not receive a jail sentence. The petition further sets forth:

> "And he, your petitioner, believing that the said William Rush would be able to do the things that he said he would do, all of which were believed by your petitioner which have hereinbefore been related and all of which the said William Rush has failed to do and all of which William Rush was without right of authority to promise to do or to perform and all of which the said William Rush knew, all of which was a deception upon your petitioner and all of which caused your petitioner to make the statements which he did make in the superior court, county and state aforesaid. Your petitioner further states, avers, and alleges the facts to be that the statements made by him in such superior court were inaccurate and untrue and caused the court to render a judgment which it did upon an assumed existence of fact and condition which in truth did not exist and the nonexistence of which would have prevented the rendition of a judgment that was rendered."

It appears from the clerk's transcript that on July 26, 1927, the petition came regularly on for hearing, at which time appellant testified as a witness and certain documentary evidence was admitted. The cause was argued and petitioner's attorney moved for permission to file an amended petition. The motion was granted and the matter continued to August 5, 1927. An amended petition was filed on July 30th, to which an answer was filed by the district attorney on August 5, 1927. A motion to dismiss the amended petition was filed by the district attorney on August 5th. The record shows that this motion was argued and denied on August 5, 1927, whereupon the court made an order that the matter be continued to August 11, 1927, "for further hearing." The minutes of August 11th show that the motion for a writ was argued and submitted. Nothing further appears to have been done until October 8, 1927, at which time this minute order appears:

> "This matter having heretofore come on regularly for hearing and the court having heard the testimony of witnesses, and arguments of counsel and having taken said matter under submission for further consideration. Therefore the court at this time renders its decision in open court and orders that the writ of error coram nobis be and the same is hereby denied. Petitioner at this time through his counsel gives notice of appeal. * * *"

[1] In appellant's brief appears this statement:

> "As heretofore stated, there is only one question involved, and it is this: When an amended petition for a writ of error coram nobis has been held sufficient or where a motion to dismiss the same has been denied, is the superior court bound and obliged to issue the writ of error coram nobis as prayed for in said amended petition?"

It is argued that the denial of the motion of the district attorney to dismiss the petition left no course open for the court to pursue other than to grant the writ. With this contention we cannot agree. The denial of the motion to dismiss was not a final determination of the matter. The court still retained jurisdiction of the petition which was still pending. At the time of the denial of the motion, the court might have wanted to consider the matter further; or it might have concluded that the proper procedure would be to deny the writ by minute order rather than to grant the motion to dismiss. The denial of the motion might be likened to the overruling of a demurrer, an act which would not prevent the court from sustaining an objection to the introduction of any evidence at the trial on the ground of insufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action.

[2, 3] Although appellant states that the only question involved in this appeal is the one which we have just given consideration, a careful reading of his brief discloses that he makes complaint that he has not been given a hearing upon his amended petition. The record discloses, however, that on July 26th he was given a hearing and evidence introduced, including the testimony of appellant himself. After the answer to the amended petition was filed, the matter was continued to August 11th "for further hearing." The record is silent as to whether there was further evidence introduced or offered. If appellant had any further evidence to present to the court it was his duty to offer it at the time provided for the hearing or make appropriate showing of his desire to do so at some other time. Appellant has not furnished this court with a statement of the evidence received in the superior court. For aught that appears it may have fully covered all the issues and fully justified the ruling of the court. It is the duty of appellant to present to this court a record which will enable us to determine if error has been committed. In the absence of such a record, it must be presumed that the action of the lower court was correct. Moreover, a comparison of the petition with the amended petition discloses that the facts upon which appellant seeks relief were sufficiently set forth in the original petition. The main reason for the filing of the amended petition seems to have been the desire on the part of the appellant to retract or explain certain statements he made to the court under oath at the time of the hearing on July 26th. This is apparent from the following statements taken from the amended petition:

> "Petitioner further states and alleges the fact to be that on July 25, 1927, in department 2, superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Riverside, the Honorable W. H. Ellis, judge presiding, your petitioner did take the stand and testify all of which is well known to the court. Your petitioner further shows and states that at the time, as is well known, he was greatly overcome by grief and weight of conscience, that, while he understood a great deal of what was said and addressed to him, he was for much of the time while he was on the witness stand confused, and in a state of mind that did not permit him to function normally and as evidence of this fact your petitioner states that this is the first time that he ever was in any court except once as a witness, and he draws to the court's attention the fact that A. M. Haynes, the official court reporter, had great difficulty in understanding what your petitioner was endeavoring to say. Your petitioner further states and alleges the fact to be that he did make an answer to a question propounded to him by the district attorney in the matter of his conscience and that he did reply in the negative thereto that such was by no means his intention, that one of the principal factors in the matter of this your petitioner's petition was to relieve your petitioner's conscience. Your petitioner further states, alleges, and avers the fact to be that he is not a man of extended education, that he did not understand what was meant by the terms 'coerce' and 'duress.' Your petitioner further states that he did not make it clear he is satisfied, that it was not his purpose to protect William Rush and keep him out of jail and keep him from having to pay a fine, but that the real agency which governed your petitioner's conduct was the wholesome fear of the dire results that would result to your petitioner if he did not do as the said William Rush directed and demanded."

[4, 5] A trial by jury of the issues presented by the petition was demanded by appellant on August 1, 1927. He now contends that the denial of the jury trial was error. This is not a proceeding in which a jury trial can be demanded as a matter of right. Moreover, the request for trial by jury came too late, the hearing having been commenced and evidence received before the jury was requested.

[6, 7] There is another and very good reason why the petition should be denied, for the facts as shown by the petition itself disclose that this is a case in which it would not be proper to grant the writ. Both the original and amended petitions contain this statement:

> "Your petitioner further states, avers, and alleges the facts to be that the statements made by him in such superior court were inaccurate and untrue and caused the court to render a judgment which it did upon an assumed existence of fact and condition which in truth did not exist and the nonexistence of which would have prevented the rendition of a judgment that was rendered."

While it is well settled that the writ of error coram nobis may be invoked to correct an error of fact upon a proper showing that the error was occasioned by duress or fraud, the writ cannot be invoked in a case in which the petitioner is a party to the fraud. Here it is alleged that an individual not clothed with the authoriy of an officer of the law induced petitioner to believe that he would receive only a fine, which would be paid by some one else. Believing that the judge would be lenient, he pleaded guilty, and, in accordance with the prearranged plan, made false statements to the court concerning the charge in an endeavor to shield the party who had promised to pay his fine. In such a case the writ should not be granted.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

S. H. Black pleaded guilty in justice court to possession of intoxicating liquor, and was sentenced to pay fine or be imprisoned. Defendant's petition for writ of error coram nobis was denied by the superior court, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 264 P. 343.

Joseph Seymour, of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. A complaint was issued by the justice of the peace of Riverside township, in which the appellant was accused of the possession of intoxicating liquor. To this charge he entered a plea of guilty on July 5, 1927, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $500 or be imprisoned six months. The fine not being paid, he was remanded to the custody of the sheriff. A petition for a writ of error coram nobis was filed by appellant in the superior court of Riverside county on July 25, 1927, in which he sought to vacate the judgment of the justice court on the ground, as alleged, that he had entered his plea through duress and fraud. He set forth in his petition that one William Rush, his employer, had induced him to enter the plea of guilty upon Rush's assurance that only a light fine would be imposed, which Rush would pay. Upon his plea of guilty he made untrue statements to the court, in which he falsely exonerated Rush from responsibility in the matter of the possession of the liquor. The superior court made an order on October 8, 1927, denying the writ, and, from this order, petitioner appeals.

[1, 2] In his petition to the superior court appellant asks for a "writ of error coram nobis." This term is not accurately used. The writ coram nobis is issued from a court to correct certain errors of fact made in the court that issues the writ. The writ coram vobis is issued to correct certain errors of fact made in an inferior tribunal. Therefore the writ in the present case should have been termed "coram vobis." However, the two terms have been used interchangeably by good authority, and we feel justified in regarding the matter as if the proper nomenclature had been used.

This case might be called a companion case to People v. Black (Crim. No. 1582) 264 P. 343, in which our opinion is this day filed. In that case a plea of guilty was entered in the superior court, while in the instant case the plea was entered in the justice's court. In both cases relief was sought in the superior court on the same day; the allegations of the facts upon which relief is sought are the same in both cases; and the superior court took the same action in both cases. The reasons for our disposition of the matter are set forth in the opinion filed in case No. 1582.

For the reasons therein given, the order in the present case should be and is affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert and B. P. Gibbs, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. G. Van Pelt, of Los Angeles, and William R. Miller, for respondents.

PULLEN, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment upon a verdict awarding plaintiffs and respondents damages for personal injuries sustained by the respondent Rose Crosby while riding as a passenger for hire in a motorbus operated by appellant as a result of the negligent operation of the stage by appellant.

The points on this appeal are based upon an instruction, requested by respondent and given by the court, which appellant contends is erroneous, and also that such instruction is in conflict with other instructions given by the court and tended to confuse and mislead the jury to the prejudice of the defendant.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

†Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

This case is a companion case with another action arising out of the same accident, entitled "John J. Schropshire v. Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, a Corporation, et al.," reported in 258 P. 1107, and the same points here urged were there very carefully and fully briefed and considered therein and no good purpose would be accomplished in a further review of the points.

Therefore, upon the authority of Schropshire v. Pickwick Stages, etc., supra, the judgment is affirmed.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action to recover personal property and damages by C. Martin against John Doe Feigenberg and another doing business under the firm name of Feigenberg Bros. and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 264 P. 478.

John T. Wentz, of San Leandro, for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Action brought to recover possession of certain personal property of the alleged value of $1,250, and for $10,000 damages for the unlawful detention thereof. Plaintiff claimed to have been in possession of said personal property by virtue of a lease from C. H. Coddington, the owner thereof, and that defendants, on the 15th day of June, 1925, without plaintiff's consent and wrongfully, entered upon the premises on which said personal property was situated, and removed the same therefrom. The defendant Bercovich asserted title to said personal property through an execution sale thereof in an action wherein E. Sorensen was plaintiff and the said C. H. Coddington was defendant; that at said sale, held on June 15, 1925, the defendants Feigenberg Bros. became the purchasers of said personal property, and immediately thereafter sold the same to defendant Bercovich. The court rendered judgment for defendants and plaintiff has appealed.

[1, 2] The writ of execution under which said property was sold is the same writ which was the subject of consideration by the District Court of Appeal, First District, First Division, in the case of Sorensen v. Coddington (Cal. App.) 249 P. 37. From the facts stated in the opinion therein it appears that the appellant herein, although not a party to said action of Sorensen v. Coddington, after the rendition of the adverse judgment from which the present appeal was taken, made a motion in the superior court of Alameda county where said action of Sorensen v. Coddington was pending, to set aside said writ, which motion was denied. Thereafter the defendant Coddington made a similar motion, which was also denied. However, after the denial of said motions, by an agreement between Sorensen, Coddington, Feigenberg Bros., and Bercovich and their attorneys, said writ of execution was annulled, and said personal property, or a large portion of it, was returned to Martin, the appellant herein. It does not appear, however, from the report of said action that Martin was a party to said agreement. It does appear, however, that he appealed from the order of court denying his motion to vacate said order of execution, and that this said appeal was dismissed on the ground that the question, to determine which said appeal had been taken—that is, the validity of said writ of execution—had, by the subsequent order entered upon the stipulation of the parties to said action annulling the same, become moot. It appears, therefore, from the decision of the District Court dismissing said appeal, in which all of the parties hereto were parties, that the writ of execution under which the personal property was sold, which is sought to be recovered in this action, was vacated, and the greater part of said personal property was returned to appellant herein. Appellant, however, by this action seeks to recover all of said personal property and damages for the detention of the same. Therefore, the return of a portion of said personal property only did not satisfy appellant's claim to the whole thereof and damages for the detention of the same. Accordingly, the subsequent proceedings taken in the case of Sorensen v. Coddington, which resulted in a portion of said personal property being returned to appellant, did not have the effect of rendering moot the questions arising in this action, nor of defeating the appellant's right to recover herein. On the other hand, they somewhat strengthen appellant's position regarding his right to the possession of all of said personal property, for by those proceedings the writ of execution under which the respondents claim they purchased said property was annulled by the court by agreement of said respondents, which must be conclusive on the respondents that the same was void, and of no force or effect. Were this the only barrier which stands between the appellant and his success on this appeal, it would be our duty to grant him the relief asked for herein.

[3, 4] But appellant bases his right to recover possession of said personal property, and damages for its retention, upon the allegations of his complaint that defendants "without plaintiff's consent and wrongfully and unlawfully entered upon the premises above described so belonging to plaintiff, and forcibly and wrongfully entered the building in which said personal property was located and removed the same from said premises." This allegation of the complaint was denied by respondents, who also pleaded that appellant was estopped from asserting any right, title, claim, or interest in said personal property by reason of his conduct prior to, during, and subsequent to, the sale of said personal property and the purchase thereof by the respondents. Upon these issues the court found for the respondents. There is no question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the court. In brief, the evidence shows that before the issuance of said purported writ of execution the appellant informed the attorney for Sorensen, the plaintiff in said action, that said personal property was in his possession, and that it belonged to Coddington, the judgment debtor in said action. Thereupon the attorney suggested that he would have execution issued in said action, and levy upon and sell said personal property under said writ of execution. This was done, and appellant was present at said sale, and made no claim to said personal property. The purchasers at said sale were respondents Feigenberg Bros., who bid $130, and said property was sold to them for said sum. They afterwards sold the same to the respondent Bercovich. Bercovich, about a week before the sale under the execution, visited the appellant, and the latter pointed out the personal property which he now claims, and, in answer to a question asked by Bercovich as to whether he (appellant) was interested in it, the latter replied: "I don't want this junk. I am not interested in it," and, after the sale, the appellant disconnected the pumps (a portion of the personal property claimed was a number of pumps used at gasoline filling stations) and helped load them and the other personal property upon a truck which the respondent Bercovich had sent to appellant's place of business for the purpose of removing said personal property from the premises of appellant. This evidence, as we have said before, is ample to support respondents' plea of estoppel. It also disproves the allegations of appellant's complaint that the property was taken from him without his consent. It shows, on the other hand, that appellant not only acquiesced in its taking, but that he disclaimed any interest in it, and assisted in its removal. Under this state of facts the appellant has no legal claim for damages for the taking of said personal property from his possession, nor for the detention thereof by the respondent Bercovich.

MARTIN v. HOOD et al. (S. F. 12076.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 7, 1928.

1. Attorney and client ⚷129(2)—Complaint of client demanding assignment of notes purchased by attorney held insufficient in not alleging tender of consideration paid by attorney.

Complaint alleging that attorneys were employed by plaintiff to prepare lease and assumed trust relationship, and that they advised plaintiff against purchase of lien notes, and that one of them purchased such notes 18 months after employment for valuable consideration, and praying that they be required to assign such notes to plaintiff, held insufficient to state cause of action, since it at most showed that attorney was involuntary trustee, and did not allege tender of consideration paid for notes.

2. Attorney and client ⚷129(2)—Complaint of client alleging attorneys' advice and acts and demanding damages held insufficient for failure to show damage (Civ. Code, § 3440).

Complaint, alleging that attorneys employed by plaintiff advised him not to file notice of intended sale under Civ. Code, § 3440, and that property leased to him was sold under execution issued on judgment against third party obtained on publication of summons without attaching property, in action wherein one of said attorneys represented the plaintiff, and demanding damages from attorneys, held insufficient to state cause of action, since showing that judgment was void, and hence that sale was void, and that plaintiff sustained no damage.

3. Pleading 🔑18—Complaint of client seeking assignment of notes from attorneys and damages based on their advice and acts held uncertain in alleging professional relation (Civ. Code, § 3440).

Complaint, alleging that attorneys were employed by plaintiff to prepare lease, and at all times thereafter mentioned remained plaintiff's attorneys, that they advised plaintiff against purchasing notes, and that 18 months after employment one of attorneys himself purchased notes, and that they advised plaintiff against filing notice under Civ. Code, § 3440, and that property leased to plaintiff was subsequently taken under execution issued at instance of one of attorneys and demanding assignment of notes held uncertain in alleging professional relation.

4. Pleading 🔑18—Complaint of client seeking assignment of notes by attorneys held uncertain in alleging date of attorneys' advice.

Complaint, alleging that attorneys were employed by plaintiff to prepare lease and assumed trust relationship, and that they advised plaintiff against purchase of lien notes, and that one of them, 18 months after employment, purchased such notes, and praying that they be required to assign them to plaintiff, held insufficient as uncertain in alleging date when attorneys gave advice.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action to compel transfer of promissory notes and to recover damages brought by C. Martin against J. E. Hood and another, as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Hood & Smith, and individually. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 264 P. 477.

John T. Wentz, of San Leandro, for appellant.

Calkins, Hagar, Hall & Linforth, of San Francisco, and Edward J. Smith, of Oakland (William W. Hoffman, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondents.

CURTIS, J. The first amended complaint in this action (which we will hereafter refer to as the complaint) purported to set forth two causes of action against the two defendants, each of which was separately stated and set out in a different or separate count. The defendants appeared separately, and each filed both a general and special demurrer to each cause of action set forth in said first amended complaint. The court sustained both demurrers, with leave for plaintiff to amend. Plaintiff chose to stand upon his pleading, and, no amendment thereto having been filed, the court rendered judgment in favor of defendants. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The first count of the complaint set forth that the defendants were at all of the times mentioned therein attorneys at law, licensed to practice in this state, and were copartners doing business and practicing law as such attorneys under the firm name of Hood & Smith, with offices in the city of Oakland; that on or about October 19, 1923, plaintiff retained and employed said firm of attorneys to advise him and to prepare the necessary legal instruments required for the purchase of the Bungalow Garage, and for a lease of the real property upon which said garage business was being carried on and the personal property used therein; that, by virtue of said employment, defendants prepared a lease to said premises and to said personal property, which was executed by the parties thereto, and that plaintiff thereupon purchased said business, and entered into possession of said real property and the personal property used in connection with the operation of said Bungalow Garage, said personal property, consisting not only of a stock of oils, greases, tires, and garage supplies, but also of a stock of groceries; that said purchase was made and said lease was obtained from the former owner of said real property and business, one Charles H. Coddington, and by virtue of said employment said defendants "became the attorneys for plaintiff, and assumed a relation of trust and confidence to this plaintiff, and that at all times thereafter and in this complaint mentioned said defendants remained, and were, plaintiff's attorneys, confidential advisers and trusted agents in all matters in relation to the transaction hereinafter set out"; that under said lease plaintiff entered into the possession of said property, performed all covenants of said lease on his part to be performed, and ever since and does now occupy the said real property [the above allegations are set forth in paragraphs I to V of the first count of the complaint]; that, at the time of said negotiations and of the execution of said lease, said real property was subject to two trust deeds, one to secure the payment of a promissory note for $2,500 in favor of Bank of San Leandro, and the other to secure a promissory note of $188.57 in favor of F. I. Lemos; that defendants, by reason of their employment by plaintiff, learned of the existence of said trust deeds; that plaintiff notified defendants that he was able, ready, willing, and desired to purchase said notes secured by said trust deeds, but was advised by defendants not to do so, and that, relying upon such advice, he did not purchase said notes, but that he would have done so except for the advice given him by defendants; that thereafter, and between May 14, 1925, and June 5, 1925, the defendant J. E. Hood secretly and without plaintiff's consent and against plaintiff's will purchased the notes secured by said deeds of trust, respectively, and still continues to hold the same against plaintiff's will and consent; that immediately after the 5th day of June, 1925, plaintiff demanded of defendants that they assign to plaintiff said notes upon the payment to them of the actual amount expended by defendants in the purchase thereof; that defendants have refused, and still refuse, to assign to plaintiff said notes or either of them; that the value of the real property given to secure said notes is $7,500, and that defendant Hood purchased said notes for a sum not exceeding $2,300. The second count of said complaint incorporates and makes paragraphs I to V of the first count of the complaint a part of said second count. It is then alleged in said second count that plaintiff was advised by his attorneys that no "Notice of Intended Sale" as provided by section 3440 of the Civil Code need be recorded, and for this reason plaintiff did not execute or record any such notice in the office of the county recorder; that a short time after plaintiff took possession of said real and personal property a portion of said personal property was levied upon and sold under an execution issued in the case of Sorensen v. Coddington (Cal. App.) 249 P. 37, which execution was issued under a judgment rendered in said action upon the publication of summons, and not by personal service thereof upon the defendant in said action, and without any prior attachment being issued or levied upon said personal property; that said defendant Smith was the attorney for the plaintiff in said action, and caused said personal property to be levied upon and sold under said writ of execution; that said personal property was then and there forcibly taken and removed from plaintiff's place of business, and from plaintiff's possession, without plaintiff's consent and against his will, and plaintiff has ever since been deprived of the use and possession of said personal property; that the value of said personal property was the sum of $930.87, and plaintiff, by reason of the removal of said personal property as aforesaid, has been damaged in the sum of $10,000. The prayer of the complaint is for judgment against the said defendants and each of them for the sum of $10,930.87, for a decree of the court that plaintiff is the absolute owner of said two promissory notes; that defendants have no right, title, or interest in said notes or either of them; that defendants be required to transfer to plaintiff said notes, and defendants have not "any right or rights ordinarily existing in favor of a trustee or trustees and that the said defendants are not, nor is either one of them entitled to reimbursement from this plaintiff of any money or monies expended by said defendants, or either of them in the procuring of the assignments of the deeds of trust and notes in the manner aforesaid," and for general relief and costs.

The demurrer of the defendant Hood was both general and special. The general demurrer was directed against each count of the complaint and the complaint as a whole. His special demurrer specifies that the complaint was uncertain, in that it could not be ascertained therefrom "how or in what manner or by what arrangement defendants Hood & Smith became or were, as alleged in paragraph III of the first alleged cause of action * * * 'at all times thereafter and in this complaint mentioned, said defendants remained and were plaintiff's attorneys, confidential advisers, and trusted agents, in all matters in relation to transactions hereinafter set out' "; nor could it be ascertained from said complaint how or in what manner plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $10,000. The special demurrer also set forth that the complaint was ambiguous and unintelligible for the same reason that it was alleged to be uncertain.

The general demurrer of the defendant Smith was directed against each count of the complaint. It also specified that the complaint was uncertain, in that it could not be ascertained therefrom when plaintiff advised defendants that he was able, ready, and willing and desired to purchase said notes, and when plaintiff was advised by defendants not to purchase the same. The special demurrer of Smith also set forth that the complaint was ambiguous and unintelligible, for the reason that it was alleged to be uncertain. Other grounds of uncertainty were specified in the special demurrer of Smith, but we deem it unnecessary to refer to them.

[1] The first count of the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and the general demurrers interposed thereto were properly sustained. It seeks to compel an assignment to plaintiff of the two promissory notes purchased by the defendant Hood, and which were secured by deeds of trust upon the real property leased by plaintiff without payment by plaintiff to said defendant of the amount paid by said defendant for said promissory notes. Plaintiff seeks to bring himself within the rule laid down in McArthur v. Goodwin, 173 Cal. 499, 160 P. 679, in which action it was held that, where an attorney representing the plaintiff had, during the pendency of an action, fraudulently purchased certain tax deeds to the real property which was the subject of litigation, he was not entitled to be reimbursed for any money expended by him in making such purchase, before the client's title to said real property would be quieted against the claims of the attorney by reason of the purchase by him of said tax deeds. In the present action, the defendants did not represent the plaintiff in any pending action, but, so far as the complaint shows, were employed simply to prepare a lease of the real and personal property which plaintiff contemplated acquiring. He desired to purchase the two outstanding liens against the real property, represented by the two trust deeds, in order to protect the lease which he was then acquiring, but was advised against said action by the defendant Smith. There is no allegation that this advice was not, at the time, the proper advice to be given under the circumstances then existing. Neither is there any allegation that the then owners of said promissory notes were willing to sell or assign them. Some 18 months thereafter the defendant Hood purchased these two promissory notes for a valuable consideration. At most, defendant Hood might be held to be an involuntary trustee of said notes, and in a proper proceeding compelled to assign them to plaintiff upon tender and payment of the consideration paid by him for the same. No such a proceeding is before us. No tender is alleged, and the complaint is drawn upon the theory that defendants are in duty bound to assign said promissory notes to the plaintiff without payment by plaintiff of the consideration paid for said notes by defendants. Plaintiff alleges that he demanded of defendants a transfer and assignment to him of said notes upon payment by him of the actual amounts of money expended by defendants, but that defendants refused to make such assignments. This refusal may have been based upon plaintiff's refusal to pay defendants the amount expended by them. The allegation of demand contained in the complaint is not equivalent to, nor can it be considered a substitute for, an allegation of tender.

[2] We will now take up for consideration the general demurrers to the second count of the complaint. It appears from the face of said complaint that the purported writ of execution under which plaintiff claims the personal property covered by his lease was sold was absolutely void, as it was issued in pursuance of a judgment obtained in said action by publication of summons, and without any attachment of the personal property claimed by plaintiff. The sale, therefore, under said writ of execution was void, and the purchaser at such sale took no interest by virtue thereof to any of said personal property. Plaintiff, therefore, would have had a right of action against the officer making said purported sale, and also against the purchasers thereunder for the removal of said property from the possession of plaintiff. The plaintiff sustained no injury, therefore, by reason of defendants' advice to him not to file a notice of intended sale, as provided by section 3440 of the Civil Code. Neither was he damaged by any action taken by the defendants in the action of Sorensen v. Coddington. Plaintiff was by none of these acts deprived of any right possessed by him in said personal property. This complaint was, therefore, subject to a general demurrer. Before leaving this subject, we wish to call attention to the fact that this is the same writ of execution involved in the action of Martin v. Feigenberg (S. F. No. 12020) 264 P. 477, this day decided. That action was brought by plaintiff against the purchasers of this same personal property to recover possession of the same and damages for its detention upon the ground that said writ of attachment was void, for the reason that there was no personal service of summons in said action. We sustained this contention of plaintiff, but affirmed the judgment against him in the action of Martin v. Feigenberg, for the reason that the trial court found in said action that plaintiff was estopped from claiming the possession of said personal property, in that he had encouraged the purchasers to bid at such sale, consented to its removal from his premises, and actually assisted in loading the same upon a truck sent by the purchasers for the purpose of removing said property from plaintiff's premises. There was ample evidence to sustain this finding, and for that reason we were compelled to affirm the judgment based thereon.

date when such advice was given him would compel the defendants to meet this evidence of the plaintiff without any previous notice as to just what might be required of them. Of course, we do not mean to hold that the exact date is material, or should be alleged in the complaint, but plaintiff should be required to set forth at least an approximate date on which he claims defendants advised him on the subject of the purchase of the notes.

The demurrers having been properly sustained, and the plaintiff having refused to amend within the time allowed by the court for that purpose, the judgment should be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

UNITED BANK & TRUST CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. BROWN et ux. (Sac. 3913.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 8, 1928.

1. Mortgages 🔑356—Sale under trust deed held void for failure to post notice required by amended statute, though deed, executed before amendment, provided for notice required by law (Code Civ. Proc. § 692, as amended by St. 1923, p. 754; Civ. Code, § 2924).

Sale under trust deed held void for failure to post notice of sale on property as required by 1923 amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 692 (St. 1923, p. 754), notwithstanding that trust deed, which was executed before such amendment, provided, in conformity with Civ. Code, § 2924, for notice of sale in manner required by law, since such provision must be interpreted to mean law existing at time of enforcement.

2. Constitutional law 🔑191—Legislature held authorized to amend statute governing sale under trust deed to require posting of notice on property sold (Code Civ. Proc. § 692, as amended by St. 1923, p. 754).

1923 amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 692 (St. 1923, p. 754), governing sale of real property under trust deed, requiring that notice of sale should be posted on property to be sold, held purely remedial and procedural provision which was within power of Legislature, since it merely designated place on which one of notices required under statute as it read prior to amendment should be posted.

3. Mortgages 🔑330—Amending statute governing sale under trust deed held not retroactive in applying to enforcement of deed executed before its enactment (Code Civ. Proc. § 692, as amended by St. 1923, p. 754).

1923 amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 692 (St. 1923, p. 754), requiring that notice of sale under trust deed should be posted on property to be sold, held not retroactive in application to remedies yet to be invoked at time of its adoption, where contract of parties contemplated such change in statutory procedure as might occur prior to enforcement of obligation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by the United Bank & Trust Company of California against C. Walter Brown and wife to foreclose a deed of trust. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louttit, Stewart & Louttit, of Stockton, for appellant.

O. C. Parkinson and Parkinson & Parkinson, all of Stockton, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the defendants' favor. The complaint in the action was in two counts, each relating to a different cause of action. In the first alleged cause of action the plaintiff sought to recover a balance due upon two promissory notes dated, respectively, January 13, 1920, and April 6, 1920, each of said notes being secured by a deed of trust executed by C. Walter Brown, the maker of said notes and the defendant and respondent herein. On May 7, 1924, notice of default in the payment of said notes and of election to sell the property described in said trust deed was filed pursuant to the terms thereof. Notices of such sale were published and were also posted on August 13, 1924, and the sale of the property was had thereunder on September 10, 1924. It is for the balance alleged to remain due upon said notes after such sale and the application toward the payment of the toal amount due upon said notes that the plaintiff counts upon in its first alleged cause of action. The second count or cause of action arises out of a similar transaction, being for a balance due upon two other notes dated, respectively, November 14, 1919, and May 10, 1922, and which were also secured by a deed of trust, the sale under which was conducted at the same time and upon the same notices as those published and posted upon the sale under the first trust deed. The defense which the said defendant urged in his pleadings and upon the trial related to an alleged insufficiency in the notices given of the sale of his property under each of these deeds of trust, and which, as he contended and here contends, rendered the said sales thereunder void and hence this action as to both its counts premature and nonmaintainable. The trial court found in the defendants' favor upon the defense and gave judgment accordingly against the plaintiff upon both causes of action.

[1] The question thus presented upon appeal arises out of the following situation: At the time these promissory notes were given and the trust deeds securing them were executed, respectively, the latter each contained a provision that in case of default in the payment of said promissory notes the beneficiary under said trust deeds "shall record in the office of the recorder in the county wherein said property or some part thereof is situated a notice of such breach and of election to cause said property to be sold to satisfy said obligations. After three months shall have elapsed following said recordation of said notice the trustees, without demand on the parties of the first part shall sell said property in such parcels and at such times and places as they shall deem best to accomplish the objects of these trusts, having first given notice of the time and place of said sale in the manner and for the time not less than that required by law for sales of real property upon execution." At the time of the execution of said trust deeds containing the foregoing provision the manner provided and required by law for sales of real property upon execution was that embraced in section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure. By the terms of that section as it then read it was provided that "in case of sales of real property upon execution notice thereof must be given by posting the notice in the form required therein" for 20 days in three public places of the township or city where the property is situated and also where the property is to be sold, and publishing a copy thereof "for the period prescribed in said section." In the year 1923 (St. 1923, p. 754), however, this section of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended by the addition to its former language of the following proviso:

> "Provided that where real property is to be sold under the provisions of any deed of trust the copy of said notice shall be posted in some conspicuous place on the property to be sold at least twenty days before date of sale."

The sale of the property covered by the two deeds of trust above referred to was made in each case after the taking effect of the foregoing amendment, and it is an admitted fact on this appeal that in neither case was a copy of the notice of sale posted upon the property to be sold, respectively, under said trust deeds as required by the terms of said amendment. It was for that reason that the trial court held each of said sales under said trust deeds to have been void, and hence this action prematurely brought.

It is the contention of the appellant herein that since said trust deeds were executed prior to the amendment made to section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1923, and since said trust deeds contained the specific provision that the procedure for the sale of the property described therein should as to the notices of such sales be that required by law for sales of real property upon execution, and since the sales of said properties were conducted as to such notices in strict conformity to the provisions of said section of the Code relating to sales of real property under execution as said section read regarding such sales prior to said amendment and as said section still reads as to sales of real property under execution, these sales were valid notwithstanding the admitted fact that they were not conducted as to the notices thereof in conformity with the terms of the amendment to said section of the Code enacted in 1923. The appellant further contends that said amendment should not be given retroactive effect upon said trust deeds so as to change the procedure specifically agreed upon by the parties thereto with relation to the remedies to which the beneficiary thereunder was to be entitled in event of default. In making the first of these contentions the appellant seems to have lost sight of a quite well-established principle applicable to the interpretation of written instruments of the character of these trust deeds in so far as the remedies provided therein for their enforcement are concerned. That principle is this: That when parties to such instruments provide therein that as to the method of their enforcement it shall be in accordance either with law generally or with the terms of a particular procedural statute, the provisions in such instrument thus providing must be interpreted to mean the law or the statute in the form in which it exists at the time of such enforcement. The leading case upon this subject is that of James v. Stull, 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 482, and it has been followed generally by the courts of all states. Webb v. Lewis, 45 Minn. 285, 47 N. W. 803; Scott v. Dist. Court, 15 N. D. 259, 107 N. W. 61. The case of International B. & L. Ass'n v. Hardy, 86 Tex. 610, 26 S. W. 497, 24 L. R. A. 284, 40 Am. St. Rep. 870, upon which the appellant most strongly relies, recognizes the existence of this principle and, in fact, expressly restates it, but holds it inapplicable to the particular case before that court for the reason that the statute referred to in that case purported by its later amendment to change the time and place of the sale to be made under the trust deed there under review, and in so doing affected the period after default within which sales thereunder could be made. The case of Taylor v. Stearns (59 Va.) 18 Grat. 244, from which the appellant quotes extensively, resembles the Texas case above cited in the respect that the amended statute therein referred to suspended the time within which the beneficiary under the trust deed there in question could exercise his rights after default for a longer period than that provided for in the trust deed and thus affected the substantial rights of the parties to the trust deed. These cases have no application to the facts of the instant case, wherein the only question presented relates to the form of notice required for the trust sale.

[2] It is to be noted in this connection that the provisions in the trust deeds here under review are in exact conformity with the provisions of section 2924 of the Civil Code as that section read prior to its amendment in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 755) with respect to notices of sales of property under powers of sale conferred upon mortgagees, trustees, or other persons to be exercised after breach of the obligation which the mortgage or other transfer secures. This section of the Civil Code, in so far as it relates to notices of sales under mortgages and trust deeds, was in force at the time of the execution of the trust deeds here in question, and its provisions were incorporated in hæc verba in these trust deeds. This being so, we are of the opinion that the principle above referred to as declared in the cases of James v. Stull and Webb v. Lewis, above cited, is to be given full application to the case at bar, and hence that the amendment to section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure enacted in 1923, wherein it was expressly provided that in case of sales of real property under the provisions of a deed of trust a copy of the notice of such sale "shall be posted in some conspicuous place on the property to be sold," must be given application to sales under trust deeds subsequent to said amendment, and hence to the sales under the trust deeds assailed in this case. By such amendment no substantial rights of the parties were affected, nor was the time within which the contractual rights of the parties thereto either enlarged or diminished. The amendment merely designated a definite place upon which one of the notices required to be given under the statute as it read prior to such amendment should be posted. It was purely a remedial and procedural provision which did not enlarge, but only defined the duty of beneficiaries under deeds of trust as to the posting of notices of sale thereunder for the further protection of the obligors under such instruments. It was therefore such a change of the statute as to be not only within the power of the Legislature, but also to be held to be within the contemplation of the parties when they incorporated in these deeds of trust the provision substantially that sales thereunder were to be made in accordance with law.

[3] As to the second contention of the appellant that the amendment to section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure made in 1923 is not to be given retroactive effect, we think that such contention has been sufficiently answered by the views heretofore expressed in this opinion, since such a procedural amendment would not be retroactive in its application to remedies yet to be invoked at the time of the adoption thereof if, as herein held, the contracts of the parties contemplated such changes in statutory procedure as might occur prior to the enforcement of the obligation.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MARTINE v. INGALLS et al. (L. A. 9017.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 17, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(6)—Evidence of negligence of truck driver making right-hand turn and colliding with bicycle on which deceased was riding held insufficient for jury.

In action for death of minor, evidence that defendant's truck passed deceased child riding on bicycle about 150 feet from street intersection, that deceased continued on right side of truck, and that deceased was seen throwing up his arms when truck driver was proceeding to make right turn on wet pavement, but not showing failure to signal by truck driver, failed to show any facts from which inference of actionable negligence could be reasonably drawn or fix any legal responsibility for death on driver of truck, and hence judgment of nonsuit was properly rendered.

2. Negligence 🔑121(1), 134(2)—Negligence must be proved, though it may be established from facts and circumstances from which inference of negligence reasonably follows.

Negligence must be proved, and cannot be presumed, though it may be established by facts and circumstances from which inference of negligence reasonably follows.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Irving W. Martine against Carl Ingalls and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dorsey & Campbell, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Rowen Irwin and Rollin Laird, both of Bakersfield, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment of nonsuit entered in an action brought by Irving W. Martine against Carl Ingalls in his personal capacity and also as doing business under the firm name and style of Commercial Transfer Company to recover damages for the death of his son, John Irving Martine, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the respondent on the 3d day of March, 1924.

At the time of his untimely death, the youth was but a few months past 16 years of age, and he was employed in the messenger service of the Western Union Telegraph Company, at the city of Bakersfield, this state. While thus employed he was crushed to death upon being thrown from or after falling from a bicycle which he had been riding, by a truck drawing a trailer, operated by R. L. Verrell, an employee of respondent, passing over his body.

At the time the accident occurred, the paved roadbed was wet from intermittent showers. The accident, as recounted by the witnesses, occurred while both the driver of the truck and the deceased were traveling northerly on Union street, near the point where said street is intersected by Sumner street. The combined length of the truck, coupling, and trailer was approximately 50 feet. The course of the truck was northerly upon Union street to Sumner street and thence easterly upon said Sumner street. The truck passed the deceased to the left some 150 feet distant from the southerly line of Sumner street and continued its course until within a position to make a right turn into Sumner street. The driver was proceeding to make the turn when the youth, who was riding at the right of the truck near the rear wheels, was seen to throw up his arms and apparently clutching at the side of the truck went down beneath its wheels and was instantly killed. Two persons, seemingly disinterested witnesses, gave testimony as to what they saw. Their positions were not such as to enable them to give a very satisfactory account as to the proximate cause of the fatality. Neither was able to say that the driver of the truck did not give a timely signal of his intention to turn to the right into Sumner street upon approaching it. Neither saw him give a signal. One of said witnesses did not observe the driver of the truck with respect to the question of signals until the proper time to give a signal had passed, while the other, who doubtless observed the driver in a casual way only, said that he did not see the driver indicate with his hand his intention to turn into Sumner street, but he would not say that a signal was not given. The evidence, so far as any was given on the subject, was to the effect that the truck passed the youth some distance south of Sumner street, moving at the rate of 12 or 15 miles per hour. Just what the position of the youth was with relation to the truck immediately upon being overtaken by it cannot be definitely determined. It does appear, however, that he did not undertake to pass the truck to the left, but continued to travel to its right either near the rear wheels or the coupling which connected the truck and trailer. His position was between the truck and the edge of the roadway. There is some ground to sustain the contention that he gained upon the truck after it had passed him, riding to its right. It is very questionable from the youth's position whether he would have been able to have seen a signal had one been given. The driver of the truck was called to the witness chair by the plaintiff, but he was not interrogated on the subject of signals. It is not wholly improbable that the youth, who was riding to the right of and close to the rear wheels of the truck, with no thought of its turning into Sumner street, became surprised or bewildered at the movement of the truck and, in his attempt to extricate himself from the peril of his position, by sudden movement of his bicycle caused it to skid or slip on the wet pavement, thus precipitating him to the ground. The day was described by witnesses as a "slippery day." This, of course, is not more than a probability, or perhaps a possibility. Something caused him to extend his arm or arms as if grasping for the rear of the truck for support. It is possible that an impact with the rear of the truck may have overbalanced the bicycle. There was sufficient road space accessible to the youth's right to have enabled him to avoid a collision with the truck, as it was moving slowly even after it began to turn into Sumner street, which makes it possible that some unexplained cause intervened to his misfortune.

[1, 2] We have read the record carefully and are forced to conclude with the trial court that whatever may have been the real proximate cause of the injuries which resulted in death, there is a failure of evidence to fix the legal responsibility thereof upon the truck driver. No facts of a substantial character were adduced from which the inference of actionable negligence may be reasonably drawn. Negligence must be proved and cannot be presumed. By this we do not mean to say that it may not be established by facts and circumstances from which the inference of negligence reasonably follows. The facts and circumstances, however, which satisfy the law are lacking in the instant case. In arriving at this conclusion we have not lost sight of the rule which courts should apply in considering a motion for nonsuit, as announced in Berger v. Lane, 190 Cal. 443, 213 P. 45, Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 P. 252, Anderson v. Wickliffe, 178 Cal. 120, 172 P. 381, and other cases cited by appellant.

Judgment is affirmed.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Fred A. Treat, Judge.

Action by Albert De La Torre against W. P. Johnson and George Smith. Verdict directed for the first-named defendant, who died subsequent to the trial. From a judgment for defendant George Smith, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Metson and E. B. Mering, both of San Francisco, and Bardin & Scott, of Salinas, for appellant.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, Walter H. Linforth, and Edwin V. McKenzie, all of San Francisco, and Hudson, Martin & Jorgensen, of Monterey, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. [1] This is an action for personal injuries. The court instructed a verdict for the defendant W. P. Johnson, and the jury, of its own accord, returned a verdict for the defendant George Smith. Defendant Johnson having died subsequent to the trial, the action has abated as to him (De La Torre v. Johnson, 254 P. 1105), except perhaps for certain purposes which, in view of our conclusions, need not here be considered.

Plaintiff was operating a truck and defendant Smith was driving a Lincoln automobile owned by defendant Johnson at the time of collision between the two vehicles on Fremont street in the city of Monterey, a street formerly part of the main highway leading from Del Monte to the town of Carmel. Plaintiff, driving said truck, came onto the highway from a private road or right of way, and the collision occurred at the intersection of this private road with the said highway. The evidence is in sharp conflict. As to defendant Smith, no point is made by either party respecting its sufficiency or insufficiency, and it will not be further noticed unless some part thereof be considered in passing upon the assignments of error.

Plaintiff registers his complaints under several heads, practically all of which are aimed at the instructions given by the court to the jury. His chief complaint, however, seems to be that the atmosphere of the courtroom was not proper, and that a long line of small abuses should be considered in the aggregate and, when so considered, warrant a reversal of the judgment. The record is made up under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is in poor condition for the examination of any questions of law. No supplement of any kind is printed and no evidence of any consequence appears in appellant's brief. However, we have examined carefully the several assignments of error and find each of them to be entirely without merit. We shall discuss a few of the more important of them in order that it may abundantly appear that no reversible error is present.

[2] The court instructed the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that it was the duty of the plaintiff, Albert De La Torre, before proceeding from the private road on to the highway, Fremont street, if you should find he did so proceed, to exercise that degree of care and diligence in so doing which an ordinarily prudent man would have exercised under the circumstances in which he then found himself, and failure on his part so to do would constitute negligence, which would bar any recovery by him in this action."

Respondent, however, sets forth that in connection with this instruction two other instructions were given, reading as follows:

> "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff, Albert De La Torre, was guilty of contributory negligence, and that such contributory negligence was a concurring and proximate cause of the accident, it does not matter how negligent the defendant may have been, for under such circumstances your verdict must be against the plaintiff, Albert De La Torre, and in favor of the defendant."
> "If you find that the defendant was not negligent, or if you find that the defendant was negligent, but that the plaintiff, Albert De La Torre, was also guilty of contributory negligence, which contributed to and was a proximate and concurring cause of the accident in question, then these instructions relating to damages should be ignored by you."

Relying upon the so-called "formula" rule discussed in such cases as Starr v. L. A. Ry. Co., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599, and coupling this doctrine with the pronouncements of this court in Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066, error is claimed because the instruction first quoted excluded from consideration the important fact that such contributory negligence must have contributed proximately to the accident in question. Admittedly, however, the court in other instructions amply covered this point, as above noted. We cannot declare said instruction to be a "formula" statement. It is not contradictory to all other instructions on the subject. It is at most incomplete and is not at hopeless variance with the rest of the charge of the court. Robinet v. Hawk, 252 P. 1045; Collom v. Bloch, 70 Cal. App. 33, 40, 232 P. 486. Furthermore, we agree with respondent that inasmuch as the evidence in the cause was all confined to the immediate happenings at the time of the collision between the two vehicles at an intersection, where defendant had the right of way, if any contributory negligence was there present it must of necessity have contributed proximately to plaintiff's injuries.

> "* * * The burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff to establish to the satisfaction of the jury the facts necessary to entitle him to recover, and that the issues submitted to you are to be decided according to the preponderance of the evidence, and that your decision must be made according to the preponderance of the evidence, and after fairly and impartially considering and weighing all the evidence in the case you are at liberty to decide that the preponderance of evidence is on the side which, in your better judgment, is sustained by the more intelligent and better informed and the more credible and disinterested witnesses."

Appellant claims that by the words, "satisfaction of the jury," a greater degree of proof was required by the court of the plaintiff than a "preponderance of the evidence," and in that behalf he cites the following cases: People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 654, 154 P. 468; Mathes v. Aggeler, etc., Co., 179 Cal. 697, 702, 178 P. 713; Estate of Ross, 179 Cal. 629, 633, 178 P. 510; Campbell v. Bradbury, 179 Cal. 364, 372, 176 P. 685. But apparently the phrase was used by the court in a sense synonymous with the word "preponderance," and it is therefore unobjectionable. Boa v. S. F. etc., Co., 182 Cal. 93, 187 P. 2; Kruse v. White Bros., 253 P. 178.

[4-6] Complaint of instructions such as the one which forbade the jury to speculate as to the facts, or the one which announced the lawful rate of speed, when coupled with the further instruction that the driver of an automobile on a public highway in this state shall operate and drive the same in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper with regard to the traffic and use of the highway, etc., cannot avail appellant, as the law upon these questions is well settled and in accord with the action of the trial court. Neither was there any error made by the court in declaring that as between the plaintiff and the defendant, under the evidence, defendant was entitled to the right of way (Uhl v. Fertig, 56 Cal. App. 718, 725, 206 P. 467); nor can we predicate error upon the claim that preliminarily to the introduction of certain photographs offered by plaintiff the court was more exacting of him than of the defendant under similar circumstances, where the ultimate fact appears that the photographs in both cases were admitted in evidence. Likewise, an instruction as to the medical expense, be it ever so erroneous, cannot avail appellant, where the jury found against him upon the issue of negligence.

These views render it unnecessary to pass upon the question of the propriety of directing a verdict in favor of the deceased defendant W. P. Johnson, for his alleged liability is predicated solely upon the doctrine of respondeat superior.

Judgment affirmed.

SUPERIOR WHEELER CAKE CORPORATION v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 10039.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 13, 1928.

1. Mandamus ⟹57(1)—Mandamus lies to compel superior court to entertain appeal by defendant from judgment of small claims court (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 927–927p).

If Code Civ. Proc. § 927j, providing for appeals by defendants from justice's court while sitting as small claims court, but making its judgments conclusive against plaintiffs, is valid, writ of mandate should issue to require superior court to entertain an appeal regularly taken by defendant, under sections 927–927p.

2. Appeal and error ⟹1—Grant of right of appeal, being statutory, is valid, provided Constitution is not violated (Const. U. S. Amend. 14; Const. Cal. art. 1, § 11; art. 4, § 25).

Right of appeal is statutory and may be granted or withheld, and, if given, it is valid, provided constitutional safeguards of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, Const. Cal. art. 1, § 11, and article 4, § 25, are not violated.

3. Constitutional law ⟹249—Statutes ⟹74(2), 85(4)—Statute granting appeal to defendants from judgment of justice's court, sitting as small claims court, and denying right to plaintiffs held valid and not discriminatory (Code Civ. Proc. § 927j; Const. U. S. Amend. 14; Const. Cal. art. 1, § 11; art. 4, § 25).

Code of Civ. Proc. § 927j, in so far as it provides for an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of a justice's court sitting as a small claims court and makes such judgment conclusive upon plaintiff, held valid and not in contravention of equal protection clause of Const. U. S. Amend. 14 or Const. Cal. art. 1, § 11, and article 4, § 25, requiring uniformity and prohibiting special laws, inasmuch as procedure in small claims court gives plaintiff distinct advantages and plaintiff has alternative of entering regular jurisdiction of justice's court, advantages voluntarily accepted being complete compensation for loss of right of appeal.

4. Statutes ⟹72—Laws designed to operate upon certain class of persons only are valid if some natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction exists.

Laws designed to apply to or operate upon a certain class of persons only are valid if it appears that Legislature was warranted in finding some natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction between the classes so legislated about and other classes.

In Bank.

Application by the Superior Wheeler Cake Corporation for mandamus prayed to be directed to the Superior Court for Los Angeles County and Hon. Hartley Shaw, Judge thereof, to require respondent to entertain an appeal from a justice's court sitting as a small claims court. Writ granted.

Charles H. Goebel, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the superior court of the county of Los Angeles to entertain an appeal regularly taken thereto from a justice's court while sitting as a small claims court in said county, under the provisions of sections 927–927p of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] Admittedly the sole question involved is the validity of so much of section 927j of the Code of Civil Procedure as provides for an appeal by defendant, but makes the judgment in the court below conclusive upon the plaintiff. The section in this behalf reads:

> "The judgment of said court shall be conclusive upon the plaintiff. If the defendant is dissatisfied, he may, within five days from the entry of said judgment against him, appeal to the superior court of the county in which said court is held. * * *"

If this provision is valid, the writ of mandate should issue. Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 474, 114 P. 978; Edwards et al. v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 710, 115 P. 649; Peacock v. Superior Court, 163 Cal. 701, 126 P. 976.

[2] The contention of respondent is that the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees to every person the equal protection of the law, has been violated by this section, as well as article 1, § 11, of the Constitution of California, which requires that laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and article 4, § 25 thereof, which prohibits the Legislature from passing special laws regulating the practice of courts of justice. The contention, in short, is that a discrimination results by withholding the right of appeal from plaintiff while conceding it to defendant. The right of appeal is statutory and may be granted or withheld and, if given, is valid, provided the above-mentioned safeguards in the Constitution are not overthrown. Estate of McPhee, 154 Cal. 385, 97 P. 878.

[3] A word of explanation as to the structure and operation of the small claims court will be profitable at this point. The court is presided over by a justice of the peace and is a summary method of expediting causes where the amount involved is $50 and less and arises upon a claim against a party residing in the township where the action is filed. The ordinary jurisdiction of the justice's court is in no wise changed. A cumulative remedy only is given to the plaintiff in certain classes of cases. If a plaintiff desires the advantages of this abbreviated procedure he must lodge with the justice of the peace an affidavit setting forth the nature and amount of the claim, the fact that a demand for payment has been made, and the name and residence of the party indebted to him. With this affidavit as a basis, the court makes an order fixing date and place of hearing and notifying the defendant to appear at said time and place with books, papers, and witnesses needed in his defense, the time for appearance to be not less than five nor more than fifteen days from date of the order. Service of the order, which takes the place of summons, is made personally or by mail. Upon the hearing date the cause is heard informally without the presence of attorneys on either side and without formal pleadings. Writs of attachment and garnishment are denied the plaintiff also. After the informal hearing judgment is entered as in other cases.

Thus it will be seen that a quick and inexpensive method of trial and judgment is provided largely in the interest of complaining plaintiffs; that the right of jury trial is denied the defendant in such cases and service by mail upon him is deemed sufficient without actual personal notice. These and perhaps other things are present showing the advantage plaintiff may have or may think he has over the defendant by resorting to this special remedy. The plaintiff, in other words, comes under the yoke of this system voluntarily, but the defendant comes thereunder only by the strong arm of the law. The parties therefore do not enter the forum upon equal terms. If the plaintiff does not feel that he will be benefited by the procedure, he has the alternative of entering the regular jurisdiction of the justice's court, where the right of appeal is equal and reciprocal. Having this unmistakable choice in the premises, we fail to find discrimination within the meaning of any of said constitutional provisions. The advantage voluntarily accepted must be held a complete compensation for the loss of the right of appeal.

This is not a case where the plaintiff enters the court upon equal terms with defendant, as was held in Hecker v. Ill. C. R. Co., 231 Ill. 574, 578, 83 N. E. 456, 458. It is rather more like in principle the case of Sanitary District v. Bernstein, 175 Ill. 215, 51 N. E. 720 (cited in the Hecker Case), which involved certain provisions of the eminent domain act, which authorized allowance to the defendant of an attorney's fee upon dismissal of the proceeding by petitioner. The court held the distinction reasonable, saying, among other things:

> "Every citizen has an equal right with every other to resort to the courts of justice for the settlement and enforcement of his rights, and it is true that a discrimination between different classes of litigants which is merely arbitrary in its nature, is a denial of that right and of the equal protection of the law. If, however, there be a reasonable ground of distinction, so that the discrimination does not appear to be purely arbitrary or evasive of constitutional rights, we think that the Legislature has a discretion to impose conditions or restrictions which they may deem in furtherance of justice. That discretion cannot be controlled by the courts, but its exercise must be left to the wisdom and sense of justice of the Legislature."

A provision similar to the one above referred to is found in our own eminent domain proceedings. Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a. The validity of this provision was before the court and exhaustively treated in City of Sacramento v. Swanston, 29 Cal. App. 212 et seq., 155 P. 101, to which reference may be had by those desiring to further pursue the subject. See, also, to the same effect, Silver Lake, etc., Irr. Co. v. Los Angeles, 32 Cal. App. 123, 162 P. 432.

[4] It may be summed up in a word that laws which are designed to apply to or operate upon a certain class of persons only are valid if it can be seen that the Legislature was warranted in finding some natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction between the class so legislated about and other classes. City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 251, 27 P. 604. In Mordecai v. Board of Supervisors, 183 Cal. 434, 438, 192 P. 40, 41, it is said:

> "The meaning and effect of the provision of our Constitution requiring uniformity of operation on the part of general laws have been before our courts on numerous occasions, and the general rule applicable is too plain and too well established to require or to justify a discussion of the authorities. The many times reiterated statement of our decisions is that, while the requirement that a general law must have a uniform application does not mean that it must have a universal operation, and it is valid if it applies alike to all persons or objects within a class—or, what is the same thing, there is excepted from its operation a class—founded upon some 'natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction,' yet if the statute operates only upon a class, or there is excepted from its operation a class, not founded upon a 'natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction,' its operation is not uniform, and it is discriminatory legislation of the sort which the Constitution purposed to prohibit and is invalid."

A case somewhat similar to the instant case as to facts is Cecill v. Grant, 27 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 442, where an appeal was provided for defendant upon a motion to discharge an attachment, but was denied to plaintiff in the same action, plaintiff having only the right of review by proceedings in error. The court in that case said:

> "What specific article of the Constitution is thus violated is not pointed out, but counsel has intimated that in some way section 1, art. 1, of the Bill of Rights is violated. That by the statute referred to, classes of citizens, to wit, defendants in attachment cases, have certain rights, privileges and remedies, which are denied to other classes of citizens, to wit, plaintiffs in attachment cases.

"We apprehend, however, that no classes of citizens are thus created or favored; rather, the Legislature has seen fit to regulate according to a plan of its own, the various methods by which the rulings of justices of the peace in a certain class of cases and in certain contingencies may be reviewed. As the right to have any judgment or order reviewed, either on error or by appeal is wholly a statutory right, there can be no constitutional objection to the method provided therefor in attachment cases, by the statute under consideration."

It should be noted that we have not here before us the question as to the validity of so much of said section 927j as provides for the imposition of the sum of $15 as an attorney's fee in the event judgment of the court below is affirmed. The conclusions above announced render unnecessary a consideration of the question as to whether the small claims court is an independent court or is only a constituent part or department of the justices' court.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

MOOG v. MOOG et al. (L. A. 9181.)★

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 17, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank March 15, 1928.

1. Divorce 🔑236—Trial court has large discretion to allow permanent support to wife granted divorce even in face of settlement contract.

In actions for divorce there is a very large discretion vested in the trial court to allow permanent support for wife where she is granted divorce, even in the face of contracts of settlement between the parties, and such contracts must be subjected to the court's examination and derive their sanction from a decree made by the court with knowledge of all the facts.

2. Divorce 🔑236—Award of alimony in addition to support payment under separation agreement held proper, where wife became blind and afflicted with tuberculosis.

Where husband gave wife a lump sum as advance payment of monthly support payments under separation agreement entered into without fraud or undue influence, and thereafter wife became totally blind and afflicted with tuberculosis so that she required the services of a nurse and was without means, trial court had discretion to award alimony in addition to amount received under the separation agreement.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by Therese Blebois Moog against Albert Moog, defendant, and Jennie Taylor, corespondent. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Earl E. Moss, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Tipton & Cailor and Geo. M. Varnum, all of Anaheim, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from that portion of a judgment which allows to plaintiff as alimony the sum of $50 a month until further order of the court. Defendant does not appeal from the portion of the judgment granting to plaintiff a decree of divorce, nor from that portion which divides the community property between the parties; but it is contended that plaintiff and defendant have settled, by contract, their property rights, and that such agreement should be binding in the divorce action.

The facts found by the court are that in July, 1921, plaintiff commenced an action for separate maintenance against defendant, and shortly thereafter, on July 26, 1921, the parties met at the residence of defendant's sister and entered into a written agreement, by the terms of which defendant agreed to give and plaintiff agreed to accept "$50 per month as her separate support." Plaintiff also agreed to dismiss her action for separate maintenance, which she did. On April 8, 1924, plaintiff acknowledged receipt of "$600, being payment at the rate of $50 per month for one year in advance on property settlement agreement"; that since the date of the said receipt the defendant has paid to and for the benefit of plaintiff the sum of $1,205. The court further found that plaintiff was not induced to enter into the said agreement of July 26, 1921, through fraud or undue influence on the part of defendant or of any other person, and that payments made as set forth hereinabove were made by defendant and accepted by plaintiff as payments upon and under said contract of July 26, 1921.

In the present action the custody of the minor children was awarded to the defendant, and he was charged with their support.

The amount of alimony allowed by the court was the same amount mentioned in the contract between the parties, but the dispute arises because of the fact that the judgment was entered in January, 1926, and the plaintiff had received, under the findings, all payments due her under the contract until March, 1927. It is vigorously contended that as the court has found the parties entered into the contract relied upon by defendant, and that plaintiff was not induced by fraud or undue influence to enter into the same and has accepted the benefits thereof for six years, she should be bound by the same and the court should not nullify this agreement between the parties without requiring the plaintiff to return the money which she has received in advance payments.

[1, 2] With reference to ordinary contracts, the position of appellant is sound, undoubtedly; but in actions for divorce there is a very large discretion vested in the trial court in the allowance of permanent support for the wife, where she is granted a divorce, even in the face of contracts of settlement between the parties. Such contracts must be subjected to the examination of a court in the divorce action and derive their sanction from a decree made by the court with knowledge of all the facts. Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 39 P. 801; McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 176, 190 P. 460; Roberts v. Roberts (Cal. App.) 256 P. 826. The rule stated in Corpus Juris, vol. 19, p. 218, is to the effect that where provision has been made by the husband for the wife, by separation agreement, the wife is not entitled to temporary alimony, unless she offers to return what she has received or shows that the amount provided for in the agreement is not sufficient for her needs. The latter condition existed in the instant case. While the court found that the agreement was entered into without fraud or undue influence, it, nevertheless, found that the plaintiff had become totally blind since it was entered into and had become afflicted with tuberculosis and was in need of the services of a nurse, and that she was without means. It was this unfortunate condition, doubtless, which influenced the court in making the award of alimony in addition to what had already been received by plaintiff. Under the circumstances, we see no reason to interfere with the exercise of discretion vested in the trial court.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

FREEMAN ELECTRIC CO. v. MacMILLAN.
(Civ. 4735.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 15, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑181(11)—In action for price of electrical fixtures, evidence held to show defendant was damaged by plaintiff's failure to obey shipping instructions.

In action for purchase price of certain electrical fixtures alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendant, evidence held sufficient to show that defendant was damaged by plaintiff's failure to obey shipping instructions as to steamship company on which goods were to be shipped and as to marking of bill of lading.

2. Sales 🔑161—Seller's failure to obey shipping instructions and marking bill of lading held to justify rejection of electrical fixtures sold.

In action for price of certain electrical fixtures, seller's failure to obey shipping instructions as to steamship company on which goods were to have been shipped and as to marking bill of lading held to justify buyer's rejection of electrical fixtures, and hence seller could not recover for purchase price.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1052(8)—Admitting evidence in action for price of electrical fixtures, if error, held harmless where defendant was entitled to judgment.

Admitting certain evidence in action for purchase price of electrical fixtures, if error, held harmless where plaintiff admitted that he had not followed shipping instructions as to shipping with certain steamship company and marking bill of lading, since such failure alone called for judgment for defendant.

4. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—On appeal, all intendments must be indulged in favor of judgment.

On appeal, all intendments must be indulged in favor of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action to recover the purchase price of certain electrical fixtures by the E. H. Freeman Electric Company against John W. MacMillan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Norman A. Bailie, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover the alleged purchase price of certain goods described as electrical fixtures, alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendant. The trial court found that the defendant was justified in refusing to accept the goods because plaintiff had failed to follow the shipping instructions contained in the orders given by defendant, and rendered judgment accordingly. Plaintiff appeals on the ground that the evidence does not sustain the findings and judgment.

The orders in question contained, among other things, the following instructions:

> "Ship us via c/o Williams S. S. Co.," "Ship as elec. fixtures and mark bill of lading 'Part of Carload,'" and "Boats sail from Philadelphia from Drexel Bldg."—giving the dates.

It is admitted that these instructions were not followed, and that defendant refused to accept and did not accept the goods.

Appellant does not explain why the goods were not shipped by the Williams Steamship Company, nor why the bill of lading was not marked, "Part of Carload." The court found that by reason of such failure to follow shipping instructions said goods, wares, and merchandise were not included in a consolidated car of freight then and there in process of consolidation and shipment to the defendant, and the evidence sustains this finding. In a letter in evidence the defendant explains in detail to plaintiff the reasons for and materiality of the instructions as to shipping by the Williams Steamship Company and as to marking the bill of lading "Part of Carload." A brief quotation from this long letter will suffice:

> "I stated previously, which statement should not have been necessary, the writer assembles carloads himself. I use the Williams Steamship Company as they are a little more elastic than any other boat company. They own all of their ships, therefore are not controlled by the United States Shipping Board. It is with much difficulty that the writer is able to assemble a minimum car in the 45 days allotted by the boat companies, and the people like yourself, when you disobey shipping orders, make me pay the carload rate on the minimum car without securing the entire weight; also, you make me appear to the Steamship Company like I was trying to put something over, as they allow me the carload rate on the shipments on the first boat instead of holding it out on the final boat, and rebating me at that time. In fact, I think it is absolutely rotten for you to disregard shipping instructions when so plainly written. * * *"

The failure or nonpreformance of time or place of shipment as set out in a mercantile contract justifies the party aggrieved in repudiating the whole contract. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 118, 6 S. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Tilley v. Pope, 115 U. S. 213, 6 S. Ct. 19, 29 L. Ed. 372. This same doctrine has been adopted and followed in California. Western Ind. Co. v. Mason M., etc., Co., 56 Cal. App. 355, 360, 205 P. 466. Upon failure of plaintiff to obey shipping instructions, he cannot recover damages from defendant. Young v. Rocha, 65 Cal App. 15, 222 P. 861.

[1] From the correspondence between plaintiff and defendant in evidence, and the defendant's testimony, which the trial court evidently believed, it appears that in this case the method of delivery was at least as important as the time, and materially affected the time. The defendant testified:

> "Why, getting 36,000 pounds on three consecutive boats I was able to secure a rate of about $1.25. If I didn't get 36,000 pounds at least, I had to pay about $2.78 or $3 a hundred for maybe 30,000 pounds or 27,000 pounds. We had to get the 36,000 pounds or pay for it anyway."

This also answers appellant's contention that defendant suffered no damage by reason of plaintiff's failure to obey shipping instructions.

[2, 3] There are nine specifications urged by appellant, all relating to the insufficiency of the evidence. We believe the above covers all the material points raised, without further detailed discussion.

Appellant contends that the court erred in the admission of certain testimony as to the contents of the contract with Williams Steamship Company and the contents of a certain letter. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the court erred, the error was harmless and not prejudicial for the reason that the court was bound, under the evidence, to render judgment for defendant under the unavoidable finding that the instructions as to shipping were not followed. The appellant admits that it did not follow the shipping instructions of the defendant. The defendant informed them of the reasons for and the materiality of these instructions. There being evidence to this effect, the findings are sufficiently supported.

[4] We find no other points raised by the appellant which demand discussion, bearing in mind the rule that all intendments must be indulged in favor of the judgment. Rocha v. Garcia (Cal. Sup.) 263 P. 238.

Judgment affirmed.

URBAN v. YOAKUM et al.

YOAKUM et al. v. URBAN et al.

(Civ. 6121.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 10, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⚷144(2)—That mortgage note was not paid as agreed before vendor tendered deed and demanded payment held no defense to action to quiet title (Civ. Code, §§ 1437, 1498).

That mortgage note for amount exceeding agreed incumbrance on land sold was not paid before vendor tendered deed and certificate of title, subject only to such incumbrance, and demanded payment of amount due, held no defense to action to quiet title, vendor not being in default until purchaser made payment and demanded deed and certificate, under Civ. Code, §§ 1437, 1498.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚷187—Vendor's acceptance of overdue installments held not waiver of right to refuse to deliver deed until paid, though incumbrances exceeded amount agreed (Civ. Code, §§ 1437, 1498).

Vendor's acceptance of purchase-money installments after they fell due held not a waiver of right to refuse to deliver deed until paid, though incumbrances on land had not been reduced to agreed amount as required before buyers were bound to accept deed, either party having right, under Civ. Code, § 1498, to tender performance and demand performance by other on date fixed for payment and delivery of deed, which were concurrent conditions under section 1437.

3. Evidence ⚷441(8)—Testimony as to vendor's statement before contract was signed that payment could be made after due date on receiving 30 days' notice held inadmissible (Civ. Code, §§ 1498, 1625).

In action to quiet title, defendant's testimony as to plaintiff's statement before contract for sale of land to defendant was signed that payment could be made after due date on receiving 30 days' notice, under Civ. Code, § 1498, held properly stricken as relating to conversation merged in contract under section 1625.

4. Evidence ⚷445(2)—Evidence of conversation between vendor and purchaser after contract was signed held inadmissible to alter written instrument (Civ. Code, §§ 1498, 1698).

In action to quiet title, testimony as to conversation, wherein plaintiff told defendant after contract for sale of realty was signed that payment could be made after due date on receiving 30 days' notice, under Civ. Code, § 1498, held inadmissible to alter written instrument, under section 1698; such oral agreement not being executed nor supported by consideration.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⚷296—Action to quiet title held proper remedy on purchaser's failure to make payments as required by land contract.

Action to quiet title held proper remedy of vendor on purchaser's failure to make payments as required by contract to purchase land.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⚷185—That vendor could have conveyed good title without wife joining in deed held no defense to his action to quiet title on ground of defendants' default in payments.

That vendor could have conveyed good title, though his wife did not join in deed, held no defense to his action to quiet title, where he took position that no duty rested on him to convey anything to defendants because of latters' default in payments.

7. Equity ⚷23—Equity courts will relieve parties to contracts from defaults only when equitable grounds are shown.

Courts of equity will relieve parties to contracts from defaults only when equitable grounds therefor are shown.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by F. A. Urban against F. B. Yoakum and others, who filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ernest U. Schroeter and D. L. Di Vecchio, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Dana R. Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to quiet title to a tract of land in Los Angeles county. The defendants appeared and answered and filed a cross-complaint. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, and the parties went to trial on the issues so framed. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and a judgment was entered thereon. The defendants made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied and they have appealed from the said judgment under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Prior to the 6th day of July, 1922, Marie Verch owned lots 26, 28, and 30, and the easterly 18.735 feet of lot 32 in block 23 of "Park tract," in the city of Los Angeles. On that date the plaintiff purchased the said lands from Marie Verch through F. B. Yoakum as a broker. Thereafter, on the 10th day of July, 1922, the plaintiff sold to the said F. B. Yoakum about one-half of said tract. When the plaintiff purchased he paid Marie Verch $1,000 down and executed to her a mortgage for the balance, which mortgage secured three notes, each bearing interest at 6 per cent.—one for $3,500 payable September 1, 1922, one for $4,500 payable December 1, 1922, and one for $7,625 payable on or before July 6, 1925. By the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant F. B. Yoakum, the plaintiff agreed to sell for $8,312.50, payable $4,500, together with interest December 1, 1922, plus one-half of 6 per cent. interest on $3,500 from September 1, 1922, to December 1, 1922, plus one-half of 6 per cent. interest on $1,000 from July 6, 1922, and to December 1, 1922. The defendant did not make his payments according to the terms of the contract. He paid in all a little over $100.

A comparison shows that the dates when the plaintiff was bound to make his payments to Marie Verch coincided with the dates when the defendant was bound under the terms of his contract to make payments to the plaintiff.

If the defendant made his payments pursuant to the terms of his contract, and if the plaintiff in turn paid the moneys over to Marie Verch, then it would have transpired that the entire tract would have been incumbered in the sum of $7,625 and no more, and on December 1, 1922, the defendant would have been entitled to a deed to the portion so purchased by him, free and clear of all incumbrances except his pro rata of the said sum of $7,625. The defendant did not make his payments on time. The plaintiff claimed that he made numerous requests. The defendant contended that he did not. The defendant also contended that the plaintiff waived the provisions of the contract fixing the dates of payments by accepting certain payments after the date on which the payments were, according to the terms of the contract, due and payable. These respective contentions will be hereinafter referred to.

On January 15, 1924, Marie Verch demanded payment by the plaintiff of the installment which was due under his contract with her. He did not have the money to make the payment, and therefore sacrificed some properties by making a sale at a loss, obtained the moneys, and made the payment. Thereafter, on January 25, 1924, defendant having failed to make his payments, the plaintiff served on him a notice of rescission. By the terms of that notice the defendant was notified that unless he made his payments within ten days thereafter, his contract would be canceled. Nevertheless he did not make his payments, but on the 20th day of February, 1924, he conveyed or attempted to convey a one-half interest in his contract to E. A. Yoakum, his wife. That purported contract was acknowledged and was thereafter recorded. On March 10, 1924, this action was commenced.

The defendants call to our attention the fact that the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant did not contain a covenant to the effect that time was of the essence thereof. Thereupon they also call to our attention that at the time of the trial they tendered to the plaintiff the said sum of $4,500, together with all items of interest then due, and that the plaintiff refused to accept it, and that thereupon they deposited the same in court conditioned upon the execution of a deed by the plaintiff and a certificate of title showing that the land was subject to an incumbrance of $7,625, and no more.

The plaintiff's complaint pleaded in the ordinary form a cause of action to quiet title. The defendants interposed an answer which contained denials of the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint. It also pleaded as an affirmative defense the execution of the contract hereinabove mentioned, dated July 10, 1922, and the assignment of an undivided one-half interest therein by F. B. Yoakum and E. A. Yoakum, and that the defendants had fully performed said contract. The answer also pleaded another affirmative defense, in which they alleged that they had repeatedly demanded a deed and tendered the payments provided in their contract and that they had at all times been ready, willing, and able to pay the said sums, but that the plaintiff had refused to execute to them the deed provided for in the contract. Then followed the allegation: "That by reason of the foregoing facts plaintiff ought to be and is in fact estopped from quieting his title in and to said lands against the defendants or either of them." The defendants filed a cross-complaint, in which they alleged the execution of the contract dated July 10, 1922. full performance by them, their ability, etc., their demand, the refusal of plaintiff to execute a deed and that plaintiff was unable to execute a deed because the property was mortgaged at all times for a sum in excess of $7,625. Thereupon in their cross-complaint the defendants demanded the specific performance of the contract just mentioned. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, and the trial was had on the issues so framed. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff on all of the allegations contained in his complaint. It also found that the defendants did not perform all the conditions of the contract dated July 10, 1922, and that they were not ready, able or willing at all times to pay the $4,500; that subsequent to the 10th day of July, 1922, and until shortly prior to the commencement of the action, the defendant F. B. Yoakum received one-half the income of said property; that the defendant F. B. Yoakum on February 20, 1924, conveyed an undivided one-half of his interest to his wife, E. A. Yoakum, and that said assignment was without any consideration; that the defendant F. B. Yoakum paid interest and taxes until December 1, 1923, and that a large portion of such payments were made out of the income from said property; that the plaintiff never refused to execute a deed: that the defendants never demanded a deed or tendered or offered to pay to plaintiff the said sum of $4,500 and were never ready, willing and able to pay said sum; that subsequent to the 10th day of July, 1922, the plaintiff made numerous demands for payment and on the 25th day of January, 1924, the plaintiff, in writing, tendered to the defendant F. B. Yoakum a deed, together with the certificate of title made by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company showing the title to be vested in the plaintiff subject only to the mortgage to Marie Verch in the sum of $7,625, and demanded the payment of $4,500 by the defendant; that the defendant neglected and refused to pay said sum; that the plaintiff was at all times ready, willing and able to convey; that on the 23d day of March, 1925, after the commencement of the trial of the action, the defendant F. B. Yoakum tendered to the plaintiff the sum of $5,200 and thereafter deposited said sum with the clerk of the court; that the defendant's failure to comply with his agreement was inexcusable and that his delay therein was unreasonable and inexcusable.

[1] The defendants assert that the mortgage note for $4,500 was not paid before the plaintiff made his tender and demand, and therefore the defendant was within his rights in not paying to the plaintiff $4,500 and in refusing to accept a deed to property that was mortgaged for more than $7,625. The point is without merit. He should have made the payment as demanded and, at the same time, seen to it that he got a deed together with a certificate showing the land not to be incumbered in any greater sum than $7,625, all as set forth in the contract. Until he did so the plaintiff was not in default and the facts were insufficient to constitute a defense for the defendants. Maloney v. Houston, 51 Cal. App. 585, 197 P. 661; Griesemer v. Hammond, 18 Cal. App. 535, 541, 123 P. 818; Mills v. Garner (Cal. App.) 259 P. 479; Lemle v. Barry, 181 Cal. 6, 9, 183 P. 148.

[2] In the next place he asserts that time was not of the essence of the contract between the defendant and the plaintiff, and, whether it was or not, by accepting installments after they fell due, the plaintiff waived the due date, December 1, 1922, and therefore before the plaintiff could make any legal demand on the defendant he was bound to reduce the indebtedness to $7,625. The point is illogical and it is a commixture of several points, all of which must be ruled against the defendants. The issues and findings present no question of waiver. Wienke v. Smith, 179 Cal. 220, 225, 176 P. 42. If there was a waiver as to the date when the defendants should have made their payment, such waiver was pertinent to the time of payment, but was not pertinent as to the amount of incumbrance remaining on the property on the date the deed should have been delivered—the contract still provided the covenant on that subject. Under the terms of the contract, the defendants were not bound to accept a deed to the property subject to an incumbrance in excess of $7,625. Such was the clear wording of the contract. The plaintiff has never contended to the contrary. On the other hand, the plaintiff was not bound to deliver a deed until he was paid. The two acts were concurrent conditions. Civ. Code, § 1437. Either party, on and after December 1, 1922, could have tendered performance and could have demanded, at the same time, performance by the other (Civ. Code, § 1498), provided, that if the contract date had passed and the payments were overdue, "* * * the purchaser should be notified that if such payments were not made on or before a fixed date far enough in the future to give him reasonable time and opportunity to comply with his contract, the contract will be terminated and a forfeiture will take place" (25 Cal. Jur. 619, § 119). That notice was given, and no claim is made that it was not regular in all respects.

[3, 4] According to the terms of the contract the defendants should have made their payment December 1, 1922. The defendant F. B. Yoakum testified that in conversations, before and after the contract was signed, the plaintiff told him the payment could be made upon receiving 30 days' notice. The trial court struck out that portion of the testimony. As to the conversation held before the contract was signed, it was merged in the contract. Civ. Code, § 1625. As to the conversation held after the contract was signed, it could not alter the written instrument. Civ. Code, § 1698. If it be claimed that the latter constituted an executed oral agreement, it is clear that the agreement was not executed and that there was no consideration therefor. Benson v. Shotwell, 103 Cal. 163, 167, 37 P. 147.

[5] The next point presented by the defendants is that the facts of this case are such that an action to quiet title was not the proper remedy. They cite Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 P. 249, 681. That case involved a set of facts that is quite different from the instant case. It is not helpful.

[6] Then the defendants assert that under the facts the plaintiff could have conveyed to them a good and sufficient title even though the plaintiff's wife did not join in the deed. The assertion may be accepted, but it leads nowhere. The position taken by the plaintiff was that no duty rested on him to convey to the defendants anything, not that he did not have the power.

The judgment is affirmed.

BROWN v. KLEIN et al. (Civ. 6068.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 9, 1928.

1. Partnership ⚷273—Dissolution of partnership for defendants' misrepresentations will not be denied because adventure was speculative.

Dissolution of copartnership on ground of defendants' misrepresentations will not be denied because adventure was speculative, since character of business, if lawful, does not soften effect of misrepresentation.

2. Pleading ⚷398—Variance is not material unless prejudicially misleading, and where not material court may direct the fact to be found according to evidence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470).

No variance between allegation in pleading and proof is deemed material unless it actually misled adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining action or defense on merits under Code Civ. Proc. § 469, and where variance is not material court may direct the fact to be found according to evidence, under section 470.

3. Contracts ⚷93(1), 94(1)—Party may rescind contract if consent was obtained through mistake or fraud (Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 1).

Party to contract may rescind if his consent was either given through mistake or obtained by fraud under Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 1.

4. Partnership ⚷273—Innocent misrepresentations of material fact, inducing partnership contract, are ground for rescission.

Innocent misrepresentations of material fact, inducing execution of contract of partnership, are considered constructive fraud, which is ground for rescission.

5. Partnership ⚷344—In suit for rescission of partnership contract, court having found against plaintiff's contention of willful misrepresentation can decree rescission on ground of mistake pleaded by defendants.

In suit for rescission of partnership contract on ground of willful misrepresentation and fraud, court having found no willful misrepresentation or fraud to exist may decree rescission on ground of innocent mistake, where defendants plead such mistake, as against contention that there was variance.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Elbert J. Brown against William Klein and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants William Klein and others appeal. Affirmed.

Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Byron Coleman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. Appeal is taken from a judgment in favor of plaintiff decreeing rescission of a contract of copartnership and requiring defendants to refund to plaintiff the money paid by him on account thereof.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff and defendants entered into a contract whereby plaintiff agreed to buy and the defendants agreed to sell an undivided one-third interest in and to a certain copartnership known as the Universal Specialty Company, subject to existing liabilities as of October 27, 1923. Plaintiff agreed to pay, and did pay, defendants the sum of $3,000 for such interest. It is also alleged that at the time plaintiff entered into said agreement, and for the purpose and with the intent of persuading and inducing plaintiff to purchase said undivided one-third interest, defendants represented that the liabilities of said copartnership on October 27, 1923, did not exceed the sum of $1,952.57; that plaintiff believed said representation, relied thereon, and would not have entered into the agreement to purchase had he not believed said representation to be true; that said representation was false and fraudulent, and known to defendants to be false and fraudulent; and that as a matter of fact the liabilities of said copartnership as of the date in question were not less than $4,890.55.

Defendants in their answer admit the payment of the $3,000, and admit that they represented to plaintiff that the liabilities of the copartnership did not exceed $1,952.57, but allege that at the time they made the statement they believed it was true, that said representation was the result of an error in addition, and that the corrected addition of the whole liabilities should have shown an indebtedness of $2,952.57 or thereabout. They specifically deny that there was any intentional misrepresentation or fraudulent misstatement of facts.

They set up as a further and special defense that all books and accounts were freely placed at the disposal of plaintiff, and that every opportunity was afforded him to make a full and thorough investigation of the partnership business, and that after a full and thorough investigation plaintiff freely entered into said copartnership. The new matter in the answer was, of course, deemed denied (Code Civ. Proc., § 462), and the case went to trial on the issues framed by the pleadings.

The court found the amount of the indebtedness in question to be $3,300, that the misrepresentation complained of was the result of error instead of fraud, and that plaintiff neither investigated the business nor had an opportunity so to do. On the remaining issues the court found with plaintiff.

It is the contention of appellants that plaintiff was an experienced business man, was not free from negligence, and that, having the means of knowledge, the law imputes knowledge to him.

In view of the findings that the plaintiff did not make an independent investigation and did not have the opportunity of doing so, we attach but little or no significance to this part of the argument. While the testimony was conflicting, the finding of the court was amply sustained by the evidence.

[1] Appellants advance another theory, namely, that the adventure was a speculative one and that for that reason the purchaser cannot be heard to complain. There is nothing in the point. The character of a business, if lawful, in no wise softens the effect of misrepresentation.

No question is raised as to materiality of the false representation, diligent offer to return, or material change in the situation of the parties.

[2-5] The sole question is whether or not in a suit for rescission of a contract on the grounds of willful misrepresentation and fraud, the court, having found no willful misrepresentation or fraud to exist, can decree rescission on the ground of mistake, where the defendants themselves pleaded such mistake. In this respect, appellants allege a material variance between pleading and proof.

The general rule is that no variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Code Civ. Proc. § 469. Where the variance is not material the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 470.

A party to a contract may rescind if his consent was either given through mistake or obtained by fraud. Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 1; Canadian Agency v. Assets, etc., Co., 165 App. Div. 96, 150 N. Y. S. 758; Story's Commentaries on Equity Jur. (13th Ed.) p. 213.

A late expression of this court on the subject is to be found in Scott v. Delta Land & Water Co., 57 Cal. App. 320, 207 P. 389, where it is held that in a civil action the good faith of the party who procures the assent of another to the making of a contract by material misrepresentations is of no moment.

In 12 Ruling Case Law, at page 343, par. 98, referred to in the above decision, the principle is advanced that innocent misrepresentations of a material fact are considered as constructive fraud because of its effect of imposing upon and deceiving the person to whom it is made.

It is therefore clear that defendants' plea of innocent mistake, rather than being available as a defense in a suit for rescission, is itself a generally recognized ground for rescission.

Can they then be heard to complain in equity on the purely technical plea of variance, because the trial court, after finding with them on the facts, applied well-established rules of law thereto which resulted in their discomfiture? We think not. There is no variance. The facts proved were not foreign to the issues, but were raised by them. The relief granted was the relief prayed for.

The language used by the court in the case of Schenck v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co., 71 Cal., at page 29, 11 P. 808, is particularly applicable:

> "By the choice of the defendant, the fact, which was essential to the plaintiff's recovery, which had been omitted to be pleaded in his complaint, was so pleaded in the defendant's answer, with a view to defeat the plaintiff's recovery, that a jury was enabled, upon evidence before it, to pass upon the issue raised and tendered by the defendant. If the defendant has been beaten upon its own chosen ground of battle, which but for its pleading could not have been there fought, we cannot see any good reason to reverse the judgment here in order that the plaintiff may plead in his complaint and tender as an issue to the defendant, to be retried, that which, of its own choice, the defendant, in its answer, has already tendered to the plaintiff, upon which the controversy has been tried before a jury, and by it determined, as we must suppose, properly."

In Lombardi v. Sinanides, 71 Cal. App. 272, 235 P. 455, the court held that the complaint, supplemented by the answer, stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action on the ground of mutual mistake although the complaint sought rescission on the ground of willful misrepresentation.

Judgment affirmed.

D'ARCY v. D'ARCY. (Civ. 6066.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 8, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑931(4)—It may be assumed that court found that allegations of cross-complaint for separate maintenance were true, where findings were waived.

Court of Appeals may assume that trial court found that all of allegations of cross-complaint for separate maintenance, alleging extreme cruelty, were true, where findings were waived by parties.

2. Husband and wife 🔑298¾—Award of all community property to wife in granting separate maintenance held authorized (Civ. Code, § 137).

Civ. Code, § 137, as formerly existing, providing that court granting separate maintenance shall make same disposition of community property as if marriage had been dissolved, authorized trial court to award all of community property to wife in granting separate maintenance.

3. Husband and wife 🔑298¾—Award of community property in granting separate maintenance can be sustained only on theory that it is necessary and reasonable for maintenance of wife and children.

Award of community property, in granting separate maintenance without dissolution of marriage relation, can be sustained only upon theory that it is necessary and reasonable for maintenance and support of wife, or of wife and children.

4. Husband and wife 🔑298¾—Awarding community property to wife in granting separate maintenance held not error on ground that cross-complaint did not allege necessity, where case was contested and court had jurisdiction.

Awarding all of community property to wife in granting her judgment for separate maintenance held not error, on ground that her cross-complaint for separate maintenance did not allege that community property was necessary for maintenance of herself and minor children, nor ask for disposition of such property, where cross-complaint asked for monthly payments, case was contested, and court had jurisdiction of parties, property, and children.

5. Husband and wife 🔑299½—Agreement between parties to action for separate maintenance was void as to support of children.

Agreement between parties to action for separate maintenance, respecting payments which should be made, was void as concerned minor children, since court's authority to make necessary orders for their support is statutory and cannot be limited by parties.

6. Husband and wife 🔑299(1)—Parties to action for separate maintenance could not bind court by agreement as to payment of accrued alimony.

Agreement between parties to action for separate maintenance as to installment payments on accrued alimony could not bind court.

7. Judgment 🔑222—Judgment for money must be stated with certainty and should specify amount.

General rule is that judgment for money must be stated with certainty and that it should specify the amount.

8. Husband and wife 🔑299(1)—Provisions of judgment of separate maintenance, requiring husband to pay taxes, insurance, interest on mortgage, and cost of renewing mortgage, held not void for uncertainty where following stipulation of parties.

Provisions of judgment granting separate maintenance, which required husband to pay sufficient money to pay taxes due or to become due upon certain real property, cost of fire insurance, amount of interest payable on mortgage or upon renewal mortgage, and cost of renewing mortgage, held not void for uncertainty where it followed stipulation of parties.

9. Divorce 🔑101—Where husband sues for divorce, cross-complaint for separate maintenance need not allege that he is resident (Civ. Code, § 128).

Where husband brings suit for divorce, cross-complaint of wife for separate maintenance need not allege that he is resident of state, under Civ. Code, § 128.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action for divorce, by Charles A. D'Arcy against Gertrude Claire D'Arcy, and cross-action for separate maintenance. From a judgment in favor of defendant and cross-complainant denying divorce and granting separate maintenance, plaintiff and cross-defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rudolph J. Scholz, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George A. Connolly, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff and cross-defendant appeals from a judgment of separate maintenance rendered in an action originally brought by him for divorce.

Under the terms of the judgment appellant was denied a divorce; separate maintenance in favor of respondent and of the three minor children of the parties was decreed; the custody of the said children was awarded respondent; the appellant was directed to pay respondent $200 per month for the support and maintenance of respondent and said children; judgment was given respondent for $2,150 unpaid alimony; certain described community property (constituting all of the community) was awarded respondent; and appellant was required to pay all taxes assessed against the community real property, together with interest on the existing mortgage or deed of trust thereon, and the cost of renewing the same.

In reference to the payment of taxes and mortgage interest, the judgment provides:

> "It being expressly understood that the provisions contained in this paragraph of the decree are made in conformity with the written agreement of the parties to the above-entitled action, executed by them on the 22d day of December, 1924."

Findings were waived.

It is the contention of appellant that a judgment is not valid which awards all of the community property to one party to a suit for separate maintenance; that it was error to incorporate part of the separation agreement in the judgment without including the whole thereof; that the judgment for taxes and interest is too indefinite; and that the court was without jurisdiction over the subject of the action in so far as the cross-complaint was concerned.

These contentions will be considered in the order named.

[1, 2] 1. The cross-complaint for separate maintenance alleges extreme cruelty. Findings being waived, it may be assumed the court found all of the allegations to be true. As it stood at the time judgment was rendered, section 137, Civil Code, provided:

> "The court, in granting the wife permanent support and maintenance of herself, or of herself and children, in any such action, shall make the same disposition of the community property and of the homestead, if any, as would have been made if the marriage had been dissolved by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction."

This section furnishes ample authority for the trial court's action in making the community property award.

The case of Johnson v. Johnson, 33 Cal. App. 93, 164 P. 421, relied upon by appellant, is not applicable, since it interpreted section 137, Civil Code, as it stood before the clause in reference to the disposition of community property was inserted.

[3] With respect to the disposition of the community property, appellant attacks the validity of the judgment on the ground that the award of $200 a month was the only award made for support and maintenance, claiming that the award of the community property was not for support and maintenance, but was in addition thereto. He cites as authority the case of Sherman v. Sherman, 47 Cal. App. at p. 210, 190 P. 465, where the court says that when "the community property is awarded to plaintiff without dissolution of the marriage, such award can be sustained only upon the theory that it is necessary and reasonable for the maintenance and support of the wife or for the wife and children where such relief is sought."

[4] While the rule is correctly stated, we cannot agree with appellant's contention. The cross-complaint for separate maintenance stated a cause of action on the ground of extreme cruelty (there being allegations specifying acts of cruelty which bear no relation to those which might be construed as constituting desertion), referred to the community property, alleged the sum of $350 a month to be a reasonable sum to be paid respondent by appellant for the support and maintenance of respondent and the minor children, prayed for a decree of separate maintenance requiring appellant to pay that sum, for a decree awarding the custody of the children to respondent, and for general relief.

The Sherman Case was a default case, and the court there held that the trial court erred in assigning the entire community property to the plaintiff because there was no allegation that the community property was necessary for support and maintenance and no notice was given to defendant that any disposition of the community property was sought. The rule is entirely different in contested cases. "In contested cases the relief granted is not limited to that specifically prayed for, as is the case where judgment goes by default. Any relief authorized by the facts alleged and proved or admitted may be awarded." 14 Cal. Jur. p. 986, and cases cited.

It is true that in the case at bar the cross-complaint did not specifically allege that the community property was necessary for the maintenance of respondent and her minor children, nor was disposition of the community property specifically asked. However, the court had complete jurisdiction of the parties, their property, and their children. Both parties were in court, the case was strenuously contested, and the respective needs of those over whom jurisdiction was exercised were fully inquired into.

It may well be that when the evidence disclosed that appellant's salary was reduced and he was unable to pay the $350 a month which respondent prayed for, the court found such sum was nevertheless reasonably necessary for the support and maintenance of respondent and her children, and thereupon awarded as its equivalent the sum of $200 a month and the home place, free of taxes, interest, and insurance. While the decree does not specifically say that the community property is awarded respondent "for the support and maintenance of herself and her minor children," it is clear from a reading of the entire judgment that its provisions were made for that purpose.

[5] 2. The separation agreement above referred to was signed by the parties after the trial of the cause and submitted to the court prior to the rendition of judgment. It became a part of the record on appellant's motion for diminution of the record. Under the terms of said agreement appellant agreed to pay $800 in cash on account of the sum of $3,300 due by virtue of an order for the temporary support and maintenance of respondent and her minor children, together with the further sum of $50 per month until the unpaid balance was fully paid. He agreed to pay the further sum of $200 per month for support and maintenance instead of the sum of $300 per month previously ordered by the court, agreed to pay and discharge all taxes, insurance, interest, and other charges accruing or that might accrue upon or against the community real property of said parties, and to renew all mortgages outstanding against said property. He also agreed that the payments due under the terms of said agreement should be made directly to respondent by appellant's employer.

Respondent agreed that the previous allowance of $300 per month for support and maintenance be reduced to $200, and that the court might make an order modifying its former order in that respect. It was agreed by both parties that they were left free to pursue their legal rights in said action or in any other action or proceeding with the one limitation that so long as the appellant's yearly salary remained at $5,000, his liability for the support and maintenance of respondent and her minor children should be the sum of $200 per month.

In so far as the minor children are concerned this agreement is void. The authority of the court to make necessary orders for the support of the minor children of the marriage is conferred by statute, and its exercise cannot be limited or abridged by the parties. 9 Cal. Jur. p. 803; Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 163 P. 42.

[6] Appellant and respondent further agreed that said agreement should be approved by appellant's employer, and that the moneys payable thereunder should be paid by the employer so long as appellant remained in his employ, and that upon the execution of the agreement, appellant, who was then in custody by reason of having failed to comply with the court's order for the payment of temporary support and maintenance, might be released from custody.

It will be noted that the court included in the judgment appealed from that portion of the agreement having to do with payments for the support and maintenance of the respondent and her minor children, and also the provision in reference to the payment of insurance, interest and taxes.

With reference to the payment of the $800 cash and $50 a month on account of back payments due for support and maintenance, the judgment gave respondent a money judgment for $2,150, that being the amount due under the terms of the previous order at the time judgment herein was rendered.

It will be seen that all of the provisions with which the court was concerned were included in the judgment. The parties could not bind the court in reference to installment payments on account of accrued alimony. The judgment in respect to the unpaid balance merely stated the sum due under the former order. The parties did not stipulate that such order be modified; they simply agreed as to the manner of payment. Neither did any reference to appellant's employer, nor to appellant's release from custody, have a place in the judgment.

[7] 3. The attack on that portion of the judgment which provides that appellant pay to respondent "sufficient money to pay all taxes due or hereafter to become due upon the real property hereinabove described, the cost of fire insurance on the improvements erected thereon up to the full value of said improvements, the amount of all interest payable on the mortgage or deed of trust which is now a lien upon said real property, or upon any mortgage or deed of trust which may hereafter be placed upon said real property for the purpose of renewing the present mortgage or deed of trust thereon, and the cost of renewing the said mortgage or deed of trust," on the ground of uncertainty, presents a more troublesome problem.

The general rule is that in case the judgment is for money it must be stated with certainty (Freeman on Judgments [5th Ed.] vol. 1, par. 84); and a money judgment should specify the amount (14 Cal. Jur. p. 956).

[8] The rule laid down by Mr. Justice Shaw, in the case of Title Insurance Co. v. Miller & Lux, 183 Cal. at p. 89, 190 P. 440, however, should be applied. There the court said:

> "The contention that the decree is void for uncertainty is also untenable. The claim for which the lien was imposed was for moneys to become due in the future, the amount of which could not be determined in advance. If the lien existed it could be enforced when the moneys become due to Miller & Lux under the provisions of the agreement of 1888 aforesaid, and the agreement of October 6, 1898, aforesaid, both of which were referred to in the decree of distribution. The amount thereof could be established at that time, but not before. The plaintiff argues that the decree leaves it to Miller & Lux to be the sole judge of the amount of expenses to be incurred, and therefore delegated to that corporation the functions of the court. This, however, is obviously not the case. The decree of distribution merely imposed the lien for whatever amount should legally become due thereafter to Miller & Lux on account of the agreements referred to. It would, of course, be necessary, if there was any dispute about these amounts, or their validity, or legality, that Miller & Lux should resort to a court of competent jurisdiction to establish and enforce its lien. That corporation would not be the sole judge of the legality or extent of the charges to be imposed. If they were not justified under the contracts referred to, if they were improper charges, or if the contracts do not authorize Miller & Lux to charge the expenses claimed against the owner of the land, then, of course, the court to which the matter was submitted would refuse to declare or enforce a lien therefor."

In that case the parties to be bound by the lien were present in court and agreed to the distribution made and to the imposition of the lien. In the present case the appellant agreed in writing to make the payments on account of taxes, insurance, and interest, and we believe the court was justified in including the terms of the agreement in its judgment.

[9] 4. The remaining question is that of the jurisdiction of the court to hear the matters and things alleged in respondent's cross-complaint. In this regard appellant contends that the cross-complaint is fatally defective in that it does not allege that the cross-defendant was a resident of the state of California. It was neither necessary to allege nor prove this fact. Section 128 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "A divorce must not be granted unless the plaintiff has been a resident of the state one year, and of the county in which the action is brought three months, next preceding the commencement of the action; provided, that a cross-complainant in an action for divorce need not be or have been a resident of the state or of the county in which the action is brought or pending in order to entitle such cross-complainant to a divorce in said action."

The cross-complainant alleged that she was a resident of the state, plaintiff alleged that he was a resident of the state, and both allegations were proven true.

Judgment is affirmed.

MacGRUER et al. v. FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO. OF NEW YORK. (Civ. 6230.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 11, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 9, 1928.

1. Insurance ⇨425—"Pay roll," as used in pay roll robbery policy, means fund or sum of money on hand in cash for disbursement to pay wages at designated time and place.

Term "pay roll," as used in pay roll robbery policy, means fund or sum of money on hand in cash to be disbursed in payment of wages at designated time and place which is ordinarily transported in private custody and in lesser exchange denominations.

2. Insurance ⇨425—Pay roll policy insuring against robbery inside or outside insured's premises with riders and modifications held, under evidence, to cover loss in city other than where insured's office was located.

Policy insuring plastering contractor against loss by robbery of pay roll inside or outside premises, in view of fact that insured had requested insurer's agent to increase policy to cover job in another city, and it had issued a separate policy, which, with first, made insurance in amount asked by insured, and riders providing for four custodians of pay roll instead of one and for different premium rates in event of renewal, protected against robbery of pay roll in city where work was being done, though insured's office was not located there.

3. Insurance ⇨425—"Inside or outside" in policy usually gives idea of whole and without qualification indicates no limitation.

Expression "inside or outside" usually gives idea of a whole and used without qualification in pay roll insurance policy indicates no limitation.

4. Insurance ⇨425—Company held estopped to assert that pay roll policy did not cover loss in city other than where insured's office was located.

Where in answer to request of plastering contractor that his pay roll insurance policy be increased from $3,000 to $8,000, to cover work in city other than that where his office was situated, company's agents issued additional policy for $5,000 and attached certain riders to $3,000 policy, company was estopped to set up that $3,000 policy did not cover loss in city other than where insured's office was located.

5. Insurance ⇨371—Estoppel arises from acts and conduct of company's duly authorized representative foreclosing defenses on policy otherwise permissible.

Estoppel arises from acts and conduct of duly authorized representatives of insurance company and operates to foreclose defenses on policy otherwise permissible.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—If insurance contract was as indicated by unauthorized communication, admitting such communication in evidence was not error.

If contract insuring against pay roll robbery was as indicated by unauthorized communication, admitting such communication in evidence in action on pay roll policy was not error, since no harm could result from fact that person expressing such conclusion had no authority to bind insurance company.

7. Insurance ⇨425—Taking pay roll held "robbery" within pay roll insurance policy (Pen. Code, § 211).

As respects pay roll robbery policy, that stranger took money from custodian without display of force but shot at him to prevent recapture and hindrance of escape showed felonious taking, conforming to definition of "robbery" by Pen. Code, § 211, and was within policy protecting against felonious and forcible taking by violence inflicted on person in actual care and custody of property, by putting such person in fear of violence, or by overt or felonious act committed in presence of such person.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Robbery.]

8. Robbery ⇨1—Taking without force or fear is not "robbery," but felonious taking by means of force or fear constitutes "robbery."

Though taking without means of force or fear is not robbery, felonious taking by means of force or fear constitutes "robbery."

out the recital the parties will be referred to merely as plaintiff and defendant, following the plan adopted by counsel in the briefs.

The plaintiff is a copartnership as alleged, and no question arises concerning this or as to the capacity to sue. Defendant is a New York corporation duly authorized to transact business and transacting business of insurance against loss by burglary and pay roll robbery and other similar causes in the state of California. The business of plaintiff is and was at all of the times embraced within this controversy that of plastering contractor, and the principal place of business of plaintiff was at 266 Tehama street in the city and county of San Francisco. It may here be added, unnecessarily, perhaps, that in the very nature of such a business operations or work thereunder was conducted wherever plastering contracts were obtained in the construction of buildings, and in all cases without and away from the premises named. In other words, the business enterprise of plaintiff was not of the character such as contemplated activity in any one particular house or lot. The plaintiff in the course of business employed many men, and had established certain pay days, at which time the wages of the men employed were paid, and the usual place of payment was at the place of employment.

[1] In May of 1922 plaintiff applied to defendant for insurance protecting it against loss of its pay roll; the particular hazard against which it desired insurance being that of robbery. The term "pay roll" in the usual and ordinary acceptation means a fund or sum of money on hand in cash, to be disbursed in payment of wages at a designated place and time, and ordinarily transported in private custody and in lesser exchange denominations. Upon this application in due time defendant, through its admittedly authorized agents and officers, issued to plaintiff a policy of insurance designated, "Pay Roll Robbery Policy (Standard)." It will be unnecessary to detail here all of the provisions of the policy. Such features thereof as are pertinent will be developed hereinafter.

The amount of the obligation assumed by the terms of the policy was $3,000. As stated, this policy was executed and delivered as of May, 1922, and by its terms the coverage was to be for a term of one year. At the end of the period thus designated the policy was renewed to cover the intervening period to May, 1924. No question is presented as to payment of premiums; it being admitted that the same were paid and the contract in full force up to May, 1924. The insurance was negotiated through one William A. Newsom, Jr., concerning whom more will appear hereafter. In January, 1923, the plaintiff became engaged upon a contract involving the plaster work on the Biltmore Hotel at Los Angeles, and in the course of this work employed many men. In January, 1923, plaintiff addressed a letter to Scott & Newsom (being the same Newsom referred to before), which letter specifically referred to the subject of "Fidelity & Casualty of N. Y., Pay Roll Policy." The letter verbatim is as follows:

> "In view of our present pay rolls on the Biltmore Hotel, Los Angeles, we desire you to cover us immediately with additional insurance. Our policy now calls for three thousand ($3,000.00) dollars. We wish this extended to eight thousand ($8,000.00) dollars. Inasmuch as our pay rolls will perhaps only run this amount for some three or four months, we wish you to inform us if we can raise the coverage for that period of time and then return to the original coverage of $3,000.00. You might inform us of the minimum time we can raise a pay roll policy; also if this procedure is permissible. Supply us with the premium rates for the above information, copy of original policy, and rider thereto."

Receiving no reply to this letter within a reasonable time, plaintiff addressed another letter to Scott and Newsom under date of February 7, 1923, attention of Mr. Newsom, which letter is as follows:

> "Referring to our letter of the 22d of January, please give this matter your immediate attention and advise us what you have done in the matter of raising our pay roll insurance to $8,000.00. Trusting you will appreciate the importance of protecting us as we have requested."

Both of these letters were dated at and mailed from Los Angeles.

Before proceeding further, the various parties acting on behalf of defendant may be here identified. It is admitted by defendant that one Treganowen was office manager and assistant resident manager of the Fidelity & Casualty Company, defendant, and his authority to represent the company defendant is conceded. William Newsom, Jr., was referred to as a special agent of defendant. Under his certificate of authority issued to him by defendant, he was designated as an agent in San Francisco and vicinity to act in all lines and to countersign policies and renewals thereof, and to perform such further acts as are incidental to the prosecution of the company's business and as are authorized by the written contract by which he was appointed. This certificate of authority was issued out of the main office of defendant, in New York, under the seal of the company and duly executed. The office of Newsom was immediately adjoining the main San Francisco office of the company, there being a door between, and the company paid the rent of Newsom's room.

When Newsom received the letters set forth hereinbefore he personally submitted the same to Treganowen and discussed the situation with him many times. Treganowen had issued the policy then in effect. Newsom told Treganowen that he had an inquiry from plaintiff for additional insurance, and that plaintiff was then operating in Los Angeles as well as in San Francisco and Fresno; also explaining to him that it was possible that at some time plaintiff might get a job at some unforeseen place. Newsom suggested and requested that the plaintiff should have coverage for at least four places. Treganowen assured Newsom that he would take care of the matter, and his method of thus handling the situation was to issue a new policy for and in the amount of $5,000, and attach certain riders to the then outstanding policy of $3,000. We have nothing before us indicating the provisions of the second policy for $5,000, and no issue seems to have been raised concerning it. It would no doubt have been helpful to the trial court and to us had this last policy been made a part of the record. However, as liability was admitted and discharged to the extent thereof under the last policy, we may assume that it did specifically cover the Los Angeles job. This brings us back to the original policy here involved.

This policy, as hereinbefore indicated, was in a standard form. By its terms it agreed to indemnify assured against all loss by robbery occurring during the hours beginning at 7 a. m. and ending at 7 p. m. of property intended for the sole use of the pay roll of the assured, from a custodian while inside or outside of the premises, engaged in any of the regular duties devolving on the custodian in connection with the pay roll of the assured. The term "premises" within the meaning of the policy is limited to the interior of the assured's office, store, or factory, occupying the ground floor of 266 Tehama street, San Francisco. By the terms of the policy, the pay roll is to be taken from bank to location where work is being carried on. Paragraph or clause 9 of the policy provided:

> "There will not be at any one time more than one custodian having in his care and custody property insured hereunder."

On the policy as originally executed and delivered there was an attached rider providing that for a premium of $18.22 the company would continue the policy in force for the period of another year, and then, upon payment of $12.15, the policy would be continued for still another year. After the application for increased insurance had been received and considered, the defendant, through its admittedly authorized representative, Treganowen, in addition to issuing the $5,000 policy referred to, made changes in the original $3,000 policy by attaching riders thereto, which will be now discussed.

The first rider provided that for an additional premium of $15.92 (50 per cent. increase) clause 9 of the policy is amended to provide that there may be at one time more than one custodian, namely, four custodians having care and custody of property insured. The next rider provided for different premium rates in the event of renewal. By the terms of this rider the original rates on renewal were doubled.

It may be here repeated that all of these changes and the execution of the new policy were in response to the letters received from plaintiff hereinbefore set forth, and were delivered to Newsom after all of the requirements of plaintiff had been thoroughly discussed.

Upon receipt of the new policy and the changed riders for the first policy, Newsom, under date of February 27, 1923, forwarded to plaintiff at Los Angeles the riders with directions to attach same to the policy, and in the letter of transmittal assured plaintiff that, under the rider amending clause 9 as to custodians, the policy then provided for four custodians in four different locations.

This sufficiently sets forth the record. It is conceded, for the purposes of this branch of the case, that, if the policy as amended covered the plaintiff's pay roll while operating in Los Angeles, defendant is liable. No question arises as to loss or due proof thereof at this time. The contention of appellant is that the policy as changed provided for extra custodians, but all confined to San Francisco, and by the terms of the policy are tied to the premises in San Francisco, described as 266 Tehama street.

Appellant argues that, if it be conceded that plaintiff asked for and defendant intended to give to him a policy covering the loss here involved, nevertheless, such a policy was not executed, and that, if plaintiff has any remedy, it is to seek a reformation of the contract and then sue upon the policy as reformed. The argument of appellant continues to the effect that the policy specifically designates the premises at Tehama street, and by implication confines the liability to business done from those premises. In support of this it urges the facts and circumstances surrounding the execution of the original policy, and the further contention that the company had a right to believe, and did believe, that its risk would be confined to San Francisco, and with this in view accepted the risk insured against. Many authorities are cited to establish the principle that an insurer is liable only to the extent of his contract, and with these authorities we need have no quarrel. We may concede that the courts have been in general accord on the principle that no new or additional liability shall be placed on an insurer beyond the terms of its written policy. Insurance, as a legitimate branch of modern business life, is essential to economic progress and is encouraged under the law. Notwithstanding this, whether it be a policy of insurance or any other form of contract, the law still retains its one dominant characteristic as a means of promoting justice. Accordingly, the law undertakes two inquiries. First, What was the actual contract; and, secondly, what has been the conduct of the parties with reference thereto?

[2, 3] Here the actual contract is in itself vague and ambiguous. The main clause in the contract provides against loss by robbery from a custodian inside or outside of the premises, engaged in any of the regular duties in connection with said pay roll. Appellant concedes this, but claims that after describing the premises the term "outside" meant immediately outside. That this is a forced construction is apparent from the further provision of the policy that the pay roll insured is to be taken from the bank direct to the location where the work is being carried on, with no reference whatsoever to the premises. The phrase "inside or outside" usually gives the idea of a whole, and without qualification indicates no limitation. In passing it might be observed that, if the policy had referred to San Francisco, and had specified the liability as attaching to the pay roll "inside or outside" of San Francisco, it could not be seriously contended, in the absence of some qualification, that the liability extended only to places immediately adjoining the city named. When appellant argues that at the time of the execution of the policy the facts and circumstances surrounding were such as to induce the company to believe that the extent of liability incurred was confined to San Francisco, and that if an ambiguity appears it is to be resolved by carrying out the intent of the parties, such an argument but admits the liability here, for the reason that, when the policy was altered and re-executed, the facts surrounding demonstrated the intent of all concerned and left no uncertainty therein. The company knew just exactly what plaintiff desired in the way of protection. It knew that he required and requested protection for his Los Angeles pay roll to the extent of $8,000. By no stretch of the language of the letter of plaintiff can it be inferred that plaintiff was seeking $5,000 for Los Angeles, and then wanted the privilege of four custodians instead of one for the San Francisco pay roll. There are but two conclusions which can be drawn from the fact of change in the original policy. One is that the policy was changed and the premium raised pursuant to a desire and intent to give the insured the additional protection desired, and the other is that the change was made for no reason at all but just out of a clear sky.

We adopt the first conclusion. There is nothing in the policy itself indicating that its effect was limited to San Francisco; and even in its original form providing for one custodian and not requiring payment from the premises described, but specifically waiving that payment be from such place, it might well be construed as covering a Los Angeles pay roll.

Appellant urges then that, if plaintiff was covered on the Los Angeles pay roll, why did he seek the change in the form of contract? Then comes to appellant the unanswerable question that, if the policy did not cover Los Angeles, what purpose could there have been in the modifications and additions other than to cover the last-named place? The usual form of printed policy contains general clauses, followed by exceptions to be inserted governing each particular case. These exceptions when inserted override general terms inconsistent therewith pursuant to elementary rules of construction.

[4, 5] Without taking up each line of argument advanced by appellant, or pointing out the inconsistencies apparent, we hold that the contract itself with its riders and modifications is sufficient to embrace the plaintiff's claim here. And further still we hold that, if there should be the slightest doubt remaining on that score, the defendant should be and is estopped under the admitted facts from urging a defense on that ground. Reid v. Northern Assurance Co., 63 Cal. App. 114, 218 P. 290; Steil v. Sun Insurance Co., 171 Cal. 795, 155 P. 72. The cases cited, containing the same facts, confirm the settled law of this state that an estoppel arises from acts and conduct of duly authorized representatives of insurance companies, and operates to foreclose defenses upon the policy otherwise permissible.

[6] What has been said disposes of the points urged by appellant regarding alleged errors in the admission of certain correspondence. If the contract was as indicated by an unauthorized communication, no harm could result from the fact that the person expressing such a conclusion had no authority to bind the company. Provident G. Mining Co. v. Manhattan Co., 168 Cal. 304, 142 P. 884.

Finally, appellant contends that, should it be determined that the policy in question covered loss by robbery of the pay roll in Los Angeles, still no liability accrued under the policy, for the simple reason that the loss claimed did not result from robbery.

[7] This brings us to an examination of the facts surrounding the loss; it being conceded that there was a loss, and due proof thereof made sufficient to warrant recovery in case of robbery. The facts are these: Simpson, one of the plaintiffs, testifies:

> On February 5, 1924, about 3 p. m., I took a pay roll from Bank of Italy in Los Angeles to Biltmore Theater; the points mentioned being but a few blocks apart. The pay roll contained some $7,951 lawful money of the United States, and was to be used exclusively in paying the wages then due to employees of the assured. I took the money to the job and turned it over to the foreman to pay off. During the conversation with the foreman, I handed him the money, and both of us were standing close togeth> er, and as I handed him the money there was a hand that came between us and took the money, and a voice said, "I'll take this." It was the hand and voice of a stranger, and as the hand grabbed the money the stranger started to go. At first I did not realize what happened, but before the stranger had gone 20 feet I knew it was something wrong, and ran after the fellow. The fellow pulled a gun and fired two shots. Between dodging around I managed to gain on the holdup man, and as I would get closer he would shoot. Finally, after advancing and backing and after many shots had been fired, I got up face to face with him, and he put the gun right in my face, and as I jumped to one side he fired again, and I stopped, and the holdup man escaped. His method of escape was to jump in a standing automobile, and under threat of the gun he compelled the driver to proceed. I never got the money back, and the exact amount I lost was $7,949.15.

Appellant contends that these facts do not show the commission of any robbery. It concedes the taking to be felonious, but characterizes it as larceny or any other form of theft exclusive of robbery, and particularly is it urged that the acts detailed do not constitute robbery as the term is defined in the policy itself.

The policy limits the liability to a felonious and forcible taking (a) by violence inflicted upon the person in the actual care and custody of the property at the time; (b) by putting such person in fear of violence; (c) by an overt felonious act committed in the presence of such person or persons and of which they were actually cognizant at the time.

The felonious taking thus described conforms to the definition of robbery as found in the Penal Code of this state, section 211. All parties here concede that, if the offense committed in the taking of the pay roll was larceny, or any offense other than robbery, plaintiff cannot recover.

We hold that the taking was of a character sufficient to bring it within the terms of the policy and fasten liability on defendant. The entire transaction from the appearance of the hand to the last shot immediately preceding the escape constituted but one connected occurrence. And surely in that transaction we find unmistakably a characteristic of robbery, namely, putting a person in fear of violence.

[8] There is a sharp conflict of authority on the question. Many courts hold that the actual taking must be accomplished by means of force or fear; that the physical act resulting in a change of possession must be so accomplished. A digest of all of the authorities would serve no useful purpose. As is not unusual, no case can be found exactly corresponding in facts. All of the authorities, however, agree that a taking without means of force or fear is not robbery. And, likewise, all agree that the felonious taking by means of force or fear constitutes the crime of robbery. The point then arises as to just what constitutes a taking. If the felonious taking is completed without force or fear, then subsequent force or fear employed in resisting recovery has been held by some of the authorities to be so far separated from the taking as to change the character of the offense. No more fertile field for argument can be found than on this very topic. In our opinion, with the facts of the instant case as stated, to hold that the taking here in question was without the use of force or fear, and therefore not a robbery, would be to hold against both the letter and the spirit of the law. The law grades offenses proportionate to the wrong done and the injury resulting or likely to result to the body politic. The classification is not an arbitrary one, but is founded upon centuries of human experience. Throughout the law deprecates violence, and through no niceties of construction should it be favored. As before stated, there are many of the older authorities that adopt a forced reasoning in attempting to segregate and individualize each step in the commission of an offense. But we feel that under present conditions this overnicety should be abandoned. In the case at bar the predominant elements in the taking were force and fear. The thief was armed at all times, and the actual physical act of gaining possession was obviously with the intent to assert and enforce that possession even at the expense of human life. The loss of the pay roll was not in any sense due to the mere gaining possession, but was the result of the violence used and fear engendered thereby. Without pursuing the subject further, we hold that the facts showed a robbery within the meaning of the policy.

Incidentally, it might be added that the defendant company recognized this in paying the claim under the second policy of $5,000 and did not dispute that a robbery had occurred. This, of course, means nothing as a legal proposition. It does show, however, that a mere recital of the facts is quite convincing. Moreover, clause (c) of the policy fastens liability of the defendant for loss resulting from felonious and forcible taking "by an overt felonious act committed in the presence of the custodian and of which he was actually cognizant at the time."

The judgment is affirmed.

E. CLEMENS HORST CO. v. SACRAMENTO COUNTY. (Civ. 3444.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 17, 1928.

Rehearing Denied March 17, 1928.

Taxation ⚷543(6)—Complaint held not to allege hops were in course of exportation on first Monday in March so as to be tax exempt (Const. U. S. art. I, § 10).

Taxpayer's complaint, in action to recover taxes paid on hops, alleging that hops were sold October 1, 1923, and "that thereafter * * * the said 1,000 bales of hops were started and forwarded on their export journey," held not to allege hops had been started on their export journey on or before first Monday in March, 1924, so as to be in course of exportation at that time and therefore exempt from taxation, under Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, prohibiting state laying export duties; allegation that hops "were, on the first Monday in March, 1924, ever since have been, and still are exports" being mere conclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the E. Clemens Horst Company against the County of Sacramento. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Q. Brown, Jr., of Sacramento, and Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Neil R. McAllister, Dist. Atty., and Alex. J. Ashen, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action to recover money paid as taxes on 1,000 bales of hops. The trial court sustained the defendant's general demurrer to the complaint and granted the plaintiff 10 days to amend. Plaintiff elected to stand upon the complaint and judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment. The allegations of the complaint material to the questions presented by the appeal are:

> "That said assessment was in violation of the provisions of article 1, § 10, of the Constitution of the United States, providing that no state shall lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, because the said property, against which said assessment was levied, were, on the first Monday of March, 1924, ever since have been, and still are exports.
> "That on April 8, 1920, a contract was made, and entered into by and between the E. Clemens Horst Company, plaintiff herein, hops growers, of San Francisco, Cal., and Samuel Allsopp & Sons, Limited, of the city of Burton-on-Trent, England, whereby E. Clemens Horst Company was to sell and deliver to the said Samuel Allsopp & Sons, Limited, 1,000 bales of hops grown on any of E. Clemens Horst Company's ranches, said hops to be forwarded to Burton-on-Trent, and/or delivered at Pacific Coast shipping points.
> "That said 1,000 bales of hops were grown on a ranch of the plaintiff in Sacramento county, Cal., generally known as the Brewer ranch, and were, on or about October 1, 1923, sold by the plaintiff to the said Samuel Allsopp & Sons, Limited, and title to said hops thereupon passed to said purchaser, but the possession of such hops was retained by the plaintiff for the purpose of forwarding and exporting the same to the city of Burton-on-Trent, England, for the said purchaser; and that thereafter and pursuant to such purpose and the said contract of the parties and with the intention on the part of the plaintiff and the said purchaser of exporting the said hops, the said 1,000 bales of hops were started and forwarded on their export journey, consigned to such purchaser, and were transported from the place of production thereof, to wit, the said Brewer ranch in Sacramento county, Cal., to Hopfen Railroad Station at Sacramento, Cal.
> "That heretofore, and prior to the said first Monday in March, 1924, a temporary embargo was imposed by the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland upon the transportation of hops into the said last-named country; that by reason of said embargo the exportation of said 1,000 bales of hops was temporarily interrupted, and said hops were temporarily left in possession and custody of the E. Clemens Horst Company and stored in the Lawrence warehouse, city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, by said Samuel Allsopp & Sons, Limited, purchasers, owners, and consignees of said 1,000 bales of hops That said 1,000 bales of hops are now in the course of exportation from this country to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by reason thereof are not subject to taxation by said county of Sacramento."

Respondent does not controvert appellant's statement that "goods in course of exportation from this state to foreign countries are not subject to taxation by the state." For the purposes of this opinion, at least, it may be conceded, as stated by appellant, "that from the moment when a shipper starts goods on a journey to a destination abroad with the intention that the journey shall be continuous and uninterrupted, the same are exports, and thereafter no temporary interruption of such a shipment alters its character as an export." The complaint, however, does not allege that the goods in question had been started on their journey on or before the first Monday in March, 1924. The allegation is that the hops were sold October 1, 1923, and "that thereafter * * * the said 1,000 bales of hops were started and forwarded on their export journey." If they were so started after the first Monday in March, they were properly assessed and taxed. Appellant concedes that "the mere intention of an owner to export goods is insufficient to make the shipment one in interstate or foreign commerce." The allegation that the hops "were, on the first Monday in March, 1924, ever since have been, and still are exports" is not a statement of fact, but a mere conclusion. It is alleged that the hops "are now in the course of exportation," but the plaintiff, throughout the complaint, has carefully refrained from alleging that they were in course of shipment or exportation on the first Monday of March, 1924. The complaint is so clearly defective by reason of the omissions mentioned that a consideration of the questions of law discussed in the briefs is deemed unnecessary.

SLY v. ABBOTT et al. (Civ. 6122.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 10, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑194(1)—Omission of prayer from answer held not ground for reversal, where first raised on appeal.

Omission of prayer from answer, treated as sufficient at trial of action for profits and accounting, held not ground for reversal, where point was first raised on appeal.

2. Pleading 🔑403(5)—Defective description in cross-complaint, alleging defendants' interest in certain lots described in complaint, without designating which, held cured by answer alleging plaintiff's half interest in all.

Defective description of lots in cross-complaint, alleging that defendants "have an interest in certain of the lots * * * described in the complaint," without designating which ones, held cured by allegation in answer to cross-complaint that plaintiff was absolute owner of undivided half interest in all such lots.

3. Judgment 🔑18(2)—In accounting action, judgment denying money recovery and quieting title against plaintiff held supported by pleadings, though not alleging abandonment, estoppel, or forfeiture.

In action for accounting, judgment denying money judgment asked by plaintiff and quieting title against him held supported by pleadings, though neither answer nor cross-complaint alleged abandonment, estoppel, or forfeiture.

4. Estoppel 🔑107—Quieting title 🔑34(1)—One relying on estoppel or other equitable facts for decree quieting title must allege such facts when opportunity presents.

One who relies on estoppel or other facts of equitable cognizance as basis for decree quieting title must allege such facts in his pleading when he has opportunity to do so.

5. Joint adventures 🔑4(1)—Plaintiff's default in payments divested him of title without regard to estoppel or other equitable facts not pleaded.

Default of one suing for accounting of profits from purchase and sale of realty by coadventurer in making payments as agreed for property purchased from defendant divested plaintiff of any title therein as matter of law, without regard to estoppel or other facts of equitable cognizance not pleaded.

6. Joint adventures 🔑1—Complaint, evidence, and plaintiff's briefs on appeal from decree quieting title against him held to justify conclusion that parties were coadventurers.

Complaint and evidence, in action for accounting of profits from purchase and sale of lots and plaintiff's briefs on his appeal from decree quieting title against him, held to justify conclusion that plaintiff was coadventurer with defendant in joint enterprise.

7. Joint adventures 🔑4(1)—Joint adventurer is beneficiary of constructive trust.

The nature of the title of a joint adventurer is that of a beneficiary of a constructive trust.

8. Joint adventures 🔑4(1)—Extent of joint adventurer's title is measured by extent of his interest in venture.

The extent of the title of a joint adventurer is measured by the extent of his interest in the venture.

9. Joint adventures 🔑1—Joint adventure in purchase and sale of realty may be formed and abandoned by parol agreement.

A joint adventure in the purchase and sale of real estate may be formed or abandoned by parol agreement.

10. Joint adventures 🔑1—Joint adventurer's statement that he was out of venture terminated his interest, and left others free to proceed without him.

When joint adventurer declared his inability to carry on, and stated that he was out of venture, his interest terminated, and other associates were free to go forward with enterprise without him.

11. Joint adventures 🔑1—Joint enterprise in purchase and sale held entire enterprise because success depended on payments being made by associates as class.

Joint enterprise in purchase and sale of realty held an entire one, as dependent for its success on purchase payments being made by associates as a class.

12. Joint adventures 🔑1—Joint adventurers' conveyance of property to trustee would not materially change their titles.

Conveyance of property, purchased by joint adventurers for sale at profit, to trustee for benefit of each in stated proportion, would not materially change character of title of each from that of coadventurer or beneficiary of constructive trust.

13. Joint adventures 🔑1—Title of one contracting to purchase realty before agreement making parties joint adventurers would be that of vendee, and terminate on unexcused default in payment, if contract were not superseded.

If executory installment contracts for purchase of real estate were not entirely superseded by subsequent agreement merging all previous contracts, and making parties joint adventurers, purchaser's title would be that of vendee, and terminate on his unexcused default and refusal to pay on demand.

14. Joint adventures ⚷1—Failure to pay amount due under agreements to purchase realty and pay vendor same amount for taking purchaser into joint adventure terminated latter's rights as joint adventurer and vendee.

Purchaser's failure to pay balance due by virtue of agreement to purchase realty and subsequent agreement to pay same sum to vendor, in consideration of latter and other associates taking purchaser into joint adventure for purchase and sale of realty, terminated latter's right to remain or become joint adventurer, as well as his interest as vendee.

15. Joint adventures ⚷5(2)—Testimony as to conference of joint adventurers in purchase and sale of realty with original owners of realty, purchased from one such adventurer by coadventurer, held admissible on issue of latter's readiness, ability, and willingness to perform.

In action for accounting of profits from purchase and sale of realty, testimony as to conference of plaintiff, defendant, and their coadventurers in purchase and sale of realty with original owners of property, which plaintiff had contracted to purchase from defendant, held admissible on issue whether plaintiff was ready, willing, and able to perform his obligations.

16. Evidence ⚷155(10)—Plaintiff having first offered evidence of conference, defendant could offer evidence of entire conversation thereat (Code Civ. Proc. § 1854).

Where plaintiff, in action for accounting of profits from purchase and sale of realty, offered evidence of conference held by himself, defendant, and their coadventurers with original owners of realty, purchased by plaintiff from defendant, latter could offer evidence to show entire conversation, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1854.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action for accounting by Elmer R. Sly against William Abbott and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph F. Seymour, of Riverside, and Frank J. McDougal, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. D. Van Nostran and Glen Behymer, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. Defendant William Abbott was engaged in the real estate business. He contracted to purchase a large number of real estate lots from John A. Van Pelt and associates, and also from the Pen Bryn Land Company. Thereupon he turned about and associated with himself the plaintiff Sly, J. W. Allen, and later Richard Eagan. These four men, as a result of written and verbal agreements executed amongst themselves, became, as contended for by appellant, joint adventurers, with the object in view of completing the purchase of said lots from the original owners, and selling them out piecemeal to the public at a profit. The more important details of the steps taken by which these four men formed this syndicate, and later separated are as follows: First, there were four documents executed between the 18th and the 22d days of January, 1923, by which the plaintiff, Sly, and his associate J. W. Allen agreed to purchase said lots from defendant William Abbott by making an initial payment and agreeing to make subsequent installment payments extending over a considerable period of time. The first in date of these four documents is a memorandum of agreement made the 18th day of January, 1923. Time was expressly made the essence of the agreement. Therein plaintiff, Sly, and associate Allen paid $150 down, and agreed to pay, among other installments, the aggregate of $1,500 within 30 days, and the sum of $5,150 within 90 days, which would mean April 18, 1923. The other three documents were less formal; each being simply a receipt signed by defendant Abbott acknowledging receipt from plaintiff, Sly, and his associate Allen of a deposit and part payment on account of the purchase of certain groups of the said lots of real estate, and designating the total price and the times for the installment payments on the balance of the purchase price. These receipts contemplated a more formal contract to be made a few days later, when further payments were to be made. Thereafter plaintiff, Sly, persuaded Richard Eagan to join the enterprise. Eagan paid $4,000 for the privilege, and such agreements were had, oral and written, that all the previous contracts and agreements between the four parties were, on the 29th day of January, 1923, merged into one contract between the plaintiff, Sly, defendant Abbott, J. W. Allen, and Richard Eagan. Each of these four men then became, according to the findings, the owner of an undivided one-fourth interest in and to any rights, equities, or profits to accrue from the sale of the said real estate lots. As part of the consideration of said merger agreement, plaintiff, Sly, had theretofore agreed to pay defendant Abbott $5,150 on the 18th day of April, 1923. This is the same sum which he was obliged to pay under the memorandum agreement above referred to and dated January 18, 1923. Of this sum plaintiff, Sly, together with Allen, had previously paid $150. J. W. Allen, on the 1st day of April, 1923, withdrew from the syndicate assigning all his interest to the remaining three, Sly, Abbott, and Eagan.

On the 18th day of April, 1923, a conference was had at which all interested parties were present. What happened at this conference forms the important part of this case. Payments due to the original owners, Van Pelt and Pen Bryn Land Company, were in default. The payment of $5,000, which Sly had agreed to pay to Abbott on the 18th of April, 1923, had not been made. The clear weight of the testimony, and as found by the trial court, shows that at this meeting the following occurred: Mr. Lincoln, an attorney at law, representing the original owners, required and demanded of each of the members of the syndicate that the overdue payments due to the original owners be paid at once. The response of the members of the syndicate was as follows: Abbott said he was waiting for Sly to pay him the $5,000. J. W. Allen said that he had already sold out, and was present to collect a balance due him on that account. Richard Eagan said that he would not put up another cent; that he had gone into the syndicate under misrepresentations; that he wanted nothing so much as to get his money back and return to Boston. Plaintiff, Sly, said in effect: I have no money, and cannot borrow any, and cannot pay a cent, but, if you will take care of Eagan, I will be satisfied to drop out and surrender my interest. Thereupon Lincoln and defendant Gray, who was also present at the conference, and who subsequently bought out Abbott's interest. conferred together, and agreed to take care of Eagan. This was subsequently done. They bought out Eagan. The conference adjourned and thereafter Abbott, Gray, and successors carried on the enterprise with their own funds.

According to this version of the conference, all of the four members of the syndicate had withdrawn, except Abbott, and this was Abbott's attitude as expressed by his answer filed in this suit.

The plaintiff, Sly, however, denying the essential features of the conference as we have outlined them above, claimed that he had not withdrawn or surrendered, but that he still remained in the syndicate. He filed this action based upon that claim. The complaint alleged, in effect, that Abbott had taken matters into his own hands, and had made a large profit, of which the plaintiff's share was some $34,000; that plaintiff, Sly, was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the syndicate, lots, and profits; that defendant Abbott had wrongfully secured and retained for himself certain commissions, and also a secret profit, by turning into the syndicate certain lots at a higher price than that which he had paid for the same; that, by reason of these two things, Abbott owed plaintiff in excess of the $5,000 which Sly was in default to Abbott under his contracts. The complaint followed this with an allegation that the plaintiff was ready, willing, and able to perform his obligations, and to pay any sums of money due to Abbott, if any be due to him.

The findings of the court were that it was untrue that Abbott had received any secret commissions, and found that it was untrue that said defendant Abbott had made a secret profit of $5,000, as alleged by the plaintiff. The court also found that the plaintiff was not ready, willing, and able to fulfill his obligations and make the payments as required by his agreements, particularly the contract of January 18, 1923, and, further, that plaintiff, Sly, defaulted in the payment of $5,000 due Abbott on the 19th of April, 1923, and further defaulted in the payment of his share of overdue payments of $3,600 to the original owners of the land. The court further found expressly and in detail upon the occurrences taking place at the conference of April 19, 1923, and these findings state the facts substantially as we have outlined them above, which include the statement that Sly had agreed to surrender his interest, if defendants Abbott and Gray would buy out Eagan, and that Abbott and Gray had done so.

Going further with reference to this conference, the court also found that Sly did then and there abandon and relinquish all his rights, and, still further, that the action of Sly in so abandoning his interest had created an estoppel, precluding him from asserting any interest in the property or in the profits.

[1, 2] Practically all of the points urged by appellant on this appeal are based upon the contention that the findings of the court of abandonment, relinquishment, and estoppel are outside of the issues raised by the pleadings. The pleadings were as follows: The complaint, as we have already set forth, was an action for profits and an accounting. The defendants' answer contained denials and admissions, but raised no new issues. The answer is criticized, in that the prayer was omitted. This point is raised for the first time upon appeal. The answer was treated as sufficient at the trial, and this defect is no ground for a reversal at this time. Hoffman v. Pacific Coast Constr. Co., 37 Cal. App. 125, 173 P. 776; Goldsmith v. Board of Education, 63 Cal. App. 141, 218 P. 296. Defendants Gray and Lena Abbott, the successors in interest by transfer from William Abbott, filed a cross-complaint, alleging that they "have an interest in certain of the lots which are described in the complaint on file herein"; that the plaintiff claims an interest in said lots adverse to said cross-complainants, which is without right. It prayed for a decree that their title be quieted against the plaintiff, Sly. This cross-complaint is criticized for the defective description of the property to which title is sought to be quieted. At the time the cross-complaint was filed, the original complaint had been superseded by an amended complaint. The reference in the description to the complaint may be therefore taken as a reference to the amended complaint, but the description says "in certain of the lots," without designating which ones. No demurrer, however, was filed. The plaintiff answered, and in his answer to the cross-complaint he not only denied that the defendants William Abbott, John Gray, and Lena Abbott had any interest in any of the lots described in the complaint and amended complaint on file in the action, but also affirmatively alleged that he (the plaintiff) was the absolute owner of an undivided one-half interest in and to all the said lots. This affirmative allegation in the answer to the cross-complaint cures the defective description in the cross-complaint. Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 169, 42 P. 568; Kreling v. Kreling, 118 Cal. 413, 50 P. 546.

[3] The appellant's claim that the findings are outside of the issues raised by the pleadings is not based, however, upon the minor defects which we have just noticed. The claim is based upon the failure of either the answer or cross-complaint to allege abandonment, estoppel, or forfeiture.

Respondents' reply to this point is simply that the findings thus attacked are superfluous, and that the judgment is easily supported without them. So far as the judgment is a mere denial of the money judgment asked for by plaintiff, respondents' answer is easily sufficient. The judgment, however, goes further, and quiets title against the plaintiff. Plaintiff is not only denied a money judgment, but it is determined by the judgment that he has no right, title, or interest in the property.

[4] The cross-complaint and the answer thereto merely raised the issues of an ordinary suit to quiet title, and do not by any express averment raise equitable issues such as estoppel. This fact raises the question of whether the facts occurring at the conference April 19, 1923, as found by the court, have the effect of divesting plaintiff of his legal title, if any he had, in the property, for it is well settled that one who relies upon estoppel or other facts of equitable cognizance as a basis for a decree quieting title must allege such facts in his pleading when he has the opportunity to do so.

[5] The default of the plaintiff, Sly, in making the various payments as agreed effectually divested him of any title in the property as a matter of law, and this without the aid of those findings on facts of equitable cognizance which apparently were not pleaded.

[6-11] The relationship of Sly to Abbott should be considered to be essentially that of a coadventurer in a joint enterprise. This is justified by the evidence, and is justified by the fact that the plaintiff's complaint is based upon that theory and it is also the appellant's claim, as set forth at length in his briefs, that the interest of plaintiff was that of joint adventurer. The nature of the title of a joint adventurer is that of a beneficiary of a constructive trust. Koyer v. Willmon, 150 Cal. 785, 90 P. 135. Obviously, the extent of his title is measured by the extent of his interest in the venture. To the extent that he is out of the venture he has no title. A joint adventure in the purchase and sale of real estate may be formed by a parol agreement (Koyer v. Willmon, supra), and so may be likewise abandoned by parol agreement. Consequently, when plaintiff declared his inability to carry on, and stated that he was out of the venture, his interest terminated. He was no longer a beneficiary of the trust. Thereupon, the other associates were free to go forward with the enterprise, leaving him out. A case much like this one upon this point is Commercial Bank v. Weldon, 148 Cal. 601, 84 P. 171. See, also, Miller v. Butterfield, 79 Cal. 62, 21 P. 543. This is not a case where one of the members of a joint adventure has performed his obligations with regard to some units of the enterprise undertaken and not as to others. Neither is it a case where one had made substantial contribution in labor or money up to a certain point and thereafter disassociated himself from his fellows. The plaintiff here defaulted almost at the beginning of the enterprise. The purchase of the lots called for some $87,000. Plaintiff's entire contribution was apparently a small portion of the initial payments upon some of the four contracts of purchase which he and Allen had made with Abbott. This enterprise was an entire one, inasmuch as it faced failure as an entirety on account of the purchase payments not being made. On April 19, 1923, the associates were faced with a crisis. Entire failure threatened them because the original and real owners of the land demanded prompt payment of overdue installments on pain of forfeiture. The associates, as a class, failed and refused to pay, and thereupon the real and original owners concluded the sale with Abbott, who first had the contracts in his name, and with Gray, who thereafter came into the deal. This was substantially the same conduct which is approved in Commercial Bank v. Weldon, supra.

[12] The agreement of January 29, 1923, which we have referred to as merging all previous contracts and making the parties joint adventurers, also recited that it was the intention of the parties that the property was to be transferred to a trustee to be held in trust for the benefit of the parties in the proportion of one-quarter each. It also stated that this should be done forthwith, and the trust formed on the mutual understanding of the parties. The record does not show any document purporting to transfer to such a trustee. Apparently it was not done, although the testimony shows that Mr. Eagan was sometimes referred to as the trustee. If such a conveyance to a trustee were actually made, the character of plaintiff's claimed title would not be thereby materially changed from that of a coadventurer or beneficiary of a constructive trust.

[13] If the first four executory installment contracts for the purchase of real estate by Sly and Allen from Abbott were not entirely superseded by the merger agreement of January 29, 1923, Sly's title would be that of a vendee, which would terminate upon his unexcused default in installment payments and refusal to pay upon demand. As vendee, therefore, he could not prevail in an action to quiet title brought against him by the vendor. Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 739, 93 P. 1007; Darter v. Schuyler, 47 Cal. App. 457, 190 P. 827; Catterline v. Peterson, 60 Cal. App. 617, 213 P. 515.

[14] The court found that the $5,000 payment due from Sly to Abbott was not only due by virtue of the agreement of purchase of January 18, but also was due by virtue of Sly's agreement to pay said sum to Abbott in consideration of Abbott and the other associates taking Sly into the joint adventure January 29, 1923. Consequently, when Sly refused to make any further payments, he not only violated his agreement with his associates to contribute his share of expenses necessary to go forward with the enterprise, but also defaulted in making the payment agreed to be made by him in consideration of his becoming a joint adventurer at all. His failure to make this payment then terminated his right to remain or become a joint adventurer in the same way that this default would terminate his right as a vendee.

The conclusion of the court that plaintiff has no right, title, or interest in the property is therefore a proper one, independently of the finding of estoppel, and is supported by the pleadings appearing in the judgment roll brought here on appeal.

[15, 16] Error is assigned in the court's action in overruling plaintiff's objections to testimony and in denying his motions to strike out testimony. This testimony all relates to the conference of April 19. The objections and motions were made upon the ground that the evidence was outside of the pleadings, but the evidence was admissible upon the issue of whether plaintiff was ready, willing, and able to perform his obligations, and was also admissible upon the theory, as expressed by the trial court, that, plaintiff himself having first offered evidence of this conference, the defendants were at liberty to offer evidence in contradiction of that offered, and, in fact, to show the entire conversation which occurred at one time and one place. Code Civ. Proc. § 1854.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

LYDON v. BEACH et al. (Civ. 6137.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 7, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑127—Lessee held entitled to possession, and oral promise to quit was without effect, where unexecuted (Civ. Code, § 1698).

Lessee's unexecuted oral promise to the landlord to quit the premises, although his rent was paid at the time, and there was no consideration for such promise, held, because of Civ. Code, § 1698, not to have taken from lessee the right to possession.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑277(2)—Provision that landlord could re-enter and dispossess tenant in default did not justify re-entry and dispossession without three days' notice to quit or pay rent (Civ. Code, § 791).

Where lease provided, and tenant agreed, that, in case at any time he was in default in payment of rent, it should be lawful for lessor to re-enter premises and remove all persons therefrom, covenant held not to justify landlord in re-entering and dispossessing tenant until the landlord had given three days' written notice to the tenant, as required by Civ. Code, § 791, to pay the rent or quit possession.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑277(2)—Demand for rent of month already paid held insufficient as demand for following month to make three days' dispossession statute applicable (Civ. Code, § 791).

Landlord's demand for rent from the 24th of June to the 24th of July held insufficient as a demand for rent from July 24th to August 24th, to make the three days' dispossession notice, required by Civ. Code, § 791, applicable to give landlord right to possession on expiration of three days.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑277(2)—Three days' notice to give landlord right to re-enter and remove tenant in arrears must be given after rent is due or lease is breached (Civ. Code, § 791; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1162).

Under Civ. Code, § 791, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1162, the three days' notice conferring on the landlord the right to re-enter and remove tenant on ground that tenant is in arrears of rent must be given after rent is due or breach of the lease is made.

5. Appeal and error 🔑981—Appellate courts will not disturb order denying new trial for newly discovered evidence, merely impeaching in character.

Appellate courts will not disturb order of lower court denying motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence, where evidence is of an impeaching character only.

6. Appeal and error ⚷1015(2)—Trial court's conclusion, on motion for new trial, based on conflicting affidavits, will not be disturbed on review.

Trial court's conclusion, relative to the granting or refusing of a new trial, will not be disturbed, on review, where based on conflicting affidavits.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by Thomas Lydon against Maude Beach and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Wm. U. Handy and W. H. Thomas, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph Scott and Harold P. Huls, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELCH, Justice pro tem. Action for damages for assault and battery by appellants on the respondent, and for exemplary and punitive damages.

The court rendered judgment for $297 actual damages and $500 by way of exemplary and punitive damages. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. The appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The complaint alleges that appellants Jefferson J. Loque and Myers, on August 28, 1923, violently and maliciously assaulted respondent; that they beat, kicked, choked, and struck him numerous blows; that they bit his right ear, and bruised him upon his body, neck, hip, and person; that each and all of said acts were done by said Loque and Myers under the direction and authority, and at the request of their codefendant Mrs. Beach Loque (whose name was Maude Beach at the time of the alleged battery); that each of said acts was done through ill will and malice toward respondent.

The appellants answered separately. Mrs. Loque denied specifically the allegations of the complaint. Myers denied specifically the allegations of the complaint, and set up as a separate defense that the respondent on the occasion alleged in the complaint first willfully and without just cause or any cause violently assaulted him; that he (Myers) resisted said assault, using only such force as was necessary to repel respondent, to wit, that he held respondent so that respondent could not strike or kick him, and carried respondent from the room in which the assault took place. In addition to his answer, Myers in a so-called cross-complaint claimed damages against respondent in the sum of $510. Appellant Loque in his answer denied making an assault upon respondent, and set up as a separate defense that on August 28, 1923, respondent was unlawfully on certain premises and in the house of Mrs. Beach (whom he afterwards married), in the city of Los Angeles; that Myers and he were guests of Mrs. Beach; that respondent was requested to leave said house and premises, but that said respondent refused so to do, but, on the contrary, violently assaulted Myers; that he (Loque) went to the assistance of Myers; and that he used such force only as was necessary to resist said assault of respondent, to wit, that he and Myers seized respondent so that he could not strike or kick them, and carried respondent from the room in which said assault took place.

We have thus set forth the essential averments of the pleadings of the parties for the purpose of showing that the findings of the court based upon contradictory evidence dispose of all the contentions of appellants here made, with the exception of one or two points which will hereafter be reviewed.

The decision of the court found generally that each and every allegation of the complaint is true, and that each and every allegation of the cross-complaint of Myers and each and every allegation of the separate defense of Loque is untrue. Besides these general findings, the trial court specifically found that Loque and Myers assaulted respondent, beat, kicked, and choked him, bit his ear, and bruised his body, neck, hip, and person, all under the direction and authority of Mrs. Beach, now known as Mrs. Loque; that each and all of said acts done by appellants was done through ill will and malice toward respondent; that respondent did not make any assault upon appellants or any one of them; and that respondent was in the lawful possession of the house and premises of Mrs. Beach on August 28th, the day and on the occasion of the assault.

We have examined the evidence brought up in the bill of exceptions, and find that it is sufficient to support the decision.

The finding of the court that respondent was lawfully in the possession of the house and premises of Mrs. Beach at the time of the assault is seriously attacked by appellants. While the court believes that the finding is binding on the parties and on this court, nevertheless we will briefly review the documentary evidence entering into the finding.

The respondent held a written lease from Mrs. Beach on her house and premises, commencing January 24, 1923, and ending January 23, 1924. The lessee went into possession under the lease on January 24, 1923, and almost from the beginning mutual dissatisfaction existed between lessor and lessee. Finally, on or about August 10, 1923, the parties to the lease had a further dispute about the payment of the rent and the condition of the house and premises. The lessee continued in possession of the premises until August 27th, when on that day appellants entered the house in the absence of respondent, but while his wife was in the house, by removing a screen on the front window, and thereupon proceeded to remove, and did remove, all the furniture and belongings of respondent from the house to the adjacent lawn. Respondent returned to the house later in the day, and he and his wife stayed in the house that night. On the next day the respondent was by physical force removed from the house, as found by the trial judge. The respondent returned to the house, and remained there until August 31st, when he vacated the premises.

[1] The contention of appellants that the lease was canceled by a mutual oral agreement of the parties so as to take the case out of the operation of section 1698, Civil Code, cannot be sustained.

Respondent testified that in the conversation between him and Mrs. Beach on August 10th, "Mrs. Beach said, 'Why don't you get out if you are not satisfied?' and I said, 'That suits me fine. When I use up the money already paid you, I will move out at the end of the month' (August 23d)." The money here referred to was $60, the amount of one month's rent, which, under the terms of the lease, was paid to Mrs. Beach in advance. This money was then in her hands, unused and unapplied. It is not clear from Mrs. Beach's testimony that she agreed to the proposal. Three days after she caused to be served on respondent a notice intended to be the three days' notice required to be given to entitle a landlord to possession in case of default in the payment of rent. Again, on August 27th when respondent offered her $6 for rent for the three days he had been in possession since August 23d, she refused to receive it, unless he would pay the whole month's rent. There was no mutual agreement to cancel the lease. Certainly the lessor never agreed to release respondent from his obligations under the lease. Whatever the conversation may have been between the parties to the lease, it is clear that one of the things proposed to be done by respondent was that he would quit the possession of the premises at the end of the fiscal month. On August 28th, the day of the assault, he was in possession of the premises, in possession under his only right to the possession, the lease. It follows that his oral promise to quit was not executed, and was of no effect (section 1698, Civ. Code), and was without consideration.

[2-4] In any event, on August 28th, the day of the assault, respondent was in default in the payment of his rent. His lease provided, and he agreed, that in case he should at any time be in default in the payment of his rent, then it shall be lawful for the lessor to re-enter the premises and remove all persons therefrom. But this covenant in the lease does not justify the landlord in re-entering and dispossessing the tenant until the landlord shall have given a three days' written notice to the tenant to pay the rent or else quit the possession. Section 791, Civ. Code. Was this three days' notice given? It was not. The notice given and served on August 13th was of no effect, for the reasons: (1) That notice demanded the payment of $60 for rent from "the 24th of June, 1923, to the 24th of July, 1923." It is conceded that that month's rent had been fully paid, and that there was nothing due therefor. This notice was insufficient as a demand for the rent from July 24th to August 24th, even if it be conceded that such rent was unpaid and due. (2) The rent was fully paid to August 24th with the extra $60 of respondent's money which Mrs. Beach had in her hands at that time. The notice of August 13th, even if sufficient in form, was prematurely given and served. The three days' notice conferring on the landlord the right to re-enter and remove his tenant on the ground that the tenant is in arrears of rent must be given after the rent is due or the breach of the lease is made. Section 791, Civ. Code; sections 1161 and 1162, Code Civ. Proc.; Mossi v. Fairbanks, 19 Cal. App. 355, 125 P. 1071; J. B. Hill Co. v. Pinque, 179 Cal. 759, 178 P. 952, 3 A. L. R. 669.

Even on the theory that respondent was unlawfully in possession of Mrs. Beach's property on August 28th, at the time of the assault, appellants are not entitled to a reversal of this case on the ground that Mrs. Beach had the legal right to enter and remove respondent therefrom by physical force. Appellants pleaded no such justification for the assault made upon the respondent, and Mrs. Beach forbade both Myers and Loque to remove respondent from the property by physical force. The evidence shows, and the trial court found, that the force used was greater than was necessary to evict respondent from the premises.

[5, 6] The only remaining point is that the court erred in denying a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The matter set forth in the affidavits upon which the appellants base their motion for a new trial, if true, would tend to impeach the testimony of respondent and his witnesses. Counsel for appellants state in their opening brief that these "affidavits were offered for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Lydon and discrediting the testimony of Marjory Watson." Appellate courts will not disturb the order of the lower court denying motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence where the evidence is of an impeaching character only. Waer v. Waer, 189 Cal. 178, 207 P. 891. Besides, in this case, there were counter affidavits contradicting the affidavits upon which the motion was based. Under the well-known principle, the trial court's conclusion on such conflict will not be disturbed. Waer v. Waer, 189 Cal. 178, 207 P. 891.

Judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

STATE COMPENSATION INS. FUND v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 6101.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 10, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 9, 1928.

Master and servant ⚷375(2)—Widow of employee injured while returning home after service outside usual duties and hours held entitled to compensation (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Widow of employee fatally injured while returning from performing a special service for his employer outside his usual duties as salesman, in leaving home after usual hours to unlock door of store so that electrician could enter and do some work, held entitled to compensation, under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831); going and coming rule being inapplicable.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) by Annie Casey, claimant, for the death of William D. Casey, her husband, an employee of the L. D. MacLean Company, opposed by the State Compensation Insurance Fund, as insurance carrier. Order of the Industrial Accident Commission granting an award, and the insurer applies for certiorari to review the order. Affirmed.

F. J. Creede and H. G. Sanford, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. William D. Casey, an employee of the L. D. MacLean Company in San Francisco, for more than 20 years, died on May 31, 1927, as a result of injuries sustained by him 6 days prior to his death. His surviving widow, Annie Casey, thereafter applied to the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation and was granted an award, which the petitioner herein as the insurance carrier for said company, seeks by this proceeding in certiorari to have annulled. The sole question presented for determination is whether, contrary to the finding of said commission, the nature of the service the decedent was performing at the time he was injured was such as to bring the case within the operation of the so-called "going and coming" doctrine, which in effect declares that injuries sustained by an employee while going to or returning from his work are not compensable under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. 27 Cal. Jur. 380.

As stated, the decedent had been working for said company for many years, and for some time immediately preceding his death filled the position of outside salesman, his duties being to call on customers, take orders, and sell goods; and he was required to report each morning for duty at the company's store on Sutter street. On May 25, 1927, before leaving the store at the end of his day's work he was instructed by one of the company's executives to return to the store that night, after he had finished his dinner at home, for the purpose of unlocking the door and admitting an electrician who would be there to repair a broken switch, to remain on the premises until the work was finished, and then to see that the store was locked. In accordance with his usual custom the decedent left the store on the day mentioned about 5 o'clock, went to his home on Eighth avenue, San Francisco, ate his dinner, and, pursuant to the instructions of his employer, returned to the store, unlocked the door, allowed the electrician to enter, and remained there from 7 o'clock until 10, at which time the electrician finished his work and departed. The decedent then locked the store and boarded a street car to go home. On the way home, and while transferring from one car to another, he slipped and fell on the street or curb, cutting his eye and chin. Believing that his injuries were not serious, he went to work the next day, but on the day following grew worse and consulted a doctor. The injuries rapidly developed into a case of erysipelas and on May 31, 1927, he died.

It is well settled, as petitioner contends, that ordinarily employees who suffer injuries while going to or returning from their place of work are excluded from the benefits of said act, for it is held that they are not at that time rendering a service growing out of or incidental to their employment. 27 Cal. Jur. 380. But the foregoing rule is not absolute. It is subject to many exceptions. As said in Makins v. Industrial Accident Commission, 198 Cal. 698, 247 P. 202, 49 A. L. R. 411:

> The rule generally known as the going and coming rule "has been considered and applied by this court in numerous cases where the person injured was employed to perform service at or in a particular plant or upon particular premises and the injury claimed to be compensable was inflicted while he was going to or returning from his place of employment, or where the employee had left the place of employment on an errand personal to himself. The general rule, subject to many exceptions, however, is that injuries inflicted under the foregoing circumstances are not compensable. California C. I. Exchange v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 433 [213 P. 257]; London Guar. & Acc. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 587 [213 P. 977]. Awards have > been affirmed by this court, however, where the facts of the case showed that the injured employee was not at the time he was injured upon his master's premises. Judson Mfg. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 181 Cal. 300 [184 P. 1]. Each case must be adjudged by the facts which are peculiarly its own. Industrial accidents are produced by so many varying circumstances that it is rather unusual to find any two or more cases that may be ruled by the same legal precedent." (Italics ours.)

As the commission held, the evidence here proves that this was not the ordinary case of an employee being injured while following his usual custom of going to or coming from the place where he works. On the contrary, it shows beyond doubt that decedent was injured while returning from a special errand which he was performing under the direction of his employer and which required him to leave his home at night, after regular working hours, and called for a service outside of his regular duties as salesman, the sole purpose of which was to help his employer in the latter's business; and it was because of the relationship of employer and employee that the one requested the service and the other rendered it. Manifestly, under such circumstances, it would be a harsh and indefensible rule which would withhold compensation for an injury received by an employee in the performance of such an errand. As pointed out in Ocean Accident & Guarantee Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 313, 159 P. 1041, L. R. A. 1917B, 336, in discussing the question of the application of the going and coming doctrine:

> "The right to an award [under the Workmen's Compensation Act] is not founded upon the fact that the injury grows out of and is incidental to his employment. It is founded upon the fact that the service he is rendering at the time of the injury grows out of and is incidental to the employment. Therefore an employee going to and from his place of employment is not rendering any service, and begins to render such service only when, as has been said, arriving at the place of his employment, he proceeds to use some instrumentality provided, by means of which he immediately places himself in a position to perform his tasks." (Italics ours.)

Obviously, the service decedent was performing on the night he was injured did not have its inception at the store upon his arrival there, nor did it end there immediately upon leaving. It began the instant he left his home on the errand to go to the store for the purpose of allowing the electrical work to be done; and if, as has been held, the "going and coming" rule does not apply to an employee who has sustained an injury in performing a business errand for his employer while going home (Sun Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 76 Cal. App. 165, 243 P. 892), it would not be reasonable to hold that the rule should apply where the employee is injured while returning to his home from the performance of a business errand. As indicated, it was in effect held in Sun Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., supra, that the "going and coming" rule should not be held to apply where the employee was injured while primarily engaged in a business errand for his employer, notwithstanding that he was at the time returning home after having finished his day's work; and substantially the same principle was involved in Western Pacific R. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 193 Cal. 413, 224 P. 754, except in the latter case the accident to the employee happened after leaving his home. We are of the opinion that the doctrine stated in the foregoing cases is applicable to the facts here.

In support of its contention for the application of the "going and coming" rule petitioner has cited a number of decisions of the Industrial Accident Commission, which, however, were not reviewed by the courts; also a few cases from foreign jurisdictions. But the facts of the cases cited are materially different from those of the present one, because in those cases it was shown that the employees when injured were not engaged in the performance of any special errand under instructions from their employers, but were injured while on their way to or coming from their places of employment, where they intended to work or had worked overtime, after regular hours, in the performance of their regular duties. On account of these varying circumstances we do not deem those cases in point. Makins v. Industrial Acc. Com., supra.

For the reasons above stated, we are of the opinion that the commission was fully warranted in finding that the present case is not subject to the operation of the "going and coming" rule. The award is therefore affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

JAMES v. HALL et al. (Civ. 4677.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 23, 1928.

1. Constitutional law 🔑56—Lis pendens 🔑2—Declaratory Relief Act held not invalid as imposing nonjudicial duties upon court or failing to provide for lis pendens (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, providing for declaratory relief, is not unconstitutional as imposing nonjudicial duties upon courts or as failing to give declaration effect of lis pendens.

2. Appearance 🔑20—Defendants appearing by demurrers and answers cannot complain of failure to serve with summons.

Where defendants appeared by demurrers and answers they cannot complain of failure to serve them with summons, since voluntary appearance is equivalent to personal service.

3. Judgment 🔑138(3)—Motion to set aside defaults held properly denied on ground that defendants were not served where they appeared by demurrers and answers (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

Court held not to have abused its discretion in denying motions to set aside defaults in action under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, for declaratory relief, on ground that defendants were not served with summons, where defendants appeared by demurrers and answers.

4. Frauds, statute of 🔑139(1)—Statute of frauds is inapplicable to executed oral contract (Civ. Code § 1624, par. 4).

The statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, par. 4) has no application to an executed oral contract.

5. Judgment 🔑533—Judgment that plaintiff is owner of undivided one-fourth interest in property is not adjudication of partnership (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

Judgment in action under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, for declaratory relief, that "plaintiff is the owner of an undivided one-fourth interest in" property, was not an adjudication of partnership between plaintiff and defendants.

6. Appeal and error 🔑750(1)—Assignment unsupported by argument or authority held insufficient to raise question of power of court to grant injunctive relief in action for declaratory relief (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

Mere assignment that trial court, in action under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, for declaratory relief, erred in decreeing that defendants and their representatives are enjoined from transferring property declared to belong to plaintiff, unsupported by argument or authority, held insufficient to raise question of power of court to grant injunctive relief.

7. Injunction 🔑3—Enjoining defendant from disposing of property declared plaintiff's in action for declaratory relief held proper (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

In action under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, for declaratory relief, enjoining defendants and their representatives from disposing of property declared to belong to plaintiff is purely ancillary to relief sought, and is expressly provided for in the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Harry A. James against Charles J. Hall and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Will D. Gould and Norman T. Mason, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Alfred W. Hare and Albert E. Dunning, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. [1] This is an action brought under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure, entitled "Declaratory Relief." The appeal is from the judgment declaring plaintiff's rights in and to certain moving picture films and productions.

The appellants contend that this is not an action for declaratory relief, but is an unclassified proceeding and unknown to law or equity, and that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and cite section 24, art. 4, of the Constitution.

There is no merit in this contention nor in appellants' arguments to sustain it. The Supreme Court of California in Blakeslee v. Wilson, 190 Cal. 479, 213 P. 495, decided that section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure was constitutional, and, in an opinion by Justice Waste (now Chief Justice), concurred in by the entire court, gives a comprehensive review of the subject of declaratory relief and of sections 1060, 1061, and 1062 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1921, c. 463, p. 689), providing for declaratory relief in the state of California. That was an action brought by the plaintiff for a declaration of his rights under certain contracts of employment entered into with the defendants. A general and special demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment entered dismissing the action and for costs. This judgment was reversed.

That case is so easily accessible and contains such a comprehensive discussion of the subject, and so fully answers appellants' contentions as to section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon this appeal that we deem it sufficient to adopt it as a part of this opinion by reference and only to consider the slight difference in the points involved, and call attention to the analogies. In that case the record disclosed an "actual controversy relating to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties." So does the record in the instant appeal. In that case it was urged that the sections of the Code (above) imposed nonjudicial duties upon the courts, thereby rendering the act unconstitutional; that in effect is appellants' contention here.

In that case the objection was also made that there is nothing in the act giving the declaration of the court the effect of a lis pendens; in the instant appeal it is urged by appellants that there has been no repeal of any sections of the Code by the enactment of section 1060, and that the statute of limitations and the statute of frauds still remain unchanged and function the same, notwithstanding such enactment, and that the "declaration" or judgment of the trial court is in effect a decree for specific performance. The court says, in Blakeslee v. Wilson, supra: "None of these objections [is] sound." As affecting the instant appeal, the same is true here.

In the instant appeal the findings of the court must be examined as to whether the evidence sustains them and whether they sustain the judgment, but that is another matter. There is no merit in appellants' contention that the complaint fails to state a cause of action and that the demurrers should be sustained, nor in the objection that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted.

[2] Appellants contend that no defaults should have been allowed and that the motion to set aside the defaults should have been granted, because, first, the defendants appeared by demurrers and answers; second, because no service of summons was made on defendants defaulted; and, third, because the complaint does not state a cause of action.

The third point has already been disposed of. If appellants' first contention be true, that the defendants appeared by demurrers and answers, then there is no force in the second contention, that they were not served with the summons. Voluntary appearance is equivalent to personal service. Estate of Piercy, 168 Cal. 755, 759, 145 P. 91.

[3] The record discloses:

That on the 9th day of August, 1922, the plaintiff filed his complaint in the above-entitled action and that the summons, with a copy of the complaint, was delivered to defendants Charles J. Hall, Will D. Gould, and Edward H. Hall, a minor, by the clerk of attorneys for the plaintiff without comment, and within the time allowed by law, said defendants served and filed their demurrers and answers to the complaint, said minor appearing by his guardian ad litem duly appointed. That the demurrers were overruled and the case set for trial, and was tried before Hon. Wm. D. Dehy sitting in department 4 of said superior court, on April 4, 5, and 6, 1923. That at the trial the plaintiff introduced evidence both oral and documentary, and rested the case, and thereupon the defendants, and each and all of them, moved for a nonsuit, which was granted as to defendants Will D. Gould and Edward H. Hall, and thereupon the following statements and proceedings were had in open court, to wit:

"Mr. Dunning: I take it that the Bone-Dry Federation remains?

"The Court: I understood there is a default judgment against that defendant.

"Mr. Gould: We challenge the default judgment. There has never been a service on us, and I don't see how the sheriff could report service. If there is any default judgment, we ask that it be set aside and vacated now, and we include in the motion for nonsuit the Bone-Dry Federation, because we do not want to leave a tangle there.

"The Court: On that last proposition we will open that to-morrow and look over the return of summons.

"Mr. Hare: Before the ruling is made on that, we would want to produce the proof of service. * * *"

The declaration of the attorneys for plaintiff then made in open court was based alone upon the statement in the affidavit of said clerk of the attorneys for the plaintiff, to wit:

"Name of Defendants Served.	Date of Service.
Charles J. Hall	Aug. 10, 1922.
Will D. Gould	Aug. 10, 1922.
Bone-Dry Federation, a voluntary association, by service upon Will D. Gould and Charles J. Hall as president and secretary and treasurer, respectively	Aug. 10, 1922.
Charles J. Hall & Son, a partnership, by service upon Charles J. Hall, one of the partners	Aug. 10, 1922.

"My fees for service are $2.00
"Sept. 11, 1922. Donald M. Redwine."

No other service of summons appears of record in said action.

That in accordance with the suggestion of the court, upon the convening of the court the day following, the attorney for the defendant made a motion to set aside the defaults of the Bone-Dry Federation, a voluntary association, and Charles J. Hall & Son Productions, a copartnership, on the ground of insufficient and inadequate service of said defendants. Upon hearing arguments thereon, the court denied said motion and suggested to counsel for the appearing defendants that the proper way to make a motion for setting aside said defaults is upon affidavits and the five days' notice required by the law. It appears that the entry of said default is in the words and figures as follows:

"In this action the defendants Bone-Dry Federation, a voluntary association, and Charles J. Hall & Son Productions, a copartnership, having been regularly served with process, and having failed to appear and answer the plaintiff's complaint, on file herein and the time allowed by law for answering having expired, the default of said defendants, in the premises is hereby duly entered according to law.

"Attest my hand and seal of said court, this 13th day of October, 1922.

"L. E. Lampton, County Clerk,
"By S. Cole, Deputy."

Notices of motions to set aside the defaults of defendants Bone-Dry Federation and Charles J. Hall & Son Productions were given and made by appearing defendants Will D. Gould, Charles J. Hall, and Edward H. Hall, together with their several affidavits, on April 11, 1923.

Said motions, each and all of them, came on regularly for hearing in department 16 of said court on April 19, 1923, and were heard orally on that day, and the court ruled that defendants would be required, according to section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to accompany their said motions with copies of their proposed amended answers, and thereupon allowed the defendants five days to file amended and supplemental motions without waiving the motions already made and to accompany said motions by copy of said proposed amended answers and to file briefs in said matter within five days, and thereupon case to stand submitted.

Notices of motions to set aside defaults and alleged judgment and to amend answers and for leave to file amended answers of the several defendants were duly served and filed in said matter on the 11th day of April, as aforesaid, and briefs of the respective parties were duly served and filed within said time, and thereupon the matter stood submitted on said 24th day of April, 1923, instead of on April 26, 1923 [sic], and thereafter, on the 2d day of May, 1923, said motions and all of them were denied by the court.

The several notices of motions and affidavits and amendments and supplements and proposed amended answers were similar and alike except as to names and the affidavits of the minor alleging the fact that he had become of the age of 21 years prior to the trial.

The foregoing shows the careful and painstaking attention on the part of the trial court and the judge sitting in the law and motion department. We find no error in the rulings nor abuse of discretion in the decision. Morrissey v. Gray, 162 Cal. 638, 124 P. 246; Colquhoun v. Pack, 28 Cal. App. 319, 152 P. 319.

[4] Appellants contend that the complaint alleges that the action is based upon an oral contract or agreement and claims that it involves more than $200, and is in violation of paragraph 4 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, and is void. A full and sufficient answer to this contention is found in the fact that it was alleged, and determined by the trial court, that the plaintiff had fully performed all of the things to be performed by him, which was sufficient to take it out of the statute. The statute of frauds has no application to an executed oral agreement. Freitas v. Freitas, 31 Cal. App. 16, 19, 159 P. 611, 613; Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 479, 488, 30 P. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133.

[5] As to appellants' assignment of error that the court erred in adjudging a partnership between the defendants or any of them, the court made no such adjudication. The judgment merely declared:

> "That plaintiff is the owner of an undivided one-fourth interest in and to the motion picture film and production, formerly known as 'the Trumpet Call,' later known as 'Loyalty,' and now known as 'When Right Meets Might.' Said interest to be free from all indebtedness and incumbrances."

There is no force in appellants' argument that this is a "judgment that the property is owned by partners, one-fourth by the plaintiff and three-fourths by the defendants." It is true that the court in its findings of fact says "that at all times mentioned in the plaintiff's complaint said defendant Bone-Dry Federation was a copartnership between Will D. Gould and Charles J. Hall, two of the defendants herein who did business under the fictitious firm name of Bone-Dry Federation," but this is far different from a parnership between plaintiff and defendant. As an error in a statement of fact, assuming it to be such, it was not an error prejudicial to appellants from which they suffered any substantial injury, nor any injury; but appellants do not raise this question; they complain that the court erred in adjudging a partnership, and, as stated above, the court made no such adjudication.

[6] Finally, appellants specify as error of law that the trial court erred in giving and making a decree and judgment that "defendants, their attorneys, or other representatives are and each of them is hereby enjoined from transferring or in any manner disposing of the undivided one-fourth interest in and to said motion picture film and production which is hereby declared to be the property of plaintiff herein."

It may be inferred that appellants intended to raise the question of the power of the court in an action under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure to grant injunctive relief. We think this an insufficient presentation of the point, unsupported as it is by argument or authority directed to the question involved. In People v. Chutnacut, 141 Cal. 682, 75 P. 340, cited in People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, at p. 375, 201 P. 955, 956, the Supreme Court says: "If counsel will not take the time to point out * * * the law which he invokes, we will not do so." If such an inference as to appellants' intention should be without foundation, then all that we might say on the subject would be mere obiter dictum.

[7] We are also of the opinion that the relief here granted is purely ancillary to the relief sought and decreed and is expressly provided for in the Code section under consideration. The allegations and proof were sufficient to support it.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PIERCE. (Cr. 1580.)★

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1928.

Criminal law 🔑1071—Failure to present application to trial court stating grounds of appeal required dismissal of appeal (Pen. Code, § 1247).

Defendant's failure to present application to trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of appeal and points on which he relied, as required by Pen. Code, § 1247, required dismissal of the appeal, even if grounds of appeal were fully stated in defendant's motion for new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

W. E. Pierce was convicted of the unlawful possession of stills, coils, and apparatus used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

C. W. Benshoof, of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, J. This appeal is from a judgment of conviction of the unlawful possession of stills, coils, and apparatus used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The respondent has made a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that appellant failed to "present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies," as required by section 1247 of the Penal Code. It is there also said:

> "If such application is not filed within said time (five days from the time the appeal is taken) the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed."

We recently held that this section is applicable to appeals taken subsequent to the amendment (St. 1927, p. 1047) of section 1246 of the Penal Code and prior to the promulgation of rules by the judicial council governing the time and manner of preparing the record on appeal. People v. McClellan (Cal. App.) 263 P. 841.

The appellant seeks to escape the force of the statutory provision that the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed upon his failure to present the application by urging that the grounds upon which he relies are fully stated in his motion for a new trial to which reference is made in his notice of appeal. It is said in People v. Flaherty, 61 Cal. App. 775, 215 P. 699:

> "Several times it has been held that the provisions of said section 1247 are mandatory."

Very much the same argument was made in that case as is made here, yet the court concluded that the appeal was "wholly ineffectual." We are of like opinion as to the present appeal. For further authorities to the same effect, reference may be had to those cited in People v. McClellan, supra.

Counsel also relies upon a statement found in the case of People v. McDougal, 74 Cal. App. 666, 241 P. 598, as follows:

> "The Attorney General moved to dismiss the appeal upon two grounds, the first of which was that the application required by section 1247 of the Penal Code had not been filed. The record did not at first contain this application, but it appears that it has since been filed, and has been added to the record on appeal, so that no further mention need be made of this point."

This statement does not bear the construction put upon it by appellant, but means that the application has since been made a part of the record on appeal. This construction is borne out by an inspection of the record, which discloses the fact that the application was filed in the trial court on the same day that the appeal was taken, but was not made a part of the record on appeal until some time after the transcripts were filed here, and then by an amended clerk's transcript.

Appeal dismissed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 14, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑171(1)—Court might consider appeal on theory that pleadings conformed to evidence, and that findings covered issues, in view of theory of trial and silence of briefs on questions.

seller may sue on check, and need not sue for breach of contract under Civ. Code, § 3311, since check is agreement of drawer to pay, if bank refuses payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action on dishonored bank check by Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., against E. P. Bracht. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The case which gives rise to this appeal is one wherein the appellant as plaintiff filed an action in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, to recover judgment on a check for the sum of $657, which check, it was alleged, was issued and for a valuable consideration delivered to the plaintiff by the defendant and respondent. The complaint sets forth the usual allegations of presentation and dishonor of the check by the bank on which it was drawn, and the subsequent demand upon the maker for payment, and his refusal to make payment.

The answer admits the execution and delivery of the check, as also the demand and refusal of payment, but denies that the check was given for a valuable consideration. The answer contains in addition in paragraph IV the following allegations:

> "And further answering the complaint of plaintiff, defendant alleges that on or about the 10th day of September, 1923, at the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, the said plaintiff made, executed, and delivered to this defendant its contract in writing, wherein and whereby said plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to said defendant a ready-cut house according to the plans and specifications set forth in said contract, for the sum of $657; that thereafter, to wit, on or about the 11th day of September, 1923, said contract was by mutual consent canceled, and the said plaintiff agreed with said defendant to make, execute, and deliver to him a contract for the delivery to defendant of another house of the same model, but complete in every detail; that said plaintiff, its agents, servants and employees, was informed by said defendant, at the time of said agreement to purchase said ready-cut house, that he was a postal employee, and that he had made application for his leave of absence, to begin at a certain date, and that the erection of said house was to take place during his leave of absence; that, at the request and under the instructions of said plaintiff, its agents, servants and employees, he went to the office of said plaintiff on several occasions to complete the sale and purchase of this new house, but said plaintiff failed and refused to keep appointments made with said defendant for such a length of time that it was impossible thereafter to procure said ready-cut house in time for its erection during this defendant's leave of absence, and said defendant thereupon informed said plaintiff that, by reason of the fact that he could not get delivery of said house, he could not accept the same."

Findings and judgment went for the defendant, from which the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Appellant, in urging a reversal of the judgment, contends that the following findings are not supported by the evidence in the case:

> (a) "Said contract was, by mutual consent, canceled." (b) "There was no consideration for said check." (c) "That said plaintiff agreed with said defendant to make, execute and deliver to him a contract for delivery of another house of the same model, but complete in every detail. * * * It was impossible to procure said ready-cut house during defendant's leave of absence."

[1] An examination of the record discloses a singular situation with regard to the pleadings, in that there is no allegation in either complaint or answer that the check sued on and set forth in the complaint had any connection with the contract referred to in the answer; nor is there anything in the findings to indicate that the check was given in fulfillment of defendant's obligations under the contract.

However, it clearly appears from the record that the case was tried by the court and litigants upon the theory that the pleadings were sufficient to raise the issues which the findings attempt to cover; nor do counsel in their briefs make a point of these missing allegations from the pleadings, or the lacking connection in the court's findings. We will therefore consider the points raised upon the theory that the pleadings conform to the evidence and the findings cover the material issues.

[2] The evidence without conflict shows that the check sued on was in fact given by defendant to plaintiff in payment of the sum agreed upon in the contract as the price defendant was to pay for the ready-cut house plaintiff contracted to manufacture and deliver to him. Upon the question of the cancellation of the contract by mutual agreement, there is marked conflict in the evidence. However, there is sufficient evidence in the record to support this finding, as well as the finding that the parties agreed to execute a new contract which was never consummated.

Connecting the check with the contract, it would necessarily follow that, with a cancellation of the contract by mutual agreement, the consideration for the check wholly failed. From such facts the conclusion would necessarily follow that there was no consideration for the check.

[3] Respondent occupies his entire brief with citations to support his contention that plaintiff has mistaken his remedy in suing on the check; and urges that the cause of action, if any plaintiff has against the defendant, is a suit for damages for breach of agreement to buy personal property under section 3311, Civil Code.

We cannot agree with respondent in this contention. While the check on its face is an order drawn upon a third party to pay to the payee or indorsee of the check the amount declared on its face, the law makes it an agreement on the part of the maker to pay the amount of the check to the payee or indorsee, if the bank upon which the check is drawn refuses payment. This, of course, presumed a valuable consideration. John M. C. Marble Co. v. Merchants' National Bank, 15 Cal. App. 347, 115 P. 59; Bank of Venice v. Clapp, 17 Cal. App. 657, 121 P. 298; Equitable National Bank v. Griffin & Skelley Co., 113 Cal. 692, 45 P. 985.

If the situation required, we are of the opinion that this court has authority under section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure (Stat. 1927, p. 583), to remand the case to the trial court to cause such amended pleadings to be filed and findings drawn as would correctly support the judgment. This would seem to place undue emphasis on the form rather than the substance.

The judgment is affirmed.

4. Corporations 🔑557(5)—Equity will not appoint receiver of property of corporation unless clearest evidence shows necessity for such action for protection of all parties concerned.

Equity courts will not appoint receivers of property of corporation without clearest evidence of absolute necessity for such extraordinary action for protection of all parties concerned, since appointment of receiver on application of creditor is tantamount to dissolution of corporation and displaces board of managers.

5. Corporations 🔑609—Without express statutory authority, equity cannot dissolve corporation, wind up its affairs, or sequester its property.

In absence of express statutory authority, court of equity has no power to dissolve corporation, wind up its affairs, or sequester its property.

6. Corporations 🔑554—Equity held unauthorized to appoint receiver for corporation on application of creditor who had not reduced claim to judgment and had not made directors parties (Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subd. 5).

Equity held without power under Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subd. 5, to appoint receiver for debtor corporation on application of mere creditor who had not reduced claim to judgment and exhausted legal remedies and had not made directors parties to action, since such appointment would amount to usurpation of powers of directors and virtual dissolution of corporation.

7. Corporations 🔑554—Creditor of corporation before reducing claim to judgment cannot, under "trust fund doctrine," maintain equitable action to appoint receiver for corporation on mere allegation of insolvency (Civ. Code, § 3441).

Mere creditor of corporation who had not reduced claim to judgment held not entitled, under Civ. Code, § 3441, to claim lien on assets of corporation under "trust fund doctrine" so as to entitle him to maintain equitable action to appoint receiver for debtor corporation on mere allegation of insolvency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Suit by the Delaney Producing & Refining Company against the Crystal Petroleum Products Corporation and another. From a judgment dismissing the action as to defendant Thomas C. Job, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert M. Pease, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Romaine L. Hogan and Ovila N. Normandin, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal as to the codefendant Thomas C. Job, entered upon failure of the plaintiff to amend his complaint after a demurrer had been sustained for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[1] An action in assumpsit was brought against the defendant Crystal Petroleum Products Corporation for the value of certain petroleum products alleged to have been sold and delivered. This suit for the value of merchandise sold was combined with an effort to allege facts constituting an equitable action based upon a demand under the "trust fund doctrine" to reclaim alleged assets belonging to the defendant corporation "for the benefit of plaintiff and all other creditors similarly situated." Plaintiff sought to accomplish this purpose by applying for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the assets of the corporation, and by an effort to procure a decree of court declaring a certain assignment of lease and option to purchase real property, which were held by the defendant Thomas C. Job, to be a mortgage, and praying that the equity therein be held by said Job as a trustee for the benefit of the creditors and stockholders of said defendant corporation. The directors of the corporation were not parties to the action. The plaintiff's claim had not been reduced to the form of a judgment, nor had any attempt been previously made by the plaintiff to exhaust its legal remedies. As a mere creditor, he had no lien upon the corporation property.

[2] The complaint alleged that the plaintiff and defendant Crystal Petroleum Products Corporation were duly organized corporations, with their principal places of business at Los Angeles; that the defendant corporation was indebted to plaintiff for merchandise sold in the sum of $16,513; that the defendant corporation was organized for the purpose of conducting an oil-refining business, and to manufacture gasoline and petroleum products; that said defendant corporation had sold to several hundred individuals the stock of said corporaton, of the aggregate par value of $878,370, and had borrowed money and incurred indebtedness represented by both secured and unsecured accounts in the sum of $212,000; that the assets of said defendant corporation were of uncertain value, consisting of the manufacturing plant and other property, and upon information and belief it was alleged that the assets did not exceed the sum of $75,000, and that the corporation defendant was therefore insolvent and had ceased active business operations. It was further alleged that practically the only tangible assets of the corporation consisted of a certain lease and option to purchase 20 acres of land upon which the manufacturing plant of the corporation was constructed; that this option provided for the purchase of said land at the agreed sum of $1,000 per acre, while the actual value of said land was alleged to be $2,500 per acre; that said lease and option depended upon the payment of regular monthly rent therefor; that said lease and option had been hypothecated to the defendant Job as security for the payment of an indebtedness of $35,000 owing to him from the defendant corporation, which was due and unpaid; that the defendant Job had notified the defendant corporation that, unless said indebtedness was paid before October 29, 1924, the lien upon said lease would be foreclosed. It was alleged that it was therefore necessary to institute this action to reclaim and preserve the interest of the defendant corporation in said lease and option, and to thus prevent a transfer thereof to some innocent purchaser; that said lease and option is of the value of $65,000, and that after demand the "defendant corporation by its officers and board of directors refused and still fails and refuses to claim or exercise ownership * * * over said option, and thereby is depriving the plaintiff and other creditors * * * of the principal fund or source from which said unsecured liabilities * * * may be paid." It was further alleged that the manufacturing plant of said defendant corporation was operated for only a few months, and then ceased to operate, and that ever since that time it stood and still remains idle and unproductive, and that the defendant corporation was insolvent. The prayer of the complaint demands judgment against the defendant corporation for the sum of $16,513; that a decree be rendered declaring that the defendant Job holds said assigned lease and option as a mortgage, in trust for the defendant corporation and its creditors, and that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the property of said corporation, and preserve and disburse its assets for the benefit of its creditors and stockholders.

Clearly, this complaint states a good cause of action against the defendant corporation for merchandise sold and delivered. But this defendant suffered default, and is not involved in this appeal. By means of this action plaintiff seeks to discover assets belonging to the defendant corporation in the hands of Job, to appoint a receiver and oust the directors, and assume the management of the corporation business and procure a distribution of the assets among its creditors without having first reduced its creditor's claim to a judgment, and without making the legally constituted directors of the corporation parties to the action. Equity has no such jurisdiction. We are therefore of the opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained.

The appellant contends that the trial court erred in dismissing the action against the defendant Job, claiming that, pursuant to the "trust fund doctrine," a creditor holds a lien upon the assets of an insolvent corporation and may maintain an action to reclaim property belonging to a corporation, to which it fails and neglects to assert title.

It will be observed that, while it is alleged that the defendant corporation is insolvent, it appears from the complaint that stock has been sold of the value of $878,370, and that the total indebtedness was but $210,000. The value of the manufacturing plant and other assets are not given. The assignment of the lease and option was made to the defendant

Job for a valid existing debt of the corporation. No actual fraud is alleged. While it is stated that the manufacturing plant had ceased operations and was inactive and unproductive, it appears that there was a legally constituted board of directors in existence, whose lawful duty it was to assume charge of the affairs of the corporation and liquidate its obligations. No inability of or dissensions among the members of the board were alleged. A mere failure was charged on the part of the board to assert a claim to a questionable asset of the corporation.

[3-6] A creditor's suit in equity will not lie until his claim has been reduced to a judgment and his legal remedies have been exhausted. Roberts v. Buckingham, 172 Cal. 458, 156 P. 1018; 7 Cal. Jur. 793, § 6; 8 R. C. L. 19, §§ 23, 24; 4 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) 3355, § 1415, page 3602, § 1533. In 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 3602, § 1533, it is said:

> "It is almost the universal rule that a creditor's bill, whether to set aside a fraudulent transfer or to reach equitable assets, will not lie in behalf of mere general creditors who have not prosecuted their claims to judgment, nor in any other manner acquired a lien upon the debtor's property."

At page 3611 of the same volume it is said:

> "As a rule of equity practice, the courts are very reluctant to appoint receivers of the property of corporations, upon the idea that it is a practical displacement of the board of directors. It is an assumption of the function of the directors. It displaces the board of managers placed there by the stockholders, * * * and before the court will take charge of the corporation and thus displace its chosen directors and managers, it ought to have the clearest evidence of the absolute necessity for such extraordinary action for the protection of the creditors, stockholders, and all parties concerned. It is no slight matter for a court of chancery to lay its hand upon large business enterprises, take them out of the control of capacity and experience, and charge them with expenses and commissions" incident to the appointment of a receiver.

In effect, the appointment of a receiver, upon the application of a creditor, is tantamount to the dissolution of a corporation. Fischer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 129, 42 P. 561. "It is well settled, with scarcely a dissenting voice, that, in the absence of express statutory authority, a court of equity has no power to dissolve a corporaton, or wind up its affairs or sequester its property." 4 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. 3615, § 1540; Boyle v. Sup. Court, 176 Cal. 671, 170 P. 1140, L. R. A. 1918D, 226; Lieberman v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 18, 36, 236 P. 570. It is the settled law of California that a court of equity has no power to appoint a receiver for a corporation, upon the application of a mere creditor, until after he has first reduced his claim to a judgment and exhausted his legal remedies, for the reason that this would amount to an usurpation of the powers of the directors, and a virtual dissolution of the corporation. La Société Francaise, etc., v. District Court, 53 Cal. 495; Smith v. Superior Court, 97 Cal. 348, 32 P. 322; Fischer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 129, 141, 42 P. 561; Murray v. Superior Court, 129 Cal. 628, 62 P. 191; Elliott v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 727, 145 P. 101.

In the French Bank Case above cited, a receiver was appointed upon the complaint of a creditor for money expended in behalf of the corporation. Similar to the instant case, it was further alleged that the corporation was insolvent; that the bank commissioners had examined the bank and so reported; that its liabilities exceeded its assets to the amount of $800,000; that, through improper conduct of the manager of the corporation, $700,000 of its assets had been improperly expended, and that there was grave danger of its control falling into the hands of designing and irresponsible persons who would dissipate the funds and bankrupt the corporation. On appeal the order appointing the receiver was vacated as an unwarranted exercise of equitable jurisdiction. Chief Justice Wallace, writing the opinion, said:

> "There is no jurisdiction vested in courts of equity to appoint a receiver of the property of a corporation in a suit prosecuted by a private party. This is only to say that there is no jurisdiction vested in these courts in such a case to dissolve a corporation; for the power of a receiver, when put in motion, of necessity supersedes the corporate power. It necessarily displaces the corporate management and substitutes its own, and assumes, * * * 'to do all and everything necessary * * * to protect the rights of the creditors and depositors.' * * * 'It is well settled that a court of equity, as such, has no jurisdiction over corporate bodies for the purpose of restraining their operations, or winding up their concerns. We do not find that any such power has ever been exercised in the absence of a statute conferring the jurisdiction.' Of course, it is not to be doubted that the trustees of a corporation, * * * are subject to the control of courts of equity. * * * But even in such a proceeding as that, the trustees must of course be made parties defendant. * * * There is no inherent power in * * * courts of equity, to appoint a receiver in such a case as that presented by [this] complaint."

Further commenting upon the statutory authority for the appointment of a receiver, under certain circumstances, as provided by section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, Justice Wallace says:

> "The case * * * is not included in the sixth subdivision of this statute, * * * the appointment here not having been made 'after judgment.' * * * The particular subdivision, however, which is supposed to confer the power * * * is the fifth—being the only portion of the statute in which corporations are named. * * * There is, of course, no such thing as an action brought distinctively for the mere appointment of a receiver—such an appointment, when made, is ancillary to or in aid of the action brought. Its purpose is to preserve the property pending the litigation so that the relief awarded by the judgment, if any, may be effective. The authority conferred upon the court to make the appointment necessarily presupposes that an action is pending before it, instituted by some one authorized by law to commence it. But there is no statute of this state, * * * which undertakes to confer upon a private person, either as stockholder or creditor the right to maintain an action to dissolve a corporation upon the ground that it is insolvent, or to obtain relief by seizing its property out of the hands of its constituted management, and placing it in the hands of a receiver."

The effect of the foregoing language construing section 564, subd. 5, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads, "A receiver may be appointed * * * (5) in the cases when a corporation has been dissolved, or is insolvent, or in imminent danger of insolvency, or has forfeited its corporate rights," is to assert that, even if the corporation is insolvent, a mere creditor may not maintain an action in equity and procure the appointment of a receiver to take the custody of property and the management of a corporation away from its legally constituted directors, amounting to a virtual dissolution of the corporation, without having first reduced his claim to a judgment and exhausting his legal remedies, and particularly without making the alleged malefactors parties to the action. This would have been the exact result in the instant case if plaintiff's equitable action were permitted to stand.

[7] Nor does the "trust fund doctrine" aid respondent in the instant case. If we correctly understand its claim to mean that this fiction has bestowed upon it a sort of creditor's lien upon the assets of the corporation defendant, which entitles him to maintain an equitable action upon a mere allegation of insolvency, without first reducing his claim to a judgment, it certainly has mistaken his remedy. According to this trust fund doctrine, some authorities in America have held that the capital stock of a corporation, or the assets of an insolvent corporation representing its capital stock, constitutes a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, upon which they have an equitable lien for the payment of their claim. 8 Fletcher's Enc. of Corpo. 8635, §§ 5027–5030. But this theory of attaching a lien to the assets of a corporation for the payment of creditor's claims has been greatly modified, if indeed it has not been totally repudiated in America. And it never was the law in England. In the last text cited, at page 8643, it is said, "The doctrine in general has been very much criticized." Prof. Pomeroy refers to the theory as one based on analogy and metaphor. He says, in 3 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 1046, "They are not, in any true and complete sense, trusts, and can only be called so by way of analogy or metaphor." The extent to which the so-called "trust fund" applies to corporations, is explicitly asserted in a series of United States Supreme Court decisions, and may be epitomized in the statement of Justice Field in the case of Fogg v. Blair, 133 U. S. 534, 10 S. Ct. 338, 33 L. Ed. 721, wherein he concludes by saying, "Such a doctrine has no existence." And in the leading case of Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & Iron Co., 150 U. S. 371, 14 S. Ct. 127, 37 L. Ed. 1113, it was held that a contract creditor could not maintain an action in equity to compel a corporation to respond to his claim, until it had first been reduced to a judgment. Mr. Justice Brewer there says, with respect to the trust fund doctrine:

> "We do not concur in this view. It is at war with the notions which we derive from the English law with regard to the nature of corporate bodies. A corporation is a distinct entity. Its affairs are necessarily managed by officers and agents, it is true; but in law, it is as distinct a being as an individual is, and is entitled to hold property * * * as absolutely as an individual can hold it. Its estate is the same, its interest is the same, its possession is the same. Its stockholders may call the officers to account, and may prevent any malversation of funds, or fraudulent disposal of property on their part. But that is done in the exercise of their corporate rights, not adverse to the corporate interests, but coincident with them. * * * The officers of a corporation act in a fiduciary capacity in respect to its property in their hands, and may be called to an account for fraud or sometimes even mere mismanagement in respect thereto; but as between itself and its creditors the corporation is simply a debtor, and does not hold its property in trust, or subject to a lien in their favor, in any other sense than does an individual debtor."

The extreme limit to which this doctrine may be said to extend is that—

> "The capital stock or assets of a corporation are a trust fund for the benefit of the corporate creditors when the corporation has either suspended its business, or has become insolvent, and its assets have been placed in the possession of a court of equity and are in the course of administration for final settlement and distribution." 4 Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) 39, § 3421.

In support of its claim of right to maintain a creditor's bill in this action, the appellant relies upon the cases of Blanc v. Paymaster Mining Co., 95 Cal. 524, 30 P. 765, 29 Am. St. Rep. 149; Miller v. Kehoe, 107 Cal. 340, 40 P. 485; First National Bank v. Eastman, 144 Cal. 487, 493, 77 P. 1043, 103 Am. St. Rep. 95, 1 Ann. Cas. 626; and Aigeltinger v. Einstein, 143 Cal. 609, 77 P. 669, 101 Am. St. Rep. 131. There appears to be nothing in these cases in conflict with the general rule heretofore announced with respect to the "trust fund doctrine." In Blanc v. Paymaster Mining Co., supra, it appears that the Esperanza Mining Company was a foreign corporation, which was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $6,000 represented by two promissory notes. It was alleged that suit had been brought against this company, the claim reduced to judgment, and an attachment issued therein. Subsequently all the property of this company was transferred to one Blaisdell as trustee for the benefit of the creditors. Blaisdell purported to convey this property for a nominal consideration to the principal officers and stockholders of the Esperanza Company, who proceeded to organize the defendant corporation for the alleged purpose of defrauding creditors and defeating the plaintiff's judgment. In the opinion it was said: "The court below was justified in finding that plaintiff recovered * * * the judgment alleged in the complaint." Apparently the facts of that case brought it directly within the rule announced which requires a corporation creditor to pursue his legal remedies before he may resort to the aid of a court of equity. This was the view which the Supreme Court evidently took of the facts of that case, for it was cited with approval in support of a declaration of the general rule, in its order denying a rehearing of the case of Benson v. Harriman, 55 Cal. App. 483, 491, 204 P. 255. So, also, the case of First National Bank v. Eastman, supra, was against an individual and not a corporation. It is true that the opinion, in commenting upon the general rule, referred to an exception to that rule, as follows (page 493 [77 P. 1046]):

> "Where the defendant is a nonresident, a personal judgment cannot be obtained against him, and therefore the fact of his being a nonresident creates an exception to the rule, and such action can be maintained without the creditor having [first] obtained a judgment."

But that case has no application to the facts of the instant case, for the defendant corporation in this case was alleged to be a resident of the county of Los Angeles, where its principal place of business and its property was located. It was therefore not a nonresident of California, and there was no reason why a creditor could not serve it with process and prosecute his claim to judgment in a court of law, so as to procure a lien upon the corporation property.

Likewise, in the case of Miller v. Kehoe, supra, the defendant was an individual and not a corporation. It was there alleged that the defendant "had commenced proceedings in insolvency, which prevented plaintiffs from obtaining judgments against him," and asked to vacate a fraudulent conveyance and assign the property to the estate of the insolvent for the benefit of creditors. This prayer was denied. The court held that "the assignee in insolvency was not entitled to recover the property as assets of the insolvent estate." The question as to the right of a creditor to maintain an action in equity without first reducing his claim to judgment was not discussed or considered. And in the case of Aigeltinger v. Einstein, 143 Cal. 609, 77 P. 669, 101 Am. St. Rep. 131, cited by appellant, the court quotes with entire approval from Mr. Pomeroy, as follows:

> "'It is a necessary result from the whole theory of the creditors' suits that jurisdiction in equity will not be entertained where there is a remedy at law. The general rule is, therefore, that a judgment must be obtained, and certain steps taken towards enforcing or perfecting such judgment, before a party is entitled to institute a suit of this character. In this there is a uniformity of opinion, but the difficulty arises in determining exactly how far a plaintiff should proceed after he had obtained his judgment.' * * * The courts, however, all agree and have held that there are exceptions to the general rule stated above. Whether the case of an attaching creditor who has by his writ secured a lien on the property, but as yet has no judgment, comes within the exception is a question about which the decisions are not harmonious."

Section 3441 of the Civil Code specifically provides:

> "A creditor can avoid the act or obligation of his debtor for fraud only where the fraud obstructs the enforcement, by legal process, of his right to take the property affected by the transfer or obligation."

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

89 Cal. App. 267

WEBB et ux. v. TISCHAUSER et al.

(Civ. 3401.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 15, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚷987(4)—On appeal by automobilist, appellate court has duty to determine sufficiency of evidence to support jury's finding of lack of pedestrian's contributory negligence.

In action by pedestrian against automobilist for personal injuries, in which jury found against defense of contributory negligence, on appeal by defendant automobilist, appellate court has duty to examine evidence and find whether it was insufficient to sustain such conclusion.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷706(7)—Evidence held not to show contributory negligence as matter of law by pedestrian injured by automobilist.

In action by pedestrian for injuries by automobilist, evidence held not to show contributory negligence as matter of law.

3. Municipal corporations ⚷706(7)—That pedestrian allowed only 5 feet of clearance between himself and passing automobile held not to show contributory negligence as matter of law.

In action by pedestrian against automobilist for injury, where automobilist drove to left of middle of street at street intersection to avoid collision with another automobile, fact that pedestrian, who originally was standing 10 feet from curb, jumped back, and allowed only 5 feet of clearance between himself and passing automobile, held not to constitute contributory negligence as matter of law.

4. Appeal and error ⚷187(2)—Wife's joining plaintiff in action for injuries by automobile, where objection was first raised on appeal, held not reversible error (Code Civ. Proc. § 430).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, fact that pedestrian's wife joined him in action against automobilist for injuries and alleged loss of comfort, assistance, support, and aid of her husband, where objection was first raised on appeal, did not constitute reversible error, especially in view of fact that his wife did not testify, and that no evidence was introduced by plaintiffs that did not properly support cause of action in favor of husband alone.

5. Trial ⚷295(11)—In action by pedestrian, joined by wife, against automobilist, use of word "plaintiffs" in instructions held not reversible error, in view of instructions as whole.

In pedestrian's action against automobilist for personal injuries, in which objection to fact that pedestrian's wife, joined as plaintiff, was first raised on appeal, use of word "plaintiffs" in forms of verdict and in court's instruction that, if jury found for plaintiffs, in estimating actual compensatory damages, to consider certain elements, in view of fact that all elements of damage set out related only to damage to husband, and another instruction clearly basing right to recover on husband's injury alone, was not error requiring reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by J. R. Webb and wife against H. V. Tischauser and Fred W. Myers. Judgment by default against the second-named defendant. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the first-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Howard Prowse and Burton Briggs Crane, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Davis & Thorne, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. This is an action for personal injuries growing out of an automobile accident at the intersection of Avenue 18, North Broadway and North Spring streets in the city of Los Angeles. Defendant Myers did not appear at the trial, and judgment by default was taken against him, but from the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiffs and against defendant Tischauser, he (Tischauser) appeals.

Avenue 18 runs in an easterly and westerly direction; North Spring street runs in a northerly and southerly direction, terminating at the intersection of Avenue 18. North Broadway enters the intersection of Avenue 18 and North Spring street from a westerly direction, bisecting the angle of intersection of Avenue 18 and North Spring street, and, continuing across said intersection, proceeds in an easterly direction at right angles. Avenue 18 forms the continuation of what would be North Spring street. A double street car track runs along North Broadway, making a wide curve swerving across the intersection formed by Avenue 18, North Broadway, and North Spring streets. A traffic button is located in the intersection, which lies somewhat to the west of the center line of North Spring street and its northern extension, called North Broadway.

On the morning in question appellant Tischauser was driving southerly along North Broadway, intending to cross Avenue 18 in a direct line down North Spring street. He stopped at the intersection of North Broadway and Avenue 18 for a north-bound street car to pass. He then proceeded on, and, in passing a south-bound street car and another automobile, passed to their left and to the left of the button, thereby causing him to drive slightly to the left of the center of the street. At that point he observed a large automobile approaching along North Broadway at a high rate of speed. He proceeded further toward the left of the street to avoid a collision. It was at that time that he first observed plaintiff, who was standing about 10 feet from the east curb of North Spring street. Immediately upon plaintiff seeing the approaching car of appellant, he jumped back about 3 feet. Appellant, observing the approaching automobile, again swerved to the left to avoid the collision, and he again turned his automobile toward plaintiff, who again jumped back about 3 feet, and almost simultaneously the collision between the two automobiles occurred. The plaintiff was struck by one of the speeding cars, and sustained the injuries complained of.

Appellant contends that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, and that certain remarks by the court prejudiced the appellant before the jury.

[1] The question of negligence was presented by the plaintiff, and appellant submitted proof as to the question of contributory negligence to the jury, which found against him upon his contention, and it is the duty of the court, in view of appellant's appeal, to examine the evidence and find if it was insufficient to sustain such a conclusion.

In the case of Burgesser v. Bullock's, 190 Cal. 673, 214 P. 649, the court makes the following comment:

> "The question of whether or not the pedestrian is negligent in crossing a street is one which, in the absence of express statutes regulating his conduct, must ordinarily be left to the jury, for the conduct of an ordinarily prudent person under such circumstances must be largely determined by the condition of the traffic at the particular time and place in question."

[2] The testimony in the record does not support appellant's claim that the respondent was negligent as a matter of law. The plaintiff testified, in part, as follows:

> "When I first saw the Ford coupé coming around the street car, I was about 10 feet out on Spring street going across to this corner, and I saw him come right in my direction—I don't know the speed, but it would be 20 or 25 miles an hour or more; and I saw I was in danger, so I jumped back maybe 3 feet, and he came the second time in my direction again, headed to me again. I jumped back again, and when I jumped the second time he was right on top of me, and I didn't know anything else."

Mr. William Giovanetti, a disinterested witness, testified as to what occurred in the following manner:

> "Well, I seen this Ford car coming down Broadway there, and then I seen this other Willys-Knight coming down, and so I seen this man here, Webb, I think his name is, and I seen this Ford kind of cutting the button there, coming over toward this man here, and I kind of didn't look for the cars any more, if they hit or not, but I watched Mr. Webb here when he tried to jump back, and this fellow kind of pulled out a little bit, and Mr. Webb jumped back in, and he hit him."

Appellant testified:

> "As I was passing him (respondent), the center of my car was about even with his body when this machine which was coming down the hill struck the rear end of my car with a terrific crash and threw the car completely around, turned the car around so I was facing in the opposite direction, and knocked it over on its side, on its left side." And: "Q. And how many feet from the curb line at that particular point, approximately? A. My left front wheels were probably 15 feet from the curb line, as the pedestrian had stepped back twice 2 or 3 feet. He probably stepped back about 5 feet, and was then standing about 10 feet from the curb. I was clearing him about 5 feet, running parallel with the curb."

[3] Surely, if appellant, who was in a superior position to observe what was transpiring and to judge the respective speed and distance of the approaching automobile, thought that he would clear respondent by 5 feet, if he had not been struck by the car of his codefendant Myers, the respondent would have the equal right to believe the same and act accordingly. Owing to the difference in the speed and congestion on our highways, as compared with the traffic conditions of a few years ago, what might have been considered willful negligence and careless exposure to injury at that time may now, perhaps, be considered necessary agility to keep up with the moving throng, and it cannot be declared to be contributory negligence on the part of respondent that he allowed only 5 feet of clearance between himself and the passing car.

The remarks of the trial court, to which appellant excepts, arose during the examination of medical experts on the witness stand, and had to do with the testimony of a preceding witness, both of whom were testifying as to the subject of syphilis. We have carefully read the entire record, and can find nothing to bear out the construction placed upon the remarks of the court by appellant.

[4] In a supplemental brief the question is raised for the first time that the wife of respondent, Angelica Webb, was not a proper party plaintiff, and that the complaint did not state a cause of action in her favor, and for that reason that she could not, under the circumstances, sustain any damages, and was not authorized to sue. Angelica Webb, wife and coplaintiff of respondent, J. R. Webb, alleges her sole ground of recovery as follows: "That as a consequence of the injuries of said plaintiff, J. R. Webb, plaintiff Angelica Webb, has lost the comfort, assistance, support, and aid of her husband."

This allegation was denied by appellant in his answer in the following language:

> "Denies that as a consequence of said injuries, or any injuries, the said plaintiff Angelica Webb lost the comfort or assistance or support or aid of the said plaintiff J. R. Webb."

The objection was not raised either by demurrer or motion at any stage of the proceedings, and is for the first time suggested to the court in this supplemental brief.

Section 430, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a defendant may demur to the complaint within the time required in the summons to answer, when it appears upon the face thereof, either: "4. That there is a defect or misjoinder of parties plaintiff or defendant," and section 434 of the same Code provides:

> "If no objection be taken, either by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same, excepting only the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

In the case of Meier v. Wagner, 27 Cal. App. 579, 150 P. 797, the plaintiffs, husband and wife, were improperly joined as parties plaintiff. The point was raised by defendants on demurrer, and, although the reviewing courts held that the demurrer should have been sustained, yet, where it was shown that the defendants and appellants had not suffered by such error, the judgment would not be reversed. The court in that case said:

> "Such misjoinder, however, in no wise prevented a full, fair, and complete trial of the issues presented, which, in the absence of the rule stated, might, without prejudice to defendant, have been included in one action prosecuted by the husband and wife as plaintiffs. The fact that the judgment and proceeds thereof are, as community property, subject to the exclusive control of the husband, constitutes a bar to a further action by him to recover the consequential damages alleged in the complaint herein. The error, since it is purely technical and did not deprive defendant of any substantial right, or affect the merits of the case, falls within the provision of section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution, which provides that 'no judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted * * * for error as to any matter of pleading, * * * unless * * * the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.'"

In the case at bar, no claim is made by appellant that the elements of damage were not suffered by plaintiff J. R. Webb. There is no denial that plaintiff was confined to the hospital, that he was compelled to employ a physician, and that he suffered the injuries complained of, and no contention is made that the award by the jury is excessive or unreasonable.

In the case of Asevado v. Orr, 100 Cal. 293, 300, 34 P. 777, 779, the court, considering this point, says:

> "The second count in the complaint sufficiently states a cause of action against these appellants upon their undertaking, and a demurrer to the entire complaint cannot be sustained if either of the counts is good. So, also, a joint demurrer by all of the defendants must be overruled if the complaint is good against either of them. A complaint is not necessarily defective in which there is united with some defendants another against whom no liability * * * or recovery sought, and an order overruling a demurrer for misjoinder of parties defendant does not constitute a reversible error, if it can be seen that the rights of the parties have not been prejudiced. The complaint in the present case seeks no recovery against these appellants except upon their undertaking, and it is evident that their rights could not be prejudicially affected by the fact that their principal, who did not unite with them in the undertaking, has been made a codefendant."

To the same effect, the Supreme Court holds in the case of Daly v. Ruddell, 137 Cal. 674, 70 P. 785:

> "And, moreover, no substantial rights of the defendant have been invaded by this joinder. When no impairment of substantial rights is shown even a judgment rendered after a trial upon the merits should not be reversed because the court overruled a demurrer for such misjoinder."

The plaintiff Angelica Webb did not herself testify, and no evidence was introduced by plaintiffs that was not properly in support of the cause of action in favor of J. R. Webb alone.

[5] Appellant claims that the use of the word "plaintiffs" in the court's instructions and the use of the plural in the forms of verdict would require a reversal in this case. Upon the question of damages the court instructed the jury as follows:

> "You are instructed that, in the event you find in favor of plaintiffs, in estimating the actual compensatory damages, if any, to which he is entitled, you may take into consideration the value of the time lost, if any, by the plaintiff J. R. Webb while disabled from his injuries, if any, to work and labor, taking into consideration the nature of his business and whether or not he will be able to further pursue said labor or business in the future. Also a fair compensation for his suffering, if any, and the probable effect of the injury, if any, in his health or strength or future suffering, if any, awarding him as a whole such sum of money which will actually compensate him for the injuries sustained."

It will be noted that, although the court in the second line used the word "plaintiffs," throughout the balance of the instruction the masculine singular was employed. Also, the following instruction was given:

> "You are instructed that if the plaintiff in this action has shown himself entitled to recover, he is entitled to recover for all damages which he has suffered up to the time of the trial, if any, and for all damage that it is reasonably probable that he will sustain in the future, if any, not exceeding the sum claimed in the complaint. In estimating the compensatory damages in cases of this character, all the consequences of the injury, future as well as past, are to be taken into consideration, including the bodily and physical pain and suffering which is shown by the proof to be reasonably certain to have naturally resulted from the injury. The plaintiff, if you find him entitled to recover, should be awarded compensation for all expenses actually paid or incurred for doctor's bills. If you find that plaintiff is entitled to recover, and believe from the evidence that the injuries sustained are permanent in their character, this must also be taken into consideration in your estimate of damages, and if you find for the plaintiff in this action, such sum should be awarded as in your best judgment will fairly and fully compensate him for any injuries received by reason of the alleged negligence and carelessness of the defendants or either of them, not exceeding in amount the sum claimed in the complaint."

These two instructions were the only instructions given by the court on the question of damages, and they are so plain as to what elements the jury could take into consideration on that subject as to preclude any doubt thereon.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

NOBLE v. CITY OF PALO ALTO.
(Civ. 6218.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 7, 1928.

1. Officers 🔑110—Public officer is impliedly bound to exercise powers conferred on him with disinterested skill and diligence primarily for public's benefit.

A public officer is impliedly bound to exercise powers conferred on him with disinterested skill, zeal, and diligence, and primarily for benefit of public.

2. Officers 🔑103—Dealings between public officer and himself as private citizen, bringing him into collision with other citizens equally interested with himself in his integrity, are against "public policy."

Dealings between public officer and himself as private citizen, which bring him into collision with other citizens equally interested with himself in integrity and impartiality of public officer, are against "public policy," which is that principle of law which holds that no citizen can lawfully do that which has tendency to be injurious to public or against public good, and which may be termed policy of the law, and means the public good.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Policy.]

3. Officers 🔑98—Public policy forbids that public officer receive for services performed by him in discharge of official duty any other remuneration than that prescribed.

Public policy and sound morals alike forbid that public officer should demand or receive for services performed by him in discharge of official duty any other or further remuneration than that prescribed and allowed by law.

4. Officers 🔑103—Public officers should not be allowed to place themselves in position in which personal interest may conflict with duty to public.

Public officers ought not to be allowed to place themselves in position in which personal interest may come into conflict with duty which they owe to public.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑180(1)—Policeman in discharge of duties stands in relationship to governing authority which may be classified as that of "public officer"; "peace officer" (Pen. Code, § 817).

Policeman is "peace officer," under Pen. Code, § 817, and in discharge of his duties he stands in relationship to governing authority differing greatly from that of mere employee or agent, and that relationship for many purposes is indistinguishable from and may be classified as that of a "public officer."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Officers; Peace Officer.]

6. Municipal corporations 🔑189(1)—When police from time immemorial have exercised rights under circumstances causing people to suppose they possess power claimed, exercise of rights becomes part of duties.

When police from time immemorial have exercised rights under circumstances of reputation or acquiescence as are calculated to induce people, without inquiry, to submit to, or invoke, their action, supposing them to possess power and right claimed, exercise of those rights will become an integral part of duties incident to office.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑189(1)—It is within police officer's duty to inquire whether property found in streets is lost, or stolen, and assure protection in meantime.

It is within the duty of a police officer to make inquiry as to whether property found in streets has been stolen, or lost, and, pending result of that inquiry, to assure safety and protection of property which is otherwise liable to destruction or deterioration.

8. Finding lost goods 🔑10—Chief of police selling bicycles found in streets not claimed by owners must turn moneys into city treasury.

Chief of police held required to turn over money derived from sale of bicycles found on streets and highways of city, and in some instances outside city limits, into city treasury, though there was no ordinance or general law making it his duty to gather lost property, since his relationship to city may be classified as that of a public officer and to permit him to claim rights of finder of lost property would be against public policy; it being no concern of his what city does with funds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action to determine ownership of certain personal property by C. F. Noble against the City of Palo Alto. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Norman E. Malcolm, City Atty., of Palo Alto, for appellant.

Louis Oneal and Maurice J. Rankin, both of San José, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to determine the ownership of certain personal property, to wit, cash in the sum of $308. Plaintiff and defendant, city of Palo Alto, by appropriate pleading set up their respective claims to the said amount, and after trial before the court judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff. From this judgment defendant appeals.

The record discloses that at all times involved herein plaintiff was chief of police of the city of Palo Alto, and the money in dispute here is money derived from the sale of certain bicycles admitted to have been found on the streets and highways of Palo Alto, and in some few instances outside of the limits of said city. Many of these bicycles were found by plaintiff, and the others were found by other police officers and by them brought to the city hall of Palo Alto and there stored. It appears from the record here that there was a standing order in the police department of the city of Palo Alto directed to the members thereof that each officer should in his territory take up abandoned personal property of value and deliver the same to the city hall. In the period covered by this controversy a large number of bicycles were accumulated, and from time to time private sales were made, the amount of money realized being as heretofore stated. No accounting was made of these sales nor was notice thereof given. The custom was that as a purchaser appeared the sale was consummated and the transaction closed. All of these sales were made by the plaintiff chief of police and the moneys derived therefrom retained by him.

There was no ordinance or regulation of the city of Palo Alto or any board or commission of said city making it the duty of the plaintiff or any member of the police department to gather lost property, nor is there any such express direction in the general law of the state. Nor is there any ordinance or general law in terms directing the turning over of the funds in question to the public treasury.

The plaintiff chief of police contends here, as he did in the court below, that the money thus received belongs to him without the duty of accounting to the city, and urges that whatever may be the right or claim of the original owners of the lost property the city of Palo Alto is not concerned therewith, and the claim of the city to the funds in dispute is without right. In this the plaintiff was sustained by the court below. There are many principles discussed in the briefs on file. At the outset defendant attacks the form of action and the right of an individual to prosecute an action against the city. This we pass for the present. The ground upon which the claim of plaintiff was upheld seems to be that the property named, the bicycles, being lost property, belonged to the finder, subject to the provisions of the general law; that the finding and retention of the property was not within the actual or implied duties of the police department or the members thereof; and that the fact that in this case the finder happened to be a police officer does not in any manner abridge his right or claim to the property found, or place upon his possession any different status from that of any individual finder.

As an additional fact it may be here stated that the testimony discloses that the officers on patrol were ordered to bring all property found to the city hall, and make a record of the delivery, together with an identifying description. The chief of police testified further that one of the purposes in collecting the bicycles was to recover any that might have been stolen and concerning which the usual police bulletin had been circulated. It further appears that in some cases, after sale of a bicycle, the original owner would appear and make claim, and in this event settlement would be made with him personally and a refund allowed the buyer; all of these negotiations being conducted through the chief of police personally and in his individual capacity.

From the foregoing sufficient appears to fully present the case-made. We do not feel that it requires any minute analysis of all of the points urged. It is our conclusion that the claim of plaintiff cannot be upheld, and that to establish the doctrine contended for by him would lead to a result in contravention of a sound public policy, and on this ground alone we deem it necessary to reverse the judgment of the court below.

Public policy is a vague expression, and few cases can arise in which its application may not be disputed. Mr. Story, in his work on Contracts (section 546), says:

> "It has never been defined by the courts, but has been left loose and free of definition in the same manner as fraud."

By "public policy" is intended that principle of law which holds that no citizen can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or against the public good, which may be termed the policy of the law. Likewise, it has been defined as:

> "The principles under which freedom of contract or private dealing are restricted by law for the good of the community"

—the foregoing definitions being supported by respectable authority. 32 Cyc. 1251. Public policy means the public good. Anything which tends to undermine that sense of security for individual rights, whether of personal liberty or private property, which any citizen ought to feel, is against public policy. It is the evil tendency and not the actual result which is the test of illegality. Maryland Trust Co. v. National Bank, 102 Md. 608, 63 A. 79.

[1, 2] A public officer is impliedly bound to exercise the powers conferred on him with disinterested skill, zeal, and diligence, and primarily for the benefit of the public. Harnung v. State, 116 Ind. 458, 19 N. E. 151, 2 L. R. A. 510. Dealings between a public officer and himself as a private citizen which bring him into collision with other citizens equally interested with himself in the integrity and impartiality of the officer are against public policy. Goodyear v. Brown, 155 Pa. 514, 26 A. 665, 20 L. R. A. 838, 35 Am. St. Rep. 903.

[3] Public policy and sound morals alike forbid that a public officer should demand or receive for services performed by him in the discharge of official duty any other or further remuneration than that prescribed and allowed by law. Somerset Bank v. Edmund, 76 Ohio St. 396, 81 N. E. 641, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1170, 10 Ann. Cas. 726.

Actual injury is not the principle the law proceeds on. Fidelity in the agent is what is aimed at, and as a means of securing it the law will not permit him to place himself in a position in which he may be tempted by his own private interests to disregard those of his principal. This doctrine is generally applicable to private agents and trustees, but to public officers it applies with greater force, and sound policy requires that there be no relaxation of its stringency in any case that comes within its reason. Cheney v. Unroe, 166 Ind. 550, 77 N. E. 1041, 117 Am. St. Rep. 391.

[4] There is neither a more wholesome nor a sounder rule of law than that which requires public officers to keep themselves in such a position as that nothing shall tempt them to swerve from the straight line of official duty. Officers ought not to be allowed to place themselves in a position in which personal interest may come into conflict with the duty which they owe to the public. The rule which has so long prevailed is eminently just. Stropes v. Greene Co., 72 Ind. 42.

[5] There is no doubt but that a policeman is an officer. He is made a peace officer by section 817, Penal Code, and a large part of his duties are such that he must have authority to act, not as the agent for the state or city, but by virtue of the office. See Ann. Cas. 1912D, note, at page 897; Cal. Jur. vol. 21, p. 389.

In Olmstead v. New York, 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 481, it is said that the term "officer" implies "an authority to exercise some portion of the sovereign power of the state, either in making, executing, or administering the laws." In Eliason v. Coleman, 86 N. C. 235, it is said: "The true test of a public office seems to be that it is parcel of the administration of government, civil or military." In People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 1, 59 N. E. 716, 52 L. R. A. 814, 82 Am. St. Rep. 605, we find that "an officer is a part of the personal force by which the state acts, thinks, determines, administers, and makes its Constitution and laws operative and effective." That a policeman is an officer of a city or state and not merely an employee or agent is approved in Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 1655.

Without pursuing this branch of the inquiry it might be conceded that a policeman is not an officer in every sense of the term. In other words, it is not within the scope of this opinion to announce the law that for all purposes and in all respects the position of a policeman fully meets all the standards and requirements essential to or usually inherent in the legal definition of an office. We do not attempt to determine the question. We do conclude, however, that a policeman in the discharge of his duties does stand in a relationship to the governing authority differing greatly from that of a mere employee or agent, and that relationship for many purposes is indistinguishable from and may be classified as that of a public officer. Being, as it is, so closely allied we hold that the principles herein announced have equal application to the position of policeman.

Further illustrating the attitude of our own courts on the policy of maintaining the integrity of public officials and removing all sources of temptation, see Moody v. Shuffleton (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 1095, decided January 10, 1928.

It is true that nowhere in the general law or in local ordinances can we find all the duties of a police officer set forth in detail. Indeed, these duties are so varied and indefinable that we could not expect an exact and detailed outline thereof.

In the case of Norton v. Shelby County, reported in 118 U. S. 425, 6 S. Ct. 1121, 30 L. Ed. 178, the court in speaking of a de facto officer says:

> "An officer de facto is one whose acts, though not those of a lawful officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid, so far as they involve the interests of the public and third persons, where the duties of the office are exercised—without a known appointment or election but under * * * circumstances of reputation or acquiescence as were calculated to induce people, without inquiry, to submit to or invoke his action, supposing him to" possess the power and right claimed.

[6, 7] While we are not dealing here with any question of an officer de facto, yet the language used has a striking application to the question of the powers of a police officer. When the police from time immemorial have exercised rights under circumstances of reputation or acquiescence as are calculated to induce people, without inquiry, to submit to or invoke their action, supposing them to possess the power and right claimed, the exercise of those rights will become an integral part of the duties incident to the office. When a police officer discovers personal property of value abandoned upon the streets of a city, it is but natural and reasonable to assume that either of two things has occurred, namely, that the property has been stolen or has been lost. Indeed, in the instant case the purpose of the police, or at least one purpose as admitted, was to discover whether or not the property had been stolen. In either case, however, it is well within the duty of a police officer to make inquiry, and, pending the result of that inquiry, to assure the safety and protection of the property, which is otherwise liable to destruction or deterioration. This duty and right of the police is universally conceded to the extent that the average citizen accepts it as a matter of course, and upon the discovery of property apparently lost the first thing that suggests itself is to notify the police, and, on the other hand, with reference to the owner of lost property, his first impulse is to advise the police of his loss and solicit their aid, and this impulse has been fostered and encouraged by the police themselves from time immemorial and in California the police departments throughout the state have justified to the fullest extent their confidence. By way of illustration, let us assume that in the streets of Palo Alto there was discovered a bicycle lying on the sidewalk with no apparent owner, and a number of citizens came upon it, and each claimed the right of a finder and the resulting right to take the bicycle into his exclusive possession—the police officer on the detail comes along and observes the situation, and thereupon declares that he will take the property and deliver the same to the city hall that the owner may recover the same. What ordinarily results? Each individual forthwith concedes and recognizes the law and the right of the officer; and this right and power inures to the policeman solely and entirely by virtue of his office and not otherwise. To uphold the contention of the plaintiff herein would be to say to a police officer, in effect:

> "It is your sworn duty to preserve peace and order and to protect life and property. You shall, among other duties, diligently make investigation where you have reason to believe crime has been committed, and the most common crimes are those of larceny and theft. When you find property abandoned and without an owner, you shall take all necessary means to preserve and protect the same, while endeavoring to ascertain whether a public offense has been committed. If you can conclude that no crime has been done, then you may retain the property, and, if the true owner is not located, then the property or the proceeds thereof shall belong to you personally."

In view of what we have heretofore said on the question of public policy, we consider this a dangerous doctrine to announce, inimical to and contrary to a sound public policy.

[8] It was the duty of the plaintiff herein to turn into the city treasury of Palo Alto the moneys in dispute here, and, failing to do so, the moneys turned into court should be ordered so disposed of. Whatever right the city may have to the fund as against the original owners of the bicycles is not of concern to us here, and surely of much less concern to the plaintiff individually. The fear that the officials of a city may not make legal or proper disposition of these funds establishes no basis for the claim of plaintiff.

Judgment reversed, with directions to enter judgment for defendant.

SMITH v. SOUTHERN COUNTIES GAS CO.★

(Civ. 6174.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 8, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 5, 1928.

1. Gas 🔑20(2)—Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur held applicable to action for injuries to water company employee lighting match in pit maintained by gas company, causing explosion.

In action for injuries to employee of water company sustained when employee struck match causing explosion in pit constructed by gas company containing water company's shut-off valve, doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was applicable where pit containing gas pipes had been used for more than year before accident happened, was under management of defendant gas company, and accident was such as in ordinary course of things did not happen if those who had management used proper care.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Judgment based on conflicting evidence in personal injury action will not be disturbed on appeal.

In action for personal injuries, where evidence meeting burden imposed on defendant by application of doctrine of res ipsa loquitur merely created conflict, judgment will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Gas 🔑20(4)—Whether gas company exercised due care in maintaining pit where explosion occurred injuring waterworks employee held for jury.

In action for injuries to employee of water company sustained when employee struck match causing explosion in pit constructed by gas company containing water company's shut-off valve, testimony by gas company that gas pipes in pit had been tested and were constructed with latest improvements, offered to rebut presumption of negligence arising from explosion, made question of fact for jury whether gas company met burden imposed on it of showing exercise of due care.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Harvey H. Smith against the Southern Counties Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George L. Greer and LeRoy M. Edwards, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Nichols, Cooper & Hickson, of Pomona, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages for personal injuries arising by reason of an explosion in a manhole or pit in one of the public streets of Pomona.

Appellant, Southern Counties Gas Company, was a public utility corporation, supplying the residents of Pomona with gas at the time of the injury complained of and for some time prior thereto. The company about December 14, 1922, constructed a pit 4 feet by 6 feet and 5 feet deep at the intersection of Ninth and Reservoir streets, and was using the public street by virtue of a franchise. The pit was built of concrete, and the pipes of the gas company had been laid and the valves placed before the cement was poured; the pit being constructed for the purpose of making accessible three shut-off valves and a regulating valve in the gas line. When the excavation was made, it was found that a shut-off valve of the water company would be located in the pit.

From December, 1922, to January, 1924, the pit was inspected monthly by the gas company; that is, some one visited the pit, opened it, and oiled the regulating valve. Covering the pit there was an 18 by 25 inch cast-iron cover.

On January 10, 1924, respondent, Harvey H. Smith, being then an employee of the water company, went to the intersection of Ninth and Reservoir streets for the purpose of shutting off the water. He went into the pit, not knowing that it belonged to the gas company or that the gas company's pipes were located therein. Being unable to see, he struck a match, and the explosion occurred, causing the injuries complained of.

The court gave judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, together with costs, and from this judgment defendant, Southern Counties Gas Company, has appealed. It is appellant's contention, first, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply; and, second, that, if it does apply, the defendant has met the burden imposed.

In Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 P. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146, one of the early leading cases in California involving this question, the court says:

> "This proposition [referring to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in common carrier cases] is elementary and uncontradicted; therefore, the citation of authority is unnecessary. Yet we know of no sound reason, and have found none stated in the books, why this principle of presumptions should be applicable to cases involving contractual relations and inapplicable to cases where no contractual relations exist."

In Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Cap Co., 139 Cal. 340, 73 P. 164, in a case where goods were injured by the overflow of water from the boiler of defendant's engine room located on an upper floor, the court answering defendant's contention that the court erred in instructing the jury that the mere fact of the overflow of the water from the boiler under the circumstances of the case was prima facie evidence of negligence, says:

> "The rule applicable to this question is thus stated in Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549 [40 P. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146], * * * 'when a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care.' It appeared from the evidence that this engine had been operated without injury, under the same circumstances, for three or four years before the accident happened. This sufficiently demonstrated that in the ordinary course of things such accidents did not happen, and was a justification of the instruction complained of. A large number of cases are cited from other states, apparently holding the contrary to this doctrine. It is sufficient to say that the rule is settled the other way in this state. Butcher v. Vaca Valley, etc., R. L. R. Co., 67 Cal. 518 [8 P. 174]."

See, also, Harlow v. Standard Improvement Co., 145 Cal. 477, 480, 78 P. 1045; Bowley v. Mangrun et al., 3 Cal. App. 229, 234, 84 P. 996; Bauhofer v. Crawford, 16 Cal. App. 676, 678, 117 P. 931; Lippert v. Pacific Sugar Corp., 33 Cal. App. 198, 208, 164 P. 810.

In Lippert v. Pacific Sugar Corp., supra, which was a case where death resulted from the explosion of a boiler, the court says:

> "The cases are industriously cited and considered in Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 P. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146. Referring to the case of Young v. Bransford, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 232, which supports a contrary doctrine, attention is called to the following language in the reported opinion of that case: 'At the same time the fact that there was an explosion, which is not an ordinary incident of the use of a steam boiler, ought to have some weight, inasmuch as it may be out of the power of the aggrieved party in some instances to prove any more. The reasonable rule would seem to be that laid down by Judge Wallace: "That from the mere fact of an explosion it is competent for the jury to infer, as a proposition of fact, that there was some negligence in the management of the boiler, or some defect in its condition."' We are satisfied that this is a case where the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable, and plaintiffs > are not precluded from relying upon it because they charged specific omissions of duties or acts of negligence."

This doctrine is followed in a number of other states. In Chiles v. Ft. Smith Com. Co., 139 Ark. 489, 216 S. W. 11, 8 A. L. R. 493, the court adopts the same rule followed in this state and cites with approval Judson v. Giant Powder Co., supra. See, also, Manning v. St. Paul Gaslight Co., 129 Minn. 55, 151 N. W. 423, L. R. A. 1915E, 1022, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 276; Gould v. Winona Gas Co., 100 Minn. 258, 111 N. W. 254, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 889; Kearner v. Tanner Co., 31 R. I. 203, 76 A. 833, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 537; Warn v. Davis Oil Co. (D. C.) 61 F. 631.

Appellant in support of its contention has cited us to several cases. All but one, however, are from other jurisdictions; the one California case being Union Investment Co. v. San Francisco Gas & Electric Co., 168 Cal. 58, 141 P. 807. That case is reviewed in the later case of Willard v. Valley Gas & Fuel Co., 171 Cal. 9, 13, 151 P. 286, 288, in which the court, in commenting on the Union Investment Co. Case, says:

> "The citation is not apt because in that case we were considering a record which did not disclose the origin of the fire as being an explosion of gas."

As to the other cases cited as holding that the mere fact of an explosion in a building furnished with gas does not establish a prima facie case or raise a presumption of negligence, nor does the fact that gas was found accumulated in a pit, though unusual and not according to the ordinary occurrence of events, give rise to a prima facie presumption of negligence, it may be said that the cases cited do not parallel the present case, but, if they did, they are not authority, for, as is said in Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Cap Co., supra, "the rule is settled the other way in this state."

[1] In the present case the pit containing the gas pipes had been used for more than a year before the accident happened, was under the management of appellant gas company, and the accident was "such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care," and therefore the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies. Judson v. Giant Powder Co., supra.

[2, 3] As to appellant's second contention that if the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does apply, it has met the burden imposed, it may be said that the evidence offered by appellant merely creates a conflict, and upon such conflict the judgment will not be disturbed on appeal. Appellant offered testimony to show the exercise of due care and to rebut the presumption of negligence. Witnesses connected with the appellant company testified that following the accident they tested the gas pipes in the pit with soapsuds and found no leak; that there was a 4-inch vent pipe running from the pit to the corner of the street and coming up between the curb and the sidewalk, and also, as to the character of the pit, that it was constructed modernly, with the latest improved devices or structures to prevent accumulation of gas. With the presumption of negligence, however, arising from the explosion, the question was one of fact as to whether the gas company had met the burden imposed upon it of showing the exercise of due care.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF LONG BEACH v. CROWN TRANSFER & STORAGE CO.

MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. SAME.

(Civ. 6133, 6134.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 14, 1928.

1. Warehousemen 🔑34(5)—Burden was on warehouseman to show what became of missing goods.

In action for damages by failure to deliver all of goods for which defendant issued warehouse receipts, burden was on defendant to excuse its apparent default by showing what became of missing goods.

2. Warehousemen 🔑34(2)—Pledgees held not estopped to sue warehouseman for nondelivery of goods on assumption that pledgor's manager had misappropriated them, in absence of showing of what became of them.

Pledgees of goods stored held not estopped to sue warehouseman for damages by failure to deliver all of them at wharf for shipment to purchaser, as directed by pledgor's manager on assumption that latter misappropriated missing goods, in absence of evidence of who got them or what became of them.

3. Warehousemen 🔑34(5) — Court cannot presume in favor of or against warehouseman in determining value of spoiled goods.

In action for damages by failure to deliver all of goods for which defendant issued warehouse receipts, court cannot presume either in favor of or against defendant in arriving at value of spoiled goods.

4. Warehousemen 🔑34(9)—Any inference in favor of or against warehouseman in fixing value of spoiled goods was for jury.

In fixing value of spoiled goods in action against warehouseman for damages, any inference in favor of or against defendant was for jury.

5. Warehousemen 🔑34(8) — Warehouseman held liable for average sale price of spoiled goods.

Warehouseman, sued for damages by failure to deliver all of goods stored, held liable to pledgees for average price received for spoiled goods sold.

6. Warehousemen 🔑34(4)—Complaint showing special title to, and immediate right to possession of, goods, and alleging demand therefor and defendant warehouseman's refusal, stated cause of action for conversion.

Complaint stating facts showing that plaintiff held special title to, and immediate right of possession of, goods described, and alleging that plaintiff made demand for return thereof, and that defendant warehouseman refused to comply, stated a cause of action for conversion.

7. Warehousemen 🔑34(8) — Warehouseman is liable for interest from date of conversion by refusal to return goods on demand (Civ. Code, §§ 3287, 3336).

Under Civ. Code, § 3336, warehouseman is liable for interest on damages recovered from date of conversion by refusal to comply with demand for return of goods stored, not from date of judgment under section 3287.

8. Warehousemen 🔑25(6) — Warehouseman was not bound to make deliveries outside city wherein warehouse was located.

Warehouseman was under no duty under its contract to make deliveries elsewhere than at city where its warehouse was located.

9. Interest 🔑47(1)—Allowance of interest from date before filing of complaint, not alleging date of demand on warehouseman for return of goods, was excessive.

Where complaint, in action against warehouseman for conversion, did not allege date of plaintiff's demand for return of goods, allowance of interest from date prior to that on which complaint was filed was excessive.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Long Beach and the Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, respectively, against the Crown Transfer & Storage Company. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Modified, and affirmed as modified.

A. Lincoln Rowland and Carter & Webster, all of Pasadena, for appellant.

STURTEVANT, J. Each of these actions was commenced by the plaintiff to recover a judgment for damages. The actions were tried in the lower court, sitting without a jury. The actions were tried together, and the trial court made findings in favor of each plaintiff, and from judgments entered thereon the defendant has appealed in each action under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The record consists of two transcripts by the clerk, one by the reporter and one set of briefs.

The Braden Preserving Company, hereinafter called the Braden Company, operated a factory at Pasadena, and stored its manufactured products in a warehouse operated by defendant at the same place. The Braden Company from time to time borrowed moneys from the plaintiffs and issued to each its promissory note. To secure the repayment of said moneys, it pledged to the plaintiffs the goods so stored in defendant's warehouse. The amount of the plaintiffs' claim against the Braden Company at all times greatly exceeded the value of the goods in the warehouse. As there was considerable detail in the transactions, C. W. Clark, an employee of one of the banks, was engaged as the agent of both banks to attend to the business representing the interests of both banks. From time to time merchandise was stored, some was sold and taken out, and more was received. June 1, 1922, the entire merchandise on hand was contracted to be sold at certain ports, and was to be shipped on board one of the vessels anchored at the wharf of the Luckenbach Steamship Company at San Pedro. The manufacturers negotiated the sale, and engaged defendant to transport the merchandise at $4 per ton to San Pedro. The plaintiffs adopted the transaction. The manager of the Braden Company at that time was Mr. Baer. On that date Mr. Clark wrote a letter to the defendant informing it of the sale, and, among other things, said:

> "The writer will call upon you Saturday morning and surrender the warehouse receipt held by us and the First National Bank of Long Beach, and in the meantime, kindly assist Mr. Baer in getting these goods ready for shipment."

The goods consisted of preserves, jams, jellies, etc. The goods were in cases. Some needed repacking. In some instances cases needed repairing. Some of the goods were in such condition that it was necessary to reboil them, etc. The available space to do this reconditioning, and machinery therefor, could not be had at the defendant's warehouse. Neverthless, much of the work was done there. However, some of the goods were taken to the factory of the Braden Company for reconditioning. As the reconditioning proceeded, it was learned that some of the goods were spoiled so badly that they could not be reconditioned.

Different goods were packed in different sized containers. In some instances one and the same kind of goods was packed in different sized packages or containers.

When the deliveries at the wharf of the Luckenbach Company had come to an end, a reckoning was had. From that reckoning it appeared that the defendant had not made delivery of all of the goods which it had received and for which it had issued warehouse receipts. Thereupon these actions were commenced.

[1] Finding No. 7 in each action finds: (1) That the defendant did not deliver the goods in accordance with the plaintiff's written instructions; and (2) that plaintiff did not, in writing or otherwise, direct the defendant to deliver any of the goods to the Braden Company. The defendant asserts that the finding is not sustained by the evidence, and it quotes Mr. Clark's letter. The plaintiff replies that a proper construction of the language used by Mr. Clark will not support the contention of the defendant. The plaintiff then states that, even if the contention in this behalf is not sound, nevertheless the finding was correct, because the burden rested on the defendant to excuse its apparent default, and it failed to support its allegations with sufficient proof. 2 Deering's General Laws, 1923, p. 3721, § 8. We will concede for the purposes of this decision that Mr. Clark's letter was, among other things, an authorization for the workmen to take some of the goods to the factory of the Braden Company for the purposes of reconditioning them. However, for the protection of the good names of each party, and in the exercise of ordinary care, it would appear that a record would have been made of the goods so taken and of what became of them. But this record is wholly silent on that subject, and, as stated above, the burden was on the defendant.

If defendant would go so far as to claim that Mr. Clark's letter was an authorization for an absolute and permanent delivery to the Braden Company, we have no hesitancy in saying the terms used in the letter do not admit of that construction. Furthermore, there were orders, in the usual form as used by the parties, issued on June 3, 1922, which covered these particular goods, and which directed delivery to the Luckenbach Company. Mr. Baer was not called by either party. Mr. Braden was called. But no one was called who stated what in very short was done with the absent or missing packages.

[2] In presenting the point just discussed, the defendant asserts that the plaintiff is estopped. In making that assertion, it assumes that the record discloses that Mr. Baer misappropriated the missing goods. It does not. It falls far short of showing who got them or what became of them.

[3, 4] The defendant claims that finding No. 9, which fixes the damages, is not sustained by the evidence. It argues that only those damages may be allowed which are clearly ascertainable both in their nature and origin. Civ. Code, § 3301. The wrong complained of, under the undisputed findings, arose through the acts of omission and commission of the defendant. We come next to value. In fixing that value, we are confronted with a question regarding what rule of law to follow. There are three possible rules. The defendant asserts that, in arriving at the value of the 1,000 cases of spoiled goods, as the character thereof was not shown, "the trial court should have eliminated the cases having the greatest value, and then those having the next greatest value, and so on down until the 1,000 cases were exhausted." The plaintiff says:

> "No. There is no authority for doing so. To do so is to presume in favor of the defendant, whereas we should presume against it. The latter rule is stated in Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange, 506, and has been followed in many cases. 2 Sutherland on Damages, p. 1415, volume 4, p. 4225."

[5] We may not, in this state, adopt either presumption as there is no statute to that effect. If it is claimed that an inference exists instead of a presumption, then the inference was for the jury. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 P. 530. The trial court followed neither method. It followed the rule delineated in Hobbs v. Monarch Refrigerating Co., 277 Ill. 326, 115 N. E. 534, L. R. A. 1917D, 847, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 743. At page 536 (277 Ill. 332), the court said:

> "Counsel for plaintiff in error also argue that the court erred in reckoning the amount which it was decreed should be paid per pound for the damaged poultry sold. In an action to recover the proportionate share of the property or goods confused by another, it is not necessary to identify the exact article or the exact property formerly owned. The proof tends to show that plaintiff in error could have separated the damaged goods of defendant in error from the other goods injured and thereafter sold as salvage. Not having done so, it is clear that under the authorities it was properly held liable by the decree for the average price received in the sale of such goods. 8 Cyc. 576; First Nat. Bank of Elgin v. Schween, 127 Ill. 573, 20 N. E. 681, 11 Am. St. Rep. 174; 5 R. C. L. 1052. The burden of establishing the number of pounds of salvage sold by plaintiff in error belonging to defendant in error, and the prices received therefor, was upon plaintiff in error. Having failed to make this proof, it cannot now be heard to complain because it is required to pay the average price for which such damaged goods sold."

If it be conceded that the rule as stated is sound, we do not understand the defendant contends that the trial court erred in applying it; but its contention is that the trial court should have applied a different rule. We think the trial court did not err.

[6, 7] The defendant contends that the trial court should not have allowed interest on the plaintiffs' demand before the date of the judgment, and it cites Civil Code, § 3287; Williams v. Flinn & Treacy, 61 Cal. App. 352, 214 P. 1024; American-Hawaiian, etc., Co. v. Butler, 17 Cal. App. 764, 768, 121 P. 709; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 71, 18 P. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164. The plaintiff contends that it sued in conversion, and that the interest was properly allowed from the date of the demand made on the defendant. Civ. Code, § 3336. The complaint was quite multifarious, but no demurrer was interposed. After a careful examination, we think it must be conceded that, among other things, it stated a cause of action as for conversion. It stated facts showing that the plaintiff held a special title to, and an immediate right to the possession of, the goods described in the complaint, and thereupon it followed with an allegation that the plaintiff made a demand for the return to it of the goods and that the defendant had refused to comply with the demand. These facts constituted a conversion of the plaintiff's property. The law fixing the measure of damages in an action for conversion is section 3336 of the Civil Code. By the terms of that section the defendant was liable for interest from the date of conversion. Under the facts pleaded, the conversion took place when the defendant refused to comply with plaintiff's demand.

[8, 9] In its complaint the plaintiff alleged that on the 3d day of June, 1922, it directed the defendant to deliver the goods to the Luckenbach Steamship Company at San Pedro. As is stated above, the defendant's warehouse was at Pasadena. Under its contract as warehouseman the defendant was under no duty to make deliveries at San Pedro. However, the plaintiff also pleaded that it demanded the return of the goods to the plaintiff, and that the defendant failed and refused to comply with that demand. The demand last mentioned is not denied by the answer. That demand and the defendant's refusal constituted the default of the defendant. But the date of that demand is not alleged. The complaint was filed April 30, 1923. The demand was at least as early as April 30, 1923. The judgment awarded interest from June 3, 1922. That was an excessive allowance.

The judgment in each case is modified by deducting therefrom interest from June 3, 1922, to April 30, 1923, and, as so modified, it is affirmed, and the respondents will recover their costs on appeal.

HEAP et al. v. RODGERS et al. (Civ. 5019.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 21, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨193(2), 719(4)—Misjoinder of plaintiffs or causes of action, not raised below or on appeal, need not be considered.

Misjoinder of parties plaintiff or causes of action need not be considered, where defendants made no point thereof in court below and did not raise question on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Where evidence of who constituted partnership was conflicting and there was sufficient evidence to sustain finding that appellant was partner, judgment must be affirmed.

Where evidence as to who constituted partnership was in marked conflict and there was sufficient evidence to sustain court's finding that appellant was copartner with his codefendants, appellate court must affirm judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Jesse Olney, Judge.

Action by James L. Heap and others against E. R. Rodgers, E. L. Askin, and another, individually and as partners doing business under the name of E. R. Rodgers & Co. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Askin appeals. Affirmed.

Lester G. King, of San Bernardino, and D. M. Edwards, of Visalia, for appellant.

A. S. Maloney and John L. Campbell, both of San Bernardino, for respondents.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The action which gives rise to this appeal is one wherein the plaintiffs sued to recover judgment against the defendants for a balance alleged remaining unpaid on account of several crops of apples, each owned by a separate plaintiff and sold separately to the defendants. The court found in favor of plaintiffs, and from the judgment rendered defendant E. L. Askin appeals.

[1] A unique situation is presented by this action, in that four plaintiffs have joined in an action to recover a joint judgment based upon four separate contracts. Each contract was made separately and at different times and represented a separate and distinct purchase by Rodgers & Co., the defendant, and the joint judgment prayed for is the total of the four separate balances owing on the four contracts.

Inasmuch as the defendants made no point of the misjoinder of parties plaintiff or causes of action in the court below, nor have they raised any such question on appeal, we pass to a discussion of the one point urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment. Appellant states this point in his brief in the following language: "Evidence not sufficient and against the facts."

Under this heading appellant in his brief discusses the evidence for the apparent purpose of pointing out that it is insufficient to support the findings and judgment, and in our consideration of the case we will put this interpretation upon the appellant's above-worded contention.

[2] Each of the four plaintiffs being owners of separate apple orchards in San Bernardino county contracted to sell his crop of apples to a concern designated in the written contract executed in each sale as "E. R. Rodgers & Co." Respondents' contention was and is that E. R. Rodgers & Co. was a copartnership consisting of defendants E. R. Rodgers, Willard Morton, and E. L. Askin. Askin alone answered the complaint and the principal issue tendered by him was the question of who constituted the firm of E. R. Rodgers & Company. Askin there urged and in his appeal contends that he was not a partner, but that the firm of E. R. Rodgers & Co., was a partnership consisting alone of E. R. Rodgers and Willard Morton.

The evidence upon the question of who constituted the partnership is markedly in conflict. To point out the details of this conflict would serve no useful purpose. We are satisfied that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the court in finding that appellant was a copartner with Rodgers and Morton, doing business under the firm name of E. R. Rodgers & Co. Under these circumstances this court must hold that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the findings complained of and affirm the judgment.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

PHILLIPS v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.

(Civ. 3394.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 8, 1928.

1. Negligence 🔑136(9)—Question of contributory negligence is for jury, where reasonable minds may differ thereon (Civ. Code, § 1714).

Wherever facts present a problem on the question of contributory negligence, on the solution of which reasonable minds may differ, question is one of fact for jury; contributory negligence being bar to recovery of damages for personal injuries under Civ. Code, § 1714.

2. Trial 🔑165—On motion for nonsuit, all of evidence must be accepted as true, disregarding contradictions, and indulging every reasonable inference in plaintiff's favor.

On motion for nonsuit, evidence must be viewed most strongly against defendant, and all of evidence disclosed by record must be accepted as true, disregarding conflicts and contradictions, and giving plaintiff's evidence its full probative strength, regardless of improper admission of evidence, together with every reasonable inference and presumption in plaintiff's favor.

3. Street railroads 🔑98(8)—Pedestrian, attempting to cross street railway tracks on unpaved way, where rails projected, was required to look and listen and to stop, if view was obstructed.

Where way occupied by street car tracks was unpaved, and consisted of ties resting upon loose sand, with rails projecting above level of street, pedestrian, attempting to cross tracks, was required to first look and listen before crossing and was obliged to stop where view was obstructed; same rule being applicable in such case as that applying to steam railways.

4. Street railroads 🔑98(6)—Pedestrian, attempting to cross street railroad tracks, had right to assume car would not proceed at night without headlight, whistle, or bell.

Pedestrian, attempting to cross street railroad tracks, had right to assume that car would not be run at night across an open way leading to residence street without a headlight and without adequate warning by whistle or bell, where the public were accustomed to cross the tracks at that place.

5. Street railroads 🔑117(21)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian attempting to cross street car tracks on unpaved way within view of apparently stationary unlighted car on side track held for jury.

Contributory negligence of pedestrian attempting to cross street railway tracks on unpaved way to street opening on other side, within view of apparently stationary car located on side track without lights, held question for jury, in action for injuries caused when car moved forward, without lights and without any warning signal and struck him.

6. Street railroads 🔑113(7)—Testimony that public ordinarily crossed street car tracks at place where accident occurred held competent in action for injuries to pedestrian.

In action for injuries to pedestrian attempting to cross street car tracks along unpaved way, testimony that place of accident was place where public commonly crossed tracks in course leading to street on opposite side held competent to show custom, knowledge of which would throw light on question of plaintiff's contributory negligence.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1058(1)—Court's admission of similar evidence renders harmless former error in sustaining objection to testimony.

Party is not harmed by trial court's ruling which excludes competent evidence, where similar evidence on point is subsequently admitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by R. Floyd Phillips against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ford, Bodkin, Watt & Herlihy, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Karr, E. E. Morris, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit granted solely upon the ground of alleged contributory negligence on the part of appellant, in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained in being run over by an electric car while attempting to cross respondent's tracks at the city of Venice.

The respondent railroad corporation owns and operates double tracks of electric trolley car lines adjacent to, and parallel with, the ocean shore from Santa Monica southerly through and beyond Venice. In the vicinity of Venice, where the accident occurred, the trolley right of way is about 60 feet in width, and at this point contains three lines of tracks, the rails of which are spiked to ties which rest upon loose ocean shore sand which is common to this vicinity. The rails extend above the ties a distance of about 3 inches. The main north and south bound tracks are some 16 feet apart at this point. Along the extreme easterly portion of this right of way a third track has been maintained for more than 10 years as a side track, upon which it was the custom of respondent railroad company to station cars during the night, and at times when the traffic did not demand their immediate use. Appellant was aware of this custom. Parallel with this line of side tracks, and 3 feet easterly thereof, was a sidewalk which was commonly used by pedestrians. This district was somewhat thickly settled, and was laid out in streets and blocks, with business buildings and dwelling houses adjacent to the car line on either side. Clubhouse avenue extended from the ocean on the westerly side of the tracks, at right angles to the trolley way, opposite which there was no regular paved or planked crossing of the tracks. Here there was a break in the continuation of this avenue, which resumed its course beyond the tracks about 100 feet northerly. Between the main tracks, at a point about 100 feet southerly from the westerly extension of Clubhouse avenue, was a railway station, where the electric trains customarily stopped for the accommodation of passengers. The railway right of way was not paved or planked for pedestrians at this crossing.

Appellant was 30 years of age, active, alert, and possessing good faculties. For 15 years he had resided on Clubhouse avenue west of the railroad tracks. In returning home from Venice, it was his custom to follow the sidewalk along the easterly side of respondent's right of way to a point opposite the westerly entrance to Clubhouse avenue, and then cross the tracks at right angles to his residence. At night the right of way was poorly lighted in this vicinity. There were no lights nearer than 10 feet south of the waiting station. These lights consisted of three or four 40-watt electric lamps. No fence or obstructions existed to prevent pedestrians from crossing the tracks opposite Clubhouse avenue. It was a common occurrence for people to cross the tracks at this point, although it was not a regular railroad crossing. The witness Mr. Heffron testified: "The public came to that station from Westminster avenue and also from Clubhouse avenue, and they crossed the tracks (there)." Mr. Wilson also testified: "There is a little crossing unkept that leads across Horizon and Clubhouse, right across the tracks. * * *"

It appears from the evidence that on the night of the accident the appellant had spent the evening with some friends south of Venice. About 11 o'clock p. m. he left for home, stopping for lunch at Venice. In company with a friend he then pursued his course along the sidewalk easterly of respondent's trolley way to a point immediately opposite Clubhouse avenue, where he resided. Here they stopped to chat for a moment. As they stood talking, appellant saw a car apparently stationed on the side track about 90 feet northerly from the place where they stood talking. The car had neither headlight nor side lights exhibited, although there was a dim light shining inside the car. No motorman was seen. There was nothing in the appearance of the car to indicate that it was in motion or approaching. Knowing of the custom to side-track cars at this point, seeing no lights and hearing no sounds to indicate that the car was in motion, the appellant was deceived into believing that it was in fact parked there for the night. Just before stepping upon the side track to cross to his own side of the trolley way, he again looked to the north, seeing the car in the same position which he supposed it formerly occupied. He then looked down toward the rails, and stepped upon the track in an effort to cross the right of way. Suddenly, as he reached a point within a foot of the farthest rail of the side track, he heard the rumbling of the wheels of the approaching car. It carried no headlight, nor side lights, the fender was elevated, and not down in its proper position for safety; no whistle was blown, and no gong was sounded. Startled, the appellant hesitated for a moment, then he lurched forward to save himself, but was struck, and dragged some 40 feet. One ankle was run over and crushed, necessitating the amputation of his foot. Four witnesses, besides the appellant, agree that neither headlight nor side lights were lighted upon the car; that the fender was elevated and that there was no one in or about the cars except a motorman who had charge of the car. Several witnesses testified they heard no whistle or bell. Evidently the car was without passengers, and was being run down to the main track by a single motorman, without lights or any of the usual evidences that it was in transit.

The appellant testified:

> "On the night of February 8th, * * * I was with some friends about eight blocks south of Venice. * * * I left there about 11:15 (p. m). * * * I went up to Venice, and, after getting something to eat, I started home on the sidewalk. * * * I proceeded along this walk until I came to Clubhouse avenue. * * * I am familiar with the place marked 'waiting room.' I have been catching trains * * * for 15 years at that station. * * * The trains stopped at that point. The waiting room is opposite the alley marked on the map, and south of Clubhouse avenue (about 100 feet) between the two main tracks. * * * The public crossed the south-bound track going to the waiting room at Clubhouse avenue. That is the only way you can get to the station. The public also crossed from the east side of the main track going to the waiting room. * * * For about ten years * * * the side track has been used for parking electric trains—usually in the evening. I had observed cars there hundreds of time, for the night. They were parked on the side track. * * * I arrived near Clubhouse avenue on the cement sidewalk about 5 or 10 minutes after 12. The chap with me and I were walking down the sidewalk toward Clubhouse avenue, and we stood there a minute, and I happened to see this car parked there. * * * It was north of me. There was no headlight on it. There was a dim light inside. I couldn't say whether it was a single car or not. * * * There were no red lights nor green lights attached to it—no lights whatever. * * * I couldn't tell whether there was any man at the motor, or not. * * * No gong or whistle was sounded immediately prior to the time I was struck by the car. * * * I did not become aware that the car was moving toward me until, I should judge, it was about 8 feet from me, and at that time (when) I heard (it)—I gave a lurch, and that is the last I remember—I was struck. I was about half way between the two rails on this switchback when I was struck. * * * I was proceeding toward the ocean * * * directly opposite the east side of Clubhouse avenue. * * * The only way people could get there (to the station) was walking on that sidewalk. They proceeded west to Clubhouse avenue and across. * * * When this car was right on top of me, I naturally tried to get out of the way of it. I jumped westerly—that was the direction I was going; then it hit me. * * * My foot was crushed at the ankle but not cut off completely, but I had to have it amputated. * * * No warning was given from the time I first saw the car until I was struck. There were no * * * lights there at the scene of the accident. * * *"

Upon cross-examination appellant further testified:

"I was directly opposite Clubhouse avenue on the sidewalk when I saw the car that I thought was standing still. * * * I should judge the car was (then) about half a block away, in the neighborhood of 90 or 100 feet. * * * I was standing on the sidewalk at the time talking with this chap. I stood there, I imagine about a minute or so talking, after I saw the car. As I stood upon the sidewalk, I looked again. When I stepped off the sidewalk, the car was in the same position I noticed it at first—somewhere 90 or 100 feet away. I looked, and the car was standing there. * * * I had to look down to step over the tracks. * * * As I got to the second rail, I heard the car coming. I looked up, and then it was right on top of me. Then it kind of startled me, and I paused a moment, and then gave a lurch. The car was still up there when I stepped off the sidewalk to the rail. * * * It was very dark that night—no lights, and I could not say exactly (where the car was located. * * *) Just as I was about to step over the second rail, I heard the rumble of the train, and it looked like it was almost on top of me. * * * I stood there (on the sidewalk) about a minute talking to this friend. I looked before I stepped. I looked as I was stepping, and then (stepped) in the middle of the rails."

The record discloses an abundance of evidence requiring the submission of the case to the jury for its consideration upon the issue of contributory negligence. The motion for nonsuit was therefore erroneously granted.

[1, 2] Contributory negligence will bar one from recovering damages for personal injuries. Civ. Code, § 1714. But the question as to whether one has brought the injury upon himself by a lack of ordinary care is usually not a question of law for the court, but is one of fact for the jury. It is the province of the jury to determine the question of contributory negligence whenever the facts present a problem upon the solution of which reasonable minds may differ. 1 Thompson on Negligence, 408, § 425; 29 Cyc. 631; Kelly v. Santa Barbara R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 423, 153 P. 903; Hoffman v. So. Pac. Co. (Cal. App.) 258 P. 397. For the purpose of a nonsuit, the evidence must be viewed most strongly against the defendant. Every reasonable inference and presumption which may be deduced from the evidence must be resolved in favor of the plaintiff. All of the evidence disclosed by the record must be accepted as true. Conflicts and contradictions in the evidence must be disregarded. A lack of credibility of witnesses may not be considered, and the plaintiff's evidence is entitled to its full probative strength regardless of whether it may have been properly or improperly admitted. 9 Cal. Jur. 551, § 35.

[3] Since Trolley way, at the point where the accident occurred, is unpaved, and occupied by double interurban tracks, consisting of ties which rest upon loose sand, and T-rails projecting their full height above the level of the street, it must be conceded that the rule of caution required of a pedestrian attempting to cross tracks under such circumstances is the one applicable to steam railways, rather than the rule governing street car tracks within the boundaries of a city congested with traffic. Riney v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 45 Cal. App. 145, 187 P. 50. Clearly, this rule requires one to reasonably exercise his faculties of sight and hearing before attempting to cross an interurban electric system of tracks. One is bound to look and listen before crossing a railroad track, and, if the view is obscured for any reason so as to impair his sight or hearing, the exercise of reasonable caution will require him to stop so that he may more carefully look for approaching cars. 22 Cal. Jur. 318, § 68, p. 335; section 80; Green v. Los Angeles Terminal Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 31, 76 P. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68.

[4, 5] Testing the conduct of appellant in the instant case by the foregoing rule, can it be said that he omitted any act for his safety which would be required of a reasonable person under like circumstances? His familiarity with the custom of the respondent railroad company to station cars for the night on this side track would induce him to reasonably conclude that here was a car switched out and stationed until the increased traffic in the morning would require its use. His very knowledge of this custom beguiled him into the natural mistake of assuming that it was side-tracked for the night. This inference may reasonably be supported by the fact that it appeared to be stationary, and had neither headlight nor side lights which were customarily used upon these electric cars when they were being operated. He saw no motorman in the car, despite the dim light which appeared within. He heard no sound to warn him of a moving car, although his hearing was good. He stopped; he looked and observed the car; and he listened. It was dark at this point, for there were no lights nearer than the farthest end of the station, and these consisted of merely a group of three or four small incandescent globes. After stopping and observing the car some 90 feet away he chatted for a moment or more with his friend, and, before venturing upon the side track, he again looked, and saw the car in the same position where he supposed he had formerly seen it. Everything in the appearance of the car confirmed his belief that it was stationary. As a reasonable person, he had a right to assume that it would not be run down across an open way leading to a residence street where the public were accustomed to cross the tracks, without a headlight, and without adequate warning of whistle or bell. This is not a case of a pedestrian thoughtlessly stepping in front of a rapidly approaching car on a main line, where one should expect trains to be running, and where a glaring headlight, or a warning whistle or bell, admonished him of the danger.

It was a mistaken estimate regarding an unlighted and unheralded car silently sliding down upon him on a side track in the darkness. His attention was diverted from the car as he looked downward in the darkness to pick his way across the track. Without warning, the car suddenly came upon him. Unquestionably he was deceived regarding the real distance of the car when he saw it. The darkness and the lack of lights on the car may reasonably have accounted for this mistake. Since his hearing was good, we may reasonably assume that the car was silently rolling down upon him in the darkness without lights and without warning.

Under such circumstances, viewing the evidence most strongly against the respondent with every reasonable inference and presumption in favor of the appellant, accepting the entire evidence as true, rejecting all conflicts and contradictions, if any exist, and giving full weight, credit, and probative force to the testimony, we are bound to conclude that the record does not warrant the court in finding, as a matter of law, that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence.

As precedents in support of the judgment of nonsuit in the present case, respondent relies on the cases of Brown v. Pacific Electric Co., 167 Cal. 199, 138 P. 1005; Ross v. Pacific Electric Co., 39 Cal. App. 658, 179 P. 538; and Riney v. Pacific Electric Co., 45 Cal. App. 145, 187 P. 50. These cases, however, were based upon facts radically different from those found in the case at bar, and are therefore of little aid. Reference to the essential facts of these cases will readily distinguish them from the instant case without comment. In the Brown Case, supra, the syllabus concisely states the facts upon which a nonsuit was sustained, as follows:

> "The deceased, after approaching the car track and seeing the rapidly approaching car with its brilliant headlight, and after turning back to a place of safety, and hearing the warning whistle sounded by the motorman, suddenly, without looking, or taking any of the commonest precautions, rushed in front of the car."

In the Ross Case, supra, a nonsuit was affirmed on the following facts: Plaintiff was well acquainted with the locality where the accident occurred. It was broad daylight. She alighted from a car adjacent to a parallel track upon which another car was approaching from the opposite direction. The court said:

> "She had alighted * * * [in a] zone of safety from which, * * * she had an unobstructed view for * * * several hundred feet easterly, and from which point the slightest look or glance by her would have disclosed the proximity of the moving car which was such that rendered it impossible to step forward without colliding therewith; and yet she, with full knowledge that the cars were accustomed to pass each other in the manner shown, * * * left the zone of safety, * * * and stepped so near the car then passing immediately in front of her that she was struck by the projecting step."

And in the Riney Case, supra, a nonsuit was affirmed in a case where plaintiff was injured at nearly the same place where the accident in the instant case occurred. In that case, however, the plaintiff crossed the railroad right of way from east to west, a distance of about 40 feet, and, without looking, stepped directly in front of a rapidly approaching car on the main track, which was plainly visible at a great distance. The court said:

> "It was upon the second track that plaintiff was injured. * * * The only time he looked or listened for an approaching car was when he left the sidewalk to cross the street. Although there was an open view for five hundred feet, and his hearing was good, he says he neither saw nor heard any indication of an approaching car. From that point, until he was struck * * * he paid absolutely no further heed to his surroundings, but proceeded leisurely across the street, apparently engrossed in introspective reflections. The distance he traveled was over forty feet, and he then entered upon the second track without looking up or even listening. At this time there was a car speeding down toward him * * * at a rate of thirty or forty miles per hour, upon an open, unpaved track, with a noise * * * heard half a block away. * * * Considering the distance plaintiff had to travel from the curb, where he took his only observation of the street, to the second track, where he was struck, the most obvious dictates of common prudence required him to look and listen again before entering on this second track."

[6, 7] Appellant complains of error in the sustaining of objections to testimony to the effect that the public commonly crossed respondent's tracks, at the place where the accident occurred, in their course directly to Clubhouse avenue on the westerly side of Trolley way. "Q. Is it (the right of way across the tracks to Clubhouse avenue) ordinarily used by the public?" Objections to similar questions were sustained. Unquestionably this evidence was competent to show a custom of pedestrians, the knowledge of which would throw some light upon the question as to whether appellant exercised reasonable caution in attempting to cross the tracks at that point. Still appellant is not harmed by this ruling, as similar evidence upon this point was subsequently admitted, as hereinbefore mentioned.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed.

MAJOR v. ROBERTSON.

(Civ. 6212.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 14, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 12, 1928.

1. Wills 🔑439—In construing will, testator's intention must prevail, where ascertainable, and not contrary to some positive rule of law.

In construction of wills, the cardinal rule to be observed is to ascertain the testator's intent, and if that intent can be clearly conceived, and is not contrary to some positive rule of law, it must prevail.

2. Wills 🔑440—Testator's intent must be ascertained from words employed in will, together with such intrinsic evidence as may be admissible.

Testator's intent must in all cases be ascertained from the words which he employs in will, together with such intrinsic evidence as may be admissible; it not being permissible for courts to attempt to improve on will which testator has actually made.

3. Wills 🔑440—To ascertain testator's intent court must not consider words testator may have meant to use but did not.

In construing a will, the question always before the court is not what the testator should have meant to do or what words he may have meant to use, but what did he mean by the words which he actually used.

4. Wills 🔑72—Where there is doubt as to whether instrument is a will, test is whether maker executed document animo testandi.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Application by Oscar Major for probate of the will of Arthur Major, deceased, opposed by Katherine Robertson. From a decree in favor of the proponent, contestant appeals. Reversed.

Treat & Ogden, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph A. Garry, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal from an order admitting a will to probate. The sole question here presented is whether or not the instrument so admitted constitutes on olographic will. It reads as follows:

> "San Francisco, California, Dec. 12, 1924.
> "Mr. Oscar Major
> "Dear Nephew,
> "in reply to your letter i received last week i must tell you that i am very well and hope your the same i must tell you that i will go to St. Andre before long and i take up with me the copy of my testament you ask me for but be sure i have not change my idea your are to be the owner of the hold thing i am worting about $15,000 to $16,000 dollar
> "your uncle Arthur Major."

The evidence introduced in support of the petition established that Arthur Major was a resident of and died in the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., on the 15th day of February, 1926, leaving an estate of the approximate value of $12,000, and leaving surviving him as his next of kin and heirs at law a brother, Joseph Edward Major, and a sister, Katherine Robertson; that the above-recited instrument submitted for probate was sent to Oscar Major through the mail by his uncle, Arthur Major, the decedent, in the month of December, 1924, and that such instrument was entirely written, dated, and signed in the handwriting of the deceased. No evidence was introduced as to testamentary capacity of the deceased. The court found, among other facts, that deceased was, at the date of the execution of the instrument in question, of sound and disposing mind and that the letter was testamentary in character. As conclusions of law it was determined that it constituted an olographic will and it was accordingly admitted to probate. Appellant contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence; that the conclusions of law are erroneous, as is also the order admitting the instrument to probate. We are of a like opinion.

[1-10] Primarily it may be said that in the construction of wills, the cardinal rule to be observed is to ascertain the intent of the testator, and if that intent can be clearly conceived, and is not contrary to some positive rule of law, it must prevail. In the ascertainment of this intent, however, courts cannot make a will for a testator or attempt to improve upon the will which the testator actually made. It follows that a testator's intention must in all cases be ascertained from the words which he employs in his will, together with such extrinsic evidence as may be admissible. The question always before the mind of a court is not what the testator should have meant to do, or what words did he mean to use, but what did he mean by the words which he actually used. In cases where doubt arises as to whether the instrument is a will or of some other character, the true test is whether the maker executed the document animo testandi. Without this it cannot be a will. Proof that a party intended to make a disposition of his property similar to or identical with that contained in a certain paper which he has executed does not make such paper his will. No matter what his intentions may have been with respect to the disposition ,of his estate, if the maker of an instrument did not intend by that particular paper to dispose of his property in the manner in which it could have been disposed by a will, such instrument must be denied probate, no matter how correct it may be as to form and execution, and no matter how clearly it may conform to the intentions of the maker which he had otherwise expressed. 1 Alexander on Wills, §§ 46, 47. In other words, when it is claimed that the intention of a deceased was that a paper should stand for a last will and testament, it must be plainly and satisfactorily apparent that the testator intended the very paper to be his will. Unless it so appears, the paper must be rejected. Heirs at law are not to be disinherited unless such intention is clearly manifested and expressed with legal certainty. Estate of Meade, 118 Cal. 428, 50 P. 541, 62 Am. St. Rep. 244. And courts cannot supply an intention which cannot be found in it. Estate of Branick, 172 Cal. 482, 157 P. 238. No particular words are necessary to show a testamentary intent, but, as was said by Mr. Justice Seawell in Estate of Spitzer, 196 Cal. 301, 237 P. 739, it must appear that the maker intended by it to dispose of property after his death. Here the instrument in question reveals that the deceased had been asked by his nephew for his will, and that the letter in reply, and which it is sought to have established as a will, is a mere acknowledgment to such request containing an assurance that he had not changed his mind with reference to the disposition of property in his testament. That deceased had made a will under which his nephew was the sole legatee, but which will had been rejected for the reason it was not properly executed is conceded by both parties. This beyond question was the testament referred to in the letter. The letter, however, cannot be construed as a will, for it contains absolutely no words that can possibly be construed as a testamentary intent. Nor is there any evidence in the record that deceased ever intended that the instrument in question should constitute his will. It was a mere response to a request containing an assurance of the existence of a will under the terms of which the nephew had not been forgotten. The document was clearly informative and not testamentary. We conclude, therefore, that the record contains no evidence to show that the particular instrument offered and received as a will was ever intended by the deceased to be his will. Whatever his intention may have been to make his nephew his sole legatee, no words have been employed by him in the instrument in question to effectuate that purpose and it is clearly manifest that deceased did not intend the letter to constitute his will, but, as stated, it was clearly informative and containing the assurance that the nephew was remembered in a will. We are cited by respondent to cases which he claims uphold his contention that the instrument is a will. We do not so understand them, but, on the contrary, the facts upon which they are based showed in each case a testamentary intent from the instrument itself. As was said in Estate of Spitzer, supra, no good purpose would be accomplished by citing them, as each case must stand upon its own peculiar facts.

The order admitting the instrument to probate is reversed.

GUNST v. ZIMDARS et al. (Civ. 5395.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 6, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑348—Demurrer to complaint for damages for breach of contract by one not party or privy to contract held well taken.

Where plaintiff sued vendor and successor in interest for damages for breach of land contract, and it appeared from complaint that C., who bought land at mortgage foreclosure sale, was not party to contract, nor in privity therewith, but complaint prayed for judgment against him requiring him to execute deed to lot plaintiff had purchased from vendors, his demurrer to complaint should have been sustained.

2. Pleading 🔑418(2)—In action for breach of land contract, one not party to contract having, after demurrer overruled, tendered issue of title, court could determine question of title (Code Civ. Proc. § 738).

In action by purchaser against vendor and successor in interest for damages for breach of land contract, and for judgment against purchaser at mortgage foreclosure sale, requiring him to execute and deliver deed to lot, in which the latter's demurrer was overruled, and he thereupon answered and by appropriate allegations in cross-complaint tendered issue of title to land described in complaint, under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, and issue was traversed by plaintiff, court was authorized to determine question of title, and cross-complainant cannot complain that court determined issue presented by him.

3. Mortgages 🔑551—Action to compel mortgage foreclosure purchaser to execute deed, commenced within 18 months after latter obtained deed, was not barred by laches.

Where purchaser's action against vendor and successor in interest for damages for breach of land contract, and against C., purchaser at mortgage foreclosure sale, to compel him to execute deed to lot on ground that foreclosure action was intended to be dismissed as to lot purchased by him from mortgagor, was commenced within period of 18 months after C. obtained deed to land, plaintiff's action was not barred by laches.

4. Mortgages 🔑551—Evidence supported finding that it was intended to dismiss mortgage foreclosure action as to lot purchased by plaintiff.

Evidence held sufficient to support finding that parties to foreclosure action foreclosing mortgage on tract of land including lot purchased by plaintiff from mortgagor intended to dismiss foreclosure action both as to plaintiff and as to plaintiff's lot, though action was dismissed only as to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Joseph Gunst against J. B. Zimdars and others, in which B. B. Cory filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, the cross-complainant appeals. Upon the death of plaintiff, Vera B. Gunst, the administratrix of his estate, was substituted as plaintiff and respondent. Affirmed.

True Van Sickle, of Oakland, and Thomas W. Firby, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant B. B. Cory from a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to lot 6 in block 8 of Sunnyside in the city and county of San Francisco. March 11, 1912, the Homeland Company, then a corporation, was the owner of a tract of land of which said lot 6 was a part. On that day the said company made, executed, and delivered to one T. C. Judkins a mortgage covering all of said land, including said lot 6. The said mortgage was recorded in the office of the county recorder of said city and county on March 13, 1912. The real owner of said mortgage and the debt secured thereby was this appellant, B. B. Cory. On February 26, 1918, the said mortgage was formally assigned to him by the said Judkins. On March 31, 1913, the Homeland Company entered into a contract of sale with the respondent herein, whereby it agreed to sell to respondent said lot 6, and upon the performance by the latter of certain conditions named therein to convey to him a good and sufficient title thereto, free and clear of all incumbrances. Said contract of sale was duly recorded in the office of the recorder of said city and county on July 16, 1913. The Homeland Company, on October 1, 1915, conveyed its title to all of said property to the defendant Thomas A. Fisher. January 31, 1917, T. C. Judkins commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage against the said Homeland Company, Thomas A. Fisher, and this respondent. February 4, 1918, the respondent herein having completed his payments in accordance with the terms of said contract of sale, said Thomas A. Fisher, as the successor in interest of the Homeland Company, on March 23, 1918, made, executed, and delivered to respondent a deed to said lot 6, and said deed was duly recorded April 2, 1918. On January 20, 1920, on motion of counsel for the plaintiff in the said foreclosure suit herein mentioned, the said action was dismissed as against this respondent who, as heretofore said, was a defendant in said action. On January 12, 1920, the said foreclosure proceedings were carried to judgment as against the Homeland Company and Thomas A. Fisher, and on February 17, 1920, the defendant B. B. Cory purchased all of said property under the foreclosure proceedings and on June 11, 1921, received a deed therefor. This action was commenced on January 15, 1923, and the complaint prays a judgment against the Homeland Company and Thomas A. Fisher in the sum of $700, being the amount which it is alleged that he paid for said land, and also a judgment against the defendant Cory, requiring him to make, execute, and deliver to the plaintiff a deed to said lot of land upon such terms as the court may deem just. The appealing defendant filed his answer to the complaint, and by a cross-complaint sought to quiet his title to the said lot 6 hereinbefore referred to. The said cross-complaint contains the usual allegations in an ordinary action to quiet title under the provisions of section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, and the plaintiff by his answer to said cross-complaint raises the issue of title to said described tract of land.

[1, 2] The trial court rendered its judgment quieting plaintiff's title to said land. It is contended by the appellant that the court should have sustained his demurrer to the complaint; that plaintiff's action is one against the Homeland Company and Thomas A. Fisher for damages for breach of contract and it appears from said complaint that this appellant was neither a party to the contract nor in privity therewith. We are of the opinion that this point was well taken and the demurrer should have been sustained, but it was overruled by the court. Appellant thereupon answered, and by appropriate allegations in his cross-complaint tendered the issue of title to the tract of land described in the complaint, and said issue, having been traversed by the plaintiff, the court was authorized to determine the question of title. Faxon v. All Persons, 166 Cal. 707, 137 P. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209, we believe is in point. That action was brought under what is commonly called the McEnerney Act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78) to determine adverse claims to real property. One of the defendants appeared therein and by answer put in issue the title to the property in dispute. Judgment going against him, he thereupon appealed and made the objection that, as the plaintiff had failed to bring himself within the provisions of the McEnerney Act, the court was without authority to treat the case as an ordinary action to quiet title. The Supreme Court held that, having appeared in the action and by appropriate allegations submitted his claim to the court, he could not complain. In the case at bar the appealing defendant, having tendered the issue of title, he cannot now complain that the court determined the issue thus presented by him.

[3] It is further contended that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by laches, but it appears from the uncontradicted record that plaintiff's action was commenced within a period of eighteen months after the appellant obtained his deed to said tract of land. We are therefore of the opinion that the action was not barred by laches.

[4] It is further claimed that material findings are not supported by the evidence. Finding 5, which is one of the findings under attack, reads as follows:

> "That on or about the 20th day of January, 1920, the attorneys for the plaintiff in said action to foreclose moved to dismiss said action as to the defendant Joseph Gunst, and said motion was granted, but said action was not dismissed as to the said lot No. 6 in block No. 8, though it was the intent of the parties to the foreclosure that said action should be dismissed both as to said Joseph Gunst and as to said lot 6 in block 8."

It is contended that there is no evidence that the parties to the foreclosure intended to dismiss said action both as to said Gunst and as to said lot. The only evidence in support of this finding is the testimony of Mr. Zimdars, a former director of the Homeland Company and now one of its trustees, as follows:

> "The Homeland Company is the owner of the property. At the time it made this contract with Mr. Gunst the property was mortgaged, the pro rata thereof on this lot was about $140. Then, about a year after this mortgage went on record, a contract was entered into with Mr. Gunst for the sale of this lot on installment payments. Long after that the Homeland Company made a conveyance of this lot to Thomas Fisher, including many other lots, and Mr. Gunst was thereafter directed to make payments to the bank, which he did. * * * Mr. Fisher collected the amounts that were payable on this contract from Mr. Gunst, and he made him a deed, but he did not release this mortgage, and a suit for foreclosure was brought, and in that Mr. Gunst was made a defendant, Mr. Fisher was made a defendant, and the Homeland Company was made a defendant, and I was one of the officers of the Homeland Company, and when I discovered that situation I went to the attorney who had charge of that matter and requested that this action be dismissed against Mr. Gunst, and that he be not included in the judgment, and my understanding was that there was enough property left to satisfy that mortgage. * * * The action was dismissed as to Mr. Gunst, but when it came to entering the decree of foreclosure the lot appeared in that decree, and it was sold in accordance with that decree. Now there has been no foreclosure of mortgage against Mr. Gunst, and the time for any action of that kind has long since passed by."

We are of the opinion that this uncontroverted evidence that the attorneys for plaintiff dismissed the action as to this plaintiff upon the request of a director of the Homeland Company was sufficient to support an inference that it was intended to dismiss the action not only as to this plaintiff, but also to dismiss as to the tract of land claimed by the plaintiff. The only possible reason that this plaintiff was a proper party to said action was for the purpose of foreclosing whatever interest he might have had in the lot claimed by him, as no personal judgment could have been rendered against him on the debt secured by the mortgage.

It is also claimed that the following findings are not sustained by the evidence: Finding 8 to the effect that respondent did not know at the time of the execution and delivery of the so-called Fisher deed that Fisher was not able to convey plaintiff a clear title to the land. Finding 9, to the effect that on or about March 1, 1922, the plaintiff herein learned that the recorded title to said lot of land stood in the name of appellant. Finding 13, to the effect that it was not true that plaintiff had knowledge of any of the matters clouding his title to said lot of land prior to March 1, 1922. We deem it unnecessary to consider the evidence bearing upon these findings, because, in view of finding 5 above set forth, these findings become immaterial, in that by said finding 5 the court found that it was intended to dismiss the foreclosure action as to said lot 6, and the further reason that we do not consider the doctrine of laches as applying to plaintiff's cause of action. Nor do we believe that the case of Burns v. Hiatt, 149 Cal. 617, 87 P. 196, 117 Am. St. Rep. 157, cited by appellant, applies to the case at bar. In the cited case it was held that, in an action to quiet title against a defendant who held a mortgage on the premises described in plaintiff's complaint, but which mortgage had been foreclosed without making the plaintiff in that action a party, the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree unless plaintiff paid the defendant's mortgage, but in the case at bar such a condition does not arise, as it was intended by all the parties to the foreclosure proceedings to dismiss that action as to this plaintiff.

It is further claimed by appellant that there is no finding of the trial court that respondent had any title or interest in the lot at the time this action was commenced, also that there is no finding as to whether respondent's answer to the cross-complaint was true or untrue. This contention is based upon the finding that none of the allegations of the answer or cross-complaint of appellant, "wherein they controvert any of the findings of fact in favor of plaintiff hereinbefore set forth, are true," but an examination of the findings made by the trial court shows that they are full and complete and respond to all of the material issues. This disposes of all the points presented by appellant for a reversal of the judgment.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 15, 1928.

Rehearing Denied March 16, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 12, 1928.

1. Fraud ⟹50—Bank purchasing notes from brokers whose circular describing notes was fraudulent must prove knowledge of circulars.

Bank purchasing notes could not recover from defendant brokers for false and fraudulent statement in its circulars regarding the notes, where bank did not prove that it was influenced by the circulars or representations therein, or that the circular had even been read by it or its officers.

2. Fraud ⟹50—One ignorant of facts and without means of information of which material representations had been made is presumed to rely thereon.

Where one, ignorant of real facts and having no ready means of information, enters into transaction as to subject-matter of which representations have been made which are material, the law presumes as matter of fact that he relied on them.

3. Fraud ⟹50—Proof that one has been defrauded does not support presumption he was misled by representations never made to him.

Proof that one has been defrauded does not support the presumption that he was misled by representations never made to him.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

4. Fraud ⚿20—Party complaining must be deceived by untrue statement, and cannot rely on statements not coming to his knowledge until transaction is consummated.

Party complaining of fraud must be deceived by the untrue statement, and there can be no reliance on statements which do not come to his knowledge until after he has consummated the transaction.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the Bank of St. Helena against the Lilienthal-Brayton Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for appellant.

Thomas, Beedy, Presley & Paramore, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Appeal from judgment in favor of defendants entered pursuant to a verdict of a jury, which verdict was directed by the court upon the theory that plaintiff had failed to present facts sufficient to sustain its cause of action. The action was one to recover damages resulting to plaintiff from and through the fraud of defendants, and a narrative of the facts may be here given.

The plaintiff is a banking corporation with its place of business at St. Helena, in Napa county, Cal. The defendants as partners are engaged in a general brokerage business, consisting in part in the underwriting and sale of bonds, notes, and other investment securities. During the month of January, 1921, the defendants offered for sale to the general public certain mortgage serial notes described as T. A. Tomasini notes. A circular descriptive of said notes was prepared and circulated throughout the state. The circular described the notes and the security behind them. Without detailing the representations of the circular it will suffice to say that the notes were represented as being abundantly secured, and held out as an unusually sound investment, approved and certified by the superintendent of banks as a legal investment for savings banks in California. For the purposes hereof it may be admitted that the contents of the circular were false and fraudulent, and designed to induce prospective investors to part with their funds in the purchase of the securities. The record herein discloses that on the 21st day of January, 1921, plaintiff banking corporation came into possession of one of the circulars through a firm of bond and security salesmen other than defendants. On the same day plaintiff bank, through its president and cashier, purchased Tomasini notes to the amount of $10,000. Thereafter the security failing to a great extent, the notes became correspondingly diminished in value, and the present action results, plaintiff claiming that it was induced to buy said securities by and through the willfully false representations of defendants.

[1] The answer of defendants put in issue all of the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint and a trial was had. The trial court directed a verdict for defendants on the ground the plaintiff had failed to prove that it had been at all influenced by the circular or any representation made by defendants, or that said circular had ever been read by plaintiff or any of its officers before the purchase of the securities. This is the one point involved here. The trial court held that there was no direct evidence showing that plaintiff or any of its officers had ever seen and read the circular before the purchase of the bonds in question.

Appellant here concedes, as indeed it must, that in the absence of knowledge of the contents of the circular on the part of plaintiff through acting officers no recovery can be had. We therefore examine the record for any evidence on this point which will indicate the fact of knowledge or any fact or facts from which a fair inference thereof may be drawn.

At the time of trial the president of the bank had died. However, there are no facts that would indicate that he had any knowledge of the transaction or the circular. The cashier of the bank had died before trial, but plaintiff had secured his deposition, and the same was used at the hearing below. It appears that the negotiations leading up to the purchase of the Tomasini notes by plaintiff were carried on by one Frank Pellet on behalf of the bank. All of the facts connected therewith were within his knowledge, and the fraud operating upon the corporation became effectual, if at all, through its influence upon Pellet the individual. On January 21 the bank received a letter from a firm of brokers, other than defendants, calling the attention of the bank to the Tomasini notes as a good investment, and stating in the letter that the circular was inclosed. No one seems to remember whether the circular was or was not in fact inclosed. As far as the direct testimony goes the cashier Pellet testified that he had no recollection of the circular accompanying the letter. The letter itself was commendatory of the Tomasini notes, and called attention to the fact that the issue had the approval of the state superintendent of banks as a legal investment for savings banks. In fact, this letter itself was stronger than the circular prepared by defendants. Upon receipt of this letter Pellet telephoned the brokers at San Francisco and, following the telephone communication, plaintiff bank placed its order for the purchase of the bonds. There is not a single word of evidence that Pellet or any one else connected with plaintiff bank ever read the circular. The testimony of Pellet is to this effect: "I do not recall the circumstances at all, only as the letters show." The whole claim of appellant is based upon the fact that the order for the notes was placed on January 21, 1921, and that the circular was received in the bank on that date. There is nothing to show whether the circular and the letter referred to came together, or whether the circular came first or the letter. Further, there is not one word of evidence to indicate that the purchase of the bonds was made after the receipt of the circular. Appellant rests on the bare record, and then builds up its case by inference. It is contended that we must presume from the fact that the circular bears a receipt stamp indicating its receipt by the bank on January 21, 1921, that receipt by the bank was as of that date. We accept that. Then appellant argues that we must infer that the circular came at a time prior to the purchase, and that the circular was read by some officer of the bank, who acted thereafter on the information in the circular contained. The strain of inference exhausts itself in the face of the testimony of the cashier, the one human agency involved in the purchase, to the effect that he does not recall anything about the circular. It is passing strange that one can be induced to part with his money by fraudulent representations of another without knowing that it was these representations that induced him. Pellet, the cashier, was a man who had been in the banking business for many years, and a man familiar with investments and banking. If he had read the circular he certainly would have known it; and the fact that he would not testify that he had showed clearly that he was not of the impression that his act of purchase was in anywise affected by the circular statements. As hereinbefore set forth, the only direct fact we have in the record is that a copy of this circular was in possession of the bank on the same date that it purchased the notes. From that fact we are called upon to presume or infer the remaining facts necessary to plaintiff's recovery. If we could infer that the circular was received before the purchase, and then infer further that the circular was read before the purchase, we would be beyond the main difficulties, and the foundation would be sufficient to conclude a reliance upon the statements in the circular contained. The stress of appellant's argument is that proof of the representations permits the inference that reliance was placed thereon. We can agree with appellant to this extent.

[2] Where a person ignorant of the real facts and having no ready means of information enters into a transaction as to the subject matter of which representations have been made which are material, the law will presume as a matter of fact that he relied upon them. 27 C. J. p. 49, § 179. Section 206, same volume, Corpus Juris, says:

> "While plaintiff must show that the false representations set out induced him to act to his prejudice, the fact of reliance may be inferred from other facts proved. It does not require strong proof to establish that a person complaining of fraud was influenced by the false representations."

[3] This general doctrine is upheld by our Supreme Court in the case of Hunter v. McKenzie, 197 Cal. 185, 239 P. 1090. But by no stretch of the authorities or the language employed can it be said that the presumption works backwards. It cannot be held, or even seriously argued, that proof that one has been defrauded supports the presumption that he was misled by representations never made to him. In Nash v. Rosesteel, 7 Cal. App. 504, 94 P. 850, it is said:

> "Plaintiff * * * had never seen the inventory, nor was he informed of what it purported to contain. Hence, admitting the truth of his contention [that a false inventory was prepared], he could not have been misled or deceived by such document."

[4] The party complaining must be deceived by the untrue statement; otherwise, there can be no reliance. And there can be no reliance on statements which do not come to the knowledge of a contracting party until after he has consummated the transaction. 12 Cal. Jur. 751.

In the case of Ward v. Richmond, 193 App. Div. 727, 184 N. Y. S. 508, the court says:

> "Plaintiff testified that he saw these prospectuses, and that some were laid upon his desk, but he never discussed them with" defendants. "He further testified that he relied upon the representations contained therein. * * * But he nowhere testifies that he saw, read, or received the prospectus before he bought the stock from defendants. * * * As the representations claimed to have been relied on, and proven to be false, were contained in the printed prospectus, it would be well upon a new trial to establish the fact as to when plaintiff actually read the prospectus, whether before or after he parted with his money for the stock."

In 26 Corpus Juris, at page 1140, it is said:

> "Obviously there can be no recovery where it was impossible for complainant to have relied on the representations, because they had not been made or communicated to him at the time of the transaction."

The entire case presented here may be thus illustrated: A purchases stock or bonds in a corporation. After purchase he discovers that he has been defrauded. He then goes to B and says:

"I purchased stock in the Hope More Company. On the day I purchased the stock I received a circular issued by you with the idea of inducing people to buy the stock. This circular of yours contained statements knowingly and willfully false and intended to mislead people to their disadvantage and to your gain. I do not know if I ever read the circular before I bought the stock and cannot say that I did. Nevertheless, I have a cause of action against you for the loss to me by reason of my purchase of the stock, based on these representations."

From the authorities hereinbefore cited and as a matter of law too plain for further discussion it is apparent that A could not recover. Plaintiff here is similarly situated.

Judgment affirmed.

STEVENS v. PRIVETT et al. (Civ. 5980.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 30, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Trial court's findings may not be disturbed where sustained by abundance of evidence.

Findings of trial court may not be disturbed by Court of Appeal where they are sustained by abundance of evidence.

2. Patents 🔑215—Whether contract involved patent rights held immaterial in action to rescind contract where court had jurisdiction.

Whether contract involved rights under patents held immaterial in action to rescind such contract, where trial court had jurisdiction of issues presented by pleadings.

3. Patents 🔑213—That licensee under patent obtains only immunity from suit held immaterial in action to rescind contract purchasing license on ground of fraudulent representations.

Fact that licensee under patent obtains only immunity from suit held immaterial, in action to rescind contract purchasing license rights under patents on ground that sellers made fraudulent representation that they could sell such rights, whereas in fact they could not, action thus being based on theory that buyer never became licensee or other party to patent.

4. Patents 🔑213—Buyer of license rights under patents seeking to rescind on ground that sellers fraudulently represented that they could sell such rights can dispute sellers' title.

Buyer of exclusive sales rights under patents seeking to rescind purchase contract on ground that sellers made fraudulent representation that they could sell such rights, whereas in fact they could not, can dispute sellers' title.

5. Patents 🔑213—Buyer of license rights under patents might rescind for fraudulent representation of sellers that they could sell such rights, regardless of recognition of buyer as licensee by owner of patent.

Buyer of exclusive sales rights under patents had right to rescind purchase contract on ground that sellers made fraudulent representation that they could sell such rights, whereas in fact they could not regardless of fact that buyer was recognized as licensee by owner of patent.

6. Patents 🔑213—Buyer of license under patents might rescind because of sellers' fraudulent representation, regardless of financial difficulties and treatment of buyer by owner of patent.

Buyer of exclusive sales rights under patents had right to rescind purchase contract because of fraudulent representation of sellers that they could sell such rights, whereas in fact they could not, regardless of financial difficulties and treatment of buyer by owner of patent.

7. Patents 🔑213—Motive of buyer of license under patents in rescinding may not be inquired into where he relies on legal reason.

Motive of buyer of exclusive sales rights under patents in seeking to rescind purchase contract may not be inquired into when he has legal reason for rescinding and relies thereon.

8. Patents 🔑213—Buyer of license under patents, showing that because of false representations of sellers he made certain payments to them for which he got nothing, showed injury sufficiently for rescission.

Buyer of exclusive sales rights under patents, showing that because of false representations of sellers that they could sell such rights he made certain payments to them for which he got nothing, showed injury to amount of these payments sufficiently to warrant rescission.

Excluding written instruments having slight significance, if any, held not ground for reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action for rescission of contract on ground of fraud, brought by D. A. Stevens against C. R. Privett and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles (Timon E. Owens, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of rescission of a contract on the ground of fraud. By the terms of the agreement respondent was granted exclusive sales rights of a certain patented automobile inner tube called the "Boggs compression inner tube," within the entire territory of Idaho, as will more specifically appear.

The U. S. Compression Inner Tube Company, a corporation, of Tulsa, Okl., was the owner and manufacturer of the "Boggs compression inner tubes" which were protected by two patents issued by the government in 1917. The right to sell said tubes within certain states was conditionally granted by said owner to appellants October 9, 1919. In consideration of the sum of $13,845, the appellants granted to respondent, by a written agreement dated February 16, 1921, the absolute exclusive right to sell said tubes within the county of San Diego, state of California. The purchase price consisted of respondent's promissory note in the sum of $8,845 and a cash payment in the sum of $5,000. Of the cash payment $500 was subsequently refunded upon a modification of the contract. On July 20, 1921, the contract was so changed that instead of the county of San Diego the state of Idaho was designated as the territory. A new written instrument was executed as to the new territory and the written instrument as to San Diego was canceled. The contract was for the unexpired term of said patents which continued for some thirteen years from that date. After February 16, 1921, respondent entered the state of Idaho and commenced to make sales and for a period of about one year proceeded to sell tubes in the state of Idaho, purchasing them at the contract price from the U. S. Compression Inner Tube Company at Tulsa, Okl.

The complaint alleged, and the trial court found, that respondent contracted for the exclusive right to sell said tubes in the territory of Idaho for the unexpired term of said patent, in consideration of the sum of $13,845, which was paid to appellants as above stated, relying solely upon the representations by appellants that they were the owners and possessed of an absolute right to sell said Boggs compression inner tubes within the territory of Idaho and elsewhere; that appellants falsely represented to respondent that they had secured such exclusive right by contract from the owner of said patents, and that said agreement was in full force and validity, while in truth and in fact appellants held no such property right, and had no authority to sell such territorial privilege for the reason that appellants' contract with the owner of said patents, so far as it related to the territory of Idaho, was specifically conditioned upon the construction and operation of an inner tube factory which was to be built at Burbank, Cal., at an estimated cost of $100,000, which factory was in fact never completed nor operated, and that appellants' right to sell said tubes in, or dispose of territory in, the state of Idaho was inoperative and had never vested.

The eighth paragraph of the agreement between the appellants and the owner of the patents, and which is dated October 9, 1919, provided as follows:

"Eighth. It is agreed and understood that this contract does not take effect until said factory in California or some of the other states mentioned herein shall have been erected, and party of the first part has commenced manufacturing tubes and is able and ready to supply party of the second part with all the tubes required by him to supply said territory, and until said time, a contract heretofore entered into by the U. S. Compression Inner Tube Company and C. R. Privett, covering the state of California and dated March 27, 1919, remains in full force and effect, but after such factory is completed and party of the first part is able and ready to supply party of the second part with a sufficient number of tubes to supply said territory, then this contract shall become operative and binding and shall in all particulars supersede the said contract dated March 27, 1919, and party of the first part agrees to furnish party of the second part a sufficient number of tubes to supply the demands of the trade in all of the above-named number of states. Second party has first call on all tubes made by the factory to be established under this contract to supply his territory."

The contract mentioned in paragraph 8 and dated March 27, 1919, was not offered in evidence, is not in the record, and we are wholly uniformed as to the provisions thereof.

It was further found that at the time of the execution of said agreement between the appellants and respondent, the latter was unaware of the existence of the conditional provision contained in the eighth paragraph of the contract between the appellants and the owner, or that the appellants then had no power or authority to enter into a contract granting to respondent the exclusive right to make sales in the state of Idaho; that respondent was persuaded to part with the purchase price for said territory by said false representations; that on July 25, 1922, for the first time respondent learned that the appellants had no authority to grant him the said right, and thereafter he served a written notice of rescission upon appellants offering to restore to them everything of value received by him pursuant to contract and that the offer was rejected. The trial court also found that the owner of said patents never ratified appellants' contract with respondent and never waived the conditional terms contained in the above-quoted paragraph 8 of the contract between the owner and the appellants. The trial court entered judgment against the appellants for $4,500, rescinded the contract between respondent and appellants, and canceled respondent's promissory note for the sum of $8,845.

Appellants contend that: (1) The contract involves rights under United States letters patent; (2) licensee under patent obtains only immunity from suit; (3) respondent received all that his contract called for; (4) respondent cannot dispute appellants' title; (5) respondent made no offer to compensate appellants for use of right in Idaho; (6) no offer to restore San Diego contract; (7) respondent did not offer to, nor did he return all or any of the benefits which he received under the contract sought to be rescinded, nor did he offer to restore appellants to the position in which they were prior to July 20, 1921; (8) respondent was recognized by the owners of the patent as the licensee in the state of Idaho; (9) financial difficulties and treatment of respondent by owner of patent no justification for rescission; (10) no misrepresentations of act made by appellants to respondent; (11) respondent was not injured; (12) errors in not admitting evidence.

[1] Of the attacks above mentioned those numbered 3, 5, 6, 7, and 10 are each and all attacks on the findings. Appellants do not complain that the findings are outside of the issues, nor that any issues are not found upon. The burden of their complaint is that the findings attacked should have been made in their favor. In this behalf it is sufficient to state that there was an abundance of evidence to sustain each finding and that this court, under these circumstances, is not at liberty to disturb the findings as made.

[2] Assuming that the contract involves rights under United States letters patent, we do not understand appellants to claim that the issues presented by the pleadings in the case before us were issues of which the trial court did not have jurisdiction. Therefore we need not further discuss the point.

[3] That a licensee under a patent obtains only immunity from suit is not involved in the case before us because we are here concerned solely with the rights of one who claims that, by reason of fraud, he never became a licensee or other party to the patent.

[4] The contention that the respondent cannot dispute appellants' title is based on what is said in Garvey v. Lashells, 151 Cal. 526, 531, 91 P. 498; Bell & Howell Co. v. Bliss (C. C. A.) 262 F. 131, 133; In re Michigan Motor Specialties Co. (D. C.) 288 F. 377, 379. The authorities are not applicable to the facts of this case. Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011, and Kahn v. Revett, 39 Cal. App. 312, 178 P. 733, are applicable to the facts of this case. They rule the point against the appellants.

[5] The fact that the respondent was recognized by the owners of the patent as the licensee in the state of Idaho did not constitute a defense. Under his contract the respondent attempted to purchase from appellants (1) the exclusive right to sell tubes in the state of Idaho through his own efforts or through his salesmen or both, and (2) the right to sell subportions or divided portions of said territory within the bounds of the state of Idaho. Conceding that the U. S. Compression Inner Tube Company took cognizance of the sales of tubes in the state of Idaho, that fact is of little importance in determining whether the appellants did or did not attempt to perpetrate a fraudulent act. The importance of the fact arose on a consideration of the defense of ratification and the defense of waiver and no doubt the trial court at that time gave the evidence introduced by appellants due consideration. Nevertheless, the trial court found the ultimate fact against the appellants.

[6, 7] The appellants contend that the financial difficulties and treatment of respondent by the owner of the patent was no justification for a rescission. We do not understand that the respondent claims to the contrary. All of those facts were brought into the record by the appellants. Conceding that they did not constitute, either in whole or in part, a justification for respondent's rescission, it must at the same time be granted that the same facts do not constitute a defense in behalf of appellants. As a part of this point the appellants claim that the reason the respondent attempted to rescind was because of the fact that it had transpired that the respondent had made a bad bargain, and not because of the alleged fraud of the appellants. The motive of the respondent in rescinding may not be inquired into when he has a legal reason for rescinding and relies thereon. De Bairos v. Barlin, 46 Cal. App. 665, 672, 190 P. 188.

[8] The contention that the respondent was not injured may not be sustained. Under that point the appellants state that after the purported contract had been signed the respondent went into the state of Idaho and attempted to build up a business; that he made sales; and that the U. S. Compression Inner Tube Company filled all of his orders. They then argue respondent was not injured. This argument amounts to this:

> The seller says to the buyer: "Yes, I took your $13,345 as the purchase price of the right to sell the tire in Idaho for thirteen years expiring in 1930; I have no such right to sell, but up to the present time you have been permitted to sell without such right because the real owner of that right has thus far found it to his interest not to interfere with your selling. What I sold you is therefore useless and worthless. You don't need it, and anyway I haven't got it to sell, so I will keep your $13,345, but you are not damaged."

When plaintiff pleaded and proved and the trial court found that because of the false representations of the appellants he had made certain payments to them and for which he got nothing, he showed injury to the amount of those payments. Wainscott v. Occidental, etc., Ass'n, 98 Cal. 253, 257, 33

P. 88; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 389, 92 P. 1011; Orton v. Privett (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 713. In an action as for rescission the law did not require that he should go further. In Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, at p. 219, 190 P. 808, 813, the court said:

> "First, as to rescission: It is clear from the authorities we have cited that the exact amount of damage need not be shown, provided it be in an 'appreciable' sum. Where the action is for damages, however, the plaintiff must allege and prove that by reason of the fraud he has suffered damage in a definite amount."

[9] Finally, the appellants claim that the trail court erred in not admitting certain evidence. The evidence not admitted consisted of written instruments. Those instruments were identified and are contained in the bill of exceptions. A reading of them discloses that they are of slight, if any, significance. They do not even purport to throw any light whatever on the proposition that the appellants had no authority to sell to respondent territorial rights in the state of Idaho, or to authorize respondent, in turn, to sell subdivisions of such territorial rights.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

ESSIG v. SEAMAN. (Civ. 4994.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 17, 1928.

1. Judgment ⚷139—Court cannot ignore statutory law in exercising discretion in permitting default judgment to be vacated.

In the exercise of its discretion in permitting a default judgment to be vacated, court cannot ignore a statutory law or hold any of its provisions meaningless.

2. Judgment ⚷139—Court's discretion to set aside default is not to be exercised ex gratia.

Trial court's discretion to set aside default judgment is not to be exercised ex gratia.

3. Judgment ⚷143(3)—Defendant held guilty of inexcusable neglect in permitting default judgment, where he knew suit was pending, time in which plea was required, and his attorney appeared to dissolve attachment on last day of filing period.

Defendant held not entitled to have default judgment set aside, where his inexcusable neglect was shown from the fact that he knew suit was pending, that he was required to plead within 10 days of service, that he would be in default if he did not plead within time, and where his attorney was in court presenting a motion to dissolve an attachment in the suit on the last day of the period in which he was permitted to plead.

4. Appeal and error ⚷957(1)—Appellate court should not interfere with superior court's order setting aside default judgment, except where abuse of discretion appears.

The rule is well established that the appellate court should not interfere with the order of the superior court in cases relative to setting aside default judgments, except where it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion.

Houser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Guy R. Crump, Judge.

Action by Fred G. Essig against Percy Seaman. Judgment for plaintiff by default. On defendant's motion, default was vacated, and judgment set aside. From such order, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Tobias R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. A. Ramey, of Glendale, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order of the superior court granting a motion made by defendant and respondent to vacate a default entered against him and setting aside a judgment rendered on such default.

The action was commenced September 11, 1924. Summons was issued thereon and served on defendant on September 25, 1924. On October 7, 1924, the defendant not having answered or appeared except to move to dissolve the attachment, defendant's default was duly entered, and, as the action was for liquidated damages, judgment was duly entered in favor of plaintiff and appellant for the amount prayed for in his complaint. Defendant, on October 14, 1924, served and filed a notice of motion to vacate such default and set aside said judgment and filed therewith affidavits and a verified answer which he asked permission to file. Plaintiff filed affidavits in reply, and defendant filed another affidavit in reply to plaintiff's affidavits. After hearing on said motion the court granted the same and vacated said default and set aside said judgment and recalled an execution which had theretofore been issued thereon.

The showing upon which the court granted said motion was that the defendant, after service of the summons and complaint, "at once" mailed the same to his attorney by special delivery, and his attorney had been instructed "to do whatever might be necessary to protect his interests," and did not further communicate with his attorney until after default had been entered; that the attorney received the summons and complaint from defendant by mail on the 27th of September, 1924; that about the 30th of September, 1924, said attorney called at the defendant's "former employers," and made inquiries as to the whereabouts of the defendant in an effort to have defendant verify the answer which he had prepared; that he again called at the same place and made inquiries of "former fellow employees of the former employer, but was unable to get any information"; that he had instructed defendant to be present in court on October 6, 1924, when a motion was to be heard to dissolve the attachment that had been issued and levied in said action, "but the said defendant was not present"; that he located him at a hotel in October 7th.

Defendant had verified an affidavit which was used on the hearing of the last-mentioned motion on October 6th, which motion was argued in his absence one day before the default was entered. His affidavit showed that he had knowledge of the filing of the complaint and its contents before the service of the summons and complaint. He was evidently intending to avoid making a general appearance in the case, yet he asked the court to find that the indebtedness was secured by a mechanic's lien. With his motion to set aside the default and judgment, defendant filed two affidavits of merits, one by himself and the other by his attorney. The affidavit made by defendant is deficient, in that it does not show that the opinion of his attorney was founded on a statement to him of the facts of the case, and the affidavit of the attorney is deficient, in that his belief that defendant has a good and meritorious defense to plaintiff's complaint does not appear to be founded upon a knowledge of the facts of the case. As to the answer filed with the motion, it is defective, in that the plaintiff alleges in his verified complaint specific facts which are first met with a denial of the indebtedness which was a legal conclusion only, and then follows a statement of facts that prior to said ——— day of August, 1924, defendant was indebted to plaintiff, "the exact amount he is unable to state," and that on that day he was the owner of an automobile incumbered for "about $800," and plaintiff accepted the automobile subject to the incumbrance in full payment, settlement, and satisfaction of the whole of the indebtedness of the defendant to plaintiff.

Counter affidavits were filed by plaintiff, denying specifically the allegations of said answer, but it was for the trial court to find what the facts were. In a statement of plaintiff in his affidavit, not denied, he said:

> "On October 2, 1924, said truck was taken from the possession of affiant in the claim and delivery action No. 153741 in this court."

[1, 2] In his motion to release the attachment, which is a part of the transcript on appeal, defendant filed an affidavit in which he stated that he was the owner of the truck on August 12, 1924, and that it was worth $2,000, and that it had not diminished in value, and that it was in plaintiff's possession and held by him on his claim of lien. This affidavit was verified by defendant on the 23d day of September, 1924, and filed on the 2d day of October, 1924. No mention was made in this affidavit about his having sold the truck to the plaintiff. An affidavit made by George E. Bittinger, not denied, states that the automobile was the property of the Mortgage Discount Company, which company had entered into a contract with defendant to sell it to him, and that there was due on this contract of sale about $851, exclusive of interest. In defendant's affidavit in reply to plaintiff's affidavit, he says plaintiff knew that the Mortgage Discount Company was the legal owner of the automobile. Without reviewing all the affidavits, it appears that the defendant does not claim that there was any mistake either of fact or law, or inadvertence or surprise. The question, therefore, for the superior court to decide, was whether the default was taken against the defendant through his excusable neglect, and whether, if there was excusable neglect, there was such a showing of merits as justified the court in exercising its discretion in granting defendant's motion. Although appellate courts have been loath to reverse the action of the trial courts in their exercise of discretion in such matters, there must be some restraint upon a too liberal exercise of that jurisdiction. In the exercise of its discretion a court cannot ignore a statutory law or hold any of its provisions meaningless. Unbridled discretion is dangerous. The exercise of discretion by optimists is very likely to be different from the exercise of discretion by pessimists. "It is different in different men, and in the same man it is not always the same." It is not to be exercised ex gratia. Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 423.

[3] The showing in this case establishes inexcusable neglect. The defendant knew the suit was pending and what allegations of the complaint he would have to meet even before the summons and complaint were served on him. He knew that he was required to plead within ten days of the time of service. His attorney knew that the 6th of October was at least his last day to answer the complaint, and that he would be in default if he did not plead by that time, and on that day he was in court presenting a motion to dissolve an attachment therein. He knew, or should have known, that, if he did not want to verify the complaint as defendant's attorney, he could have obtained an extension of time to plead, and, knowing these facts, he did not ask for an extension of time to plead, and permitted the defendant to default.

[4] We are aware that the Supreme Court has held to a liberal policy in sustaining the granting or refusing to grant an order relieving a party from default. The rule is well established that the appellate court should not interfere with the order of the superior court in such cases, except where it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion. Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 P. 165; Alferitz v. Cahen, 145 Cal. 397, 78 P.

878; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 309, 61 P. 932; Waite v. Southern Pacific Co., 192 Cal. 467, 221 P. 204. In the last-cited case it was held that the defendant's counsel was acting under a mistake of law and for that reason the default should have been set aside; in other words, that there was an abuse of discretion by the trial court in refusing to set aside the default. The case most nearly in point in consideration of this appeal is that of Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 423. In that case an order setting aside a default was reversed, and the counter affidavits, undisputed, were considered. In that case the Supreme Court, speaking through Justice Sanderson, said:

> "The relief sought is asked solely on the score of excusable neglect; and upon that subject all that is said is in substance that on account of the complicated condition of the defendant's title, and from the fact that the complaint was verified, more time was required to prepare the answer than is required in ordinary cases, and that during a portion of the time allowed for answering, the attorney employed to conduct the defense was compelled to be absent from town. But so far as all this tends to establish a legal excuse, it is completely and conclusively answered by the fact that no reason is given why, if more time was required, either on account of the complications suggested, or on account of the necessary absence of counsel, an application to opposite counsel, or if denied by him, to the court, for an extension of time was not made."

And in the case at bar it could have been said as the court said in that case:

> "There is no pretense that an opportunity to make the application was, from any cause, not afforded."

The contradictory position taken by the defendant in his affidavit to release the attachment and in his answer which he asked permission to file on his motion to vacate the default and in his affidavit made on October 18, 1924, made in reply to plaintiff's affidavit, should not have appealed to the trial court in its exercise of its discretion. In his affidavit which defendant verified on September 23, 1924, he alleged that he was the owner of the automobile in question, and that plaintiff's claim against him was secured by a lien thereon. In the answer he alleged that he had sold and transferred the automobile to plaintiff and plaintiff had taken it in full satisfaction of his indebtedness to plaintiff in August, 1924, and in his last affidavit he alleged that he was led to believe and did believe that plaintiff was holding the same for the full sum of his indebtedness to plaintiff. Those statements cannot all be true. If his statement in his first affidavit that he was the owner of the automobile on September 23, 1924, when the affidavit was made and when he presented it to the court on the 6th day of October, 1924, and that his indebtedness to plaintiff was secured by a lien thereon, was true, it cannot be true, as stated in his answer, that his indebtedness to plaintiff had been settled and discharged prior to the commencement of the action. How can allegations in his answer be reconciled with his statement in his last affidavit that he believed the plaintiff was holding the automobile for the full amount of his indebtedness to plaintiff?

Defendant's inexcusable neglect in failing to plead to plaintiff's complaint under the circumstances did not entitle him to the exercise of the court's discretion in his behalf, and the order of the court vacating the default and setting aside the judgment was an abuse of the court's discretion.

It is therefore ordered that the order vacating the default and setting aside the judgment be and the same is hereby reversed.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

HOUSER, J. I dissent. I cannot agree to what is inferentially expressed in the prevailing opinion regarding either the necessity for an affidavit of merits, as such, or the effect of the answer of defendant in that connection. Although attention is not directed to any statute which by its terms requires that on a motion to vacate a judgment taken by default an affidavit of merits is necessary, the practice seems to be well settled that either an affidavit of merits or its equivalent be on file at the time the hearing on the motion is had.

In the case of Sampanes v. Chazes, 54 Cal. App. 612, 202 P. 462, it is held that, on a motion for an order setting aside a default judgment, a sworn answer positively denying the material allegations of the complaint is a sufficient affidavit of merits. To the same effect is Fulweiler v. Hog's Back Consolidated Mining Co., 83 Cal. 126, 23 P. 65. Montijo v. Sherer & Co., 5 Cal. App. 736, 739, 91 P. 261, 262, was similar to the instant case in its facts with reference to defects appearing in the affidavit of merits, as well as in the circumstance that an answer was filed with a motion to vacate the judgment. The court said:

> "Neither of the affidavits filed contains a showing that alone would be sufficient as an affidavit of merits, but the verified answer denies every material allegation of the complaint. This has been held sufficient too often by the Supreme Court to be considered an open question—citing authorities."

In Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 474, 150 P. 353, 354, it is said:

> "The further objection that there was no affidavit of merits is met by the consideration that a verified answer setting forth a defense to the cause of action alleged in the complaint was actually on file at the time the notice was served. That such verified answer meets all the requirements of an affidavit of merits is, of course, well settled—citing authorities."

See, also, Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 137 P. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308, 61 P. 932; Merchants' Ad-Sign

Co. v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 128 Cal. 619, 61 P. 277; Brasher v. White, 53 Cal. App. 545, 200 P. 657; Reidy v. Scott, 53 Cal. 69—the last-cited case in effect holding that an answer may be used in aid of defective averments contained in an affidavit of merits.

In the prevailing opinion herein that part of the answer of defendant wherein he denies the indebtedness on which the action was brought is criticized for the reason that such denial "was a legal conclusion only." If it be conceded that the denial of defendant in his answer that "he is indebted to the plaintiff" constitutes but a conclusion of law, nevertheless the language used in such denial substantially follows in part the allegation found in the complaint, to wit: That "defendant became and is indebted to said plaintiff * * * for goods * * * sold and delivered." It has been held that an allegation that a specified sum "is now due and owing," although constituting a conclusion of law, is sufficient to support a judgment. Penrose v. Winter, 135 Cal. 289, 67 P. 772, overruling Ryan v. Holliday, 110 Cal. 337, 42 P. 891. See, also, Frisch v. Caler, 21 Cal. 71.

However, the rule as announced in 31 Cyc. p. 52, is that, while in some cases a pleading which is made up partly of conclusions of law, instead of averments of facts, is not fatally defective, the more general rule is to the contrary, citing authorities. But in that regard, whatever may be the correct principle of pleading, it is clear that, when the language contained in the answer follows that of the complaint, the plaintiff cannot be heard to complain that his allegation (whatever its effect) remains unanswered. As is stated in volume 1, p. 257, of Sutherland on Code Pleading:

> "Where the allegation of the complaint is couched in the form of a conclusion of law a denial in the same form will be permissible and is efficient for all purposes."

It will further be noted that in the prevailing opinion herein the invalidity of the answer is also suggested because allegations in parts of the answer were inconsistent with certain statements appearing in affidavits theretofore filed by defendant. An examination of the clerk's transcript on the appeal discloses the fact that the inconsistencies to which attention is directed occur in an affidavit or affidavits made by defendant, not in his motion for an order to vacate the judgment, but in an entirely separate and independent proceeding in the action, to wit, a motion to dissolve an attachment therein. It would therefore seem that, conceding the fact that such inconsistencies existed, they had no place, as such, in a proper determination of the sufficiency of an affidavit of merits. But even had the inconsistencies to which reference is had appeared in the answer itself, it is well settled that inconsistent defenses may be pleaded, and that when that course is pursued, neither of such defenses may be used as an admission to destroy the other. 21 Cal. Jur. p. 134; 31 Cyc. pp. 147, 211. It has been ruled in several cases that the fact that a pleading contains inconsistent counts or defenses, as, for example, where an answer in one part admits that which is denied in another, furnishes no ground for a judgment on the pleadings.

The syllabus in Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 332, 7 P. 753, is as follows:

> "A judgment on the pleadings is not authorized if the answer deny the material allegations of the complaint, although in a special defense separately stated the allegations formerly denied are admitted."

To the same effect are Amador County v. Butterfield, 51 Cal. 526; Cass v. Rochester, 174 Cal. 358, 163 P. 212; Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 39. See, also, Martin v. Porter, 84 Cal. 476, 24 P. 109; Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 P. 935; Snipsic v. Smith, 7 Cal. App. 150, 93 P. 1035.

It therefore becomes apparent that to all intents and purposes the answer of defendant herein was a sufficient compliance not only with the express requirements of the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure requiring the filing of an answer with the motion to vacate a judgment, but that as well, according to the established practice, the answer met the judicial requirement that an affidavit of merits or its equivalent be filed either at the time the motion was noticed for hearing, or at least be on file at the time when the motion was actually made.

The remainder of the instant appeal depends upon what force is to be accorded the decision of the trial judge in his ruling on the motion to vacate the judgment. It is universally conceded that the determination of a matter of the character of that before the trial court rests within the sound discretion of the trial judge. It is likewise clear that only where such discretion has been grossly abused will the conclusion reached by the trial court be disturbed by an appellate court—from which it follows that merely because from the facts in the case the justices of the appellate court would have reached a conclusion different from that reached by the trial court affords no reason for reversing the judgment.

In order that the appellate court be justified in directing a reversal of the order made by the trial court, it is necessary that no substantial foundation exist either in fact or in law for the conclusion and consequent judgment which is under attack. The facts upon which the trial court herein apparently acted were that, in the steps preliminary to a consideration by the court of the motion to vacate the judgment, as a matter of law the requirements of the statute and the accepted practice were fully met by the defendant; that the defendant personally had no actual knowledge of the necessary procedure, but had intrusted the entire matter of his defense to an attorney at law; that as shown by the affidavit of such attorney, several days preceding the last day on which the answer of defendant could be filed within the time allowed by statute, the answer of defendant had been prepared; that within such time and on two separate occasions for the purpose of having defendant verify the answer, the attorney had personally called at the place of defendant's former employers and there made inquiry of such employers, as well as of former fellow employees of defendant, as to the whereabouts of defendant, but was unable to obtain any information with reference thereto; that within such time the attorney had instructed defendant to be present in court at the hearing on the motion to dissolve the attachment levied in the action, but that defendant was not present; that on the day following the attorney located defendant in a hotel where he was rooming, but at that time the default of defendant for failure to answer the complaint had been taken.

The following language occurs in the course of the opinion in Downing v. Klondike M. & M. Co., 165 Cal. 786, 788, 134 P. 970, 971:

> "* * * Where the court has opened a default and placed the cause in a condition for trial on the merits, an appellate tribunal is slow to interfere with the discretion therein exercised, even when the showing made in support of the motion is not of the strongest character [citing authorities]. * * *"

The record herein shows that the default of defendant for failure to answer the complaint was taken on the very first available day, and that the motion to vacate the judgment was filed within one week following the date when the judgment was rendered.

Having application to a situation such as is here presented, it is said in Berri v. Rogero, 168 Cal. 736, 740, 145 P. 95, 97:

> "* * * The law does not favor snap judgments. The policy of the law is to have every litigated case tried upon its merits, and it looks with disfavor upon a party who, regardless of the merits of his case, attempts to take advantage of the mistake, surprise, inadvertence, or neglect of his adversary. Where a party in default makes seasonable application to be relieved therefrom, and files an affidavit of merits alleging a good defense, and the plaintiff files no counter affidavit and makes no showing that he has suffered any prejudice or that injustice will result from the trial of the case upon its merits, very slight evidence will be required to justify a court in setting aside the default. * * *"

And the same thought is repeated in part in the case of County of Los Angeles v. Lewis, 179 Cal. 398, 401, 177 P. 154, 155, as follows:

> "* * * It is only in a very plain case of abuse of discretion that this court will disturb the action of the trial court in a matter of this character, especially where the relief is granted and the application therefor is made as promptly as it was in this case."

In such a state of facts, and considering the law applicable thereto, I am unable to concur with my associates in their conclusion that the defendant was guilty of "inexcusable neglect," and that "the order of the court vacating the default and setting aside the judgment was an abuse of the court's discretion."

HILLWIG v. BOYER et al. (Civ. 3399.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 17, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Trial court's failure to find upon material issue is reversible error.

Failure on part of trial court to find upon material issue is reversible error.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Judgment should not be disturbed for failure of trial court to find upon particular issue, if not affected thereby.

Where no substantial right of appellant is prejudiced by failure of trial court to find upon some particular issue or when judgment would not be affected thereby, its omission is harmless, and under such circumstances judgment will not be disturbed.

3. Trusts 🔑372(3)—Evidence held insufficient to upset finding of trial court that trustee's grantee was unaware of trust, in action to recover proceeds from sale of realty.

In action against trustee and his grantee to recover proceeds of sale of real property, where property had been deeded as security for indebtedness, evidence held insufficient to upset findings of court that trustee's grantee was unaware of trust relationship.

4. Trusts 🔑372(3)—Evidence held to sustain judgment in favor of trustee's grantees claimed to have conspired with trustee in action for proceeds from sale of land held in trust.

In action to recover proceeds from sale of real property which trustee had sold, evidence held sufficient to sustain judgment in favor of trustee's grantees on ground that they were in no way implicated in fraud or conspiracy with relation to property.

5. Trusts 🔑357(2)—Bona fide purchaser from trustee without notice is not liable to owner for breach of trust.

Bona fide purchaser of property from trustee without notice is not liable to owner for breach of trust.

6. Trusts 🔑189—Trustee selling property in exercise of best judgment, after reasonable effort to procure purchaser, held not liable for more than price for which property sold.

In action to recover proceeds from sale of real property, where trustee in exercise of best judgment and with reasonable effort to procure purchaser succeeded in obtaining slight excess over amount of mortgage lien, held he was not liable for more than price for which property was sold.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1043(7)—Refusal to continue until appeal from other judgment was determined was harmless, in action for proceeds from sale of realty, where defendant held no property for plaintiff in excess of such other judgment.

Where defendant sold land held to secure indebtedness, and owner brought action to recover proceeds of sale, and another action was pending to determine whether property was held in trust or not, and motion for continuance until the other judgment became final by determination on appeal was refused, held refusal was harmless, since defendant trustee received only money with which he was charged in such other judgment and held no other money or property belonging to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by George N. Hillwig against J. F. Boyer and others to recover balance of proceeds of sale of real property. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel W. Newman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo and H. B. Cornell, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondents in a suit to recover an alleged balance of proceeds of a sale of real property belonging to appellant, but which land was conveyed to respondent Boyer, and held by him as security for the payment of a debt. The action is based upon a charge of fraud and conspiracy on the part of respondents.

December 1, 1920, appellant was the owner of lot 15, block B of Walsh estate tract, and lot 5, block 2, of Rowen's tract in the city of Los Angeles, known as the San Julian property. The respondents George C. and Rosa Fetterman were husband and wife. Appellant was indebted to the respondent Boyer, and as security for the payment of this debt, on December 6, 1918, he executed and delivered to Boyer a deed of conveyance to the San Julian lots, together with other Los Angeles property. The lots involved in this appeal were then subject to a mortgage of $8,500 held by one Taylor. December 1, 1920, these lots were sold by respondent Boyer and conveyed to respondents Fetterman, in consideration of the sum of $2,000, the grantees assuming the payment of the mortgage together with accumulated interest. Without knowledge on the part of respondent Boyer, these lots were subsequently resold to one Van Geisling at a profit of some $3,000. Boyer was not a party to this sale, and received none of the proceeds therefrom. In a suit for money had and received, previously filed against Boyer by this appellant in April, 1921, affecting the same property involved in the present case, this appellant recovered a judgment for $3,864.92. The amount of this judgment was ascertained by deducting $18,530.14, which was found to be the total amount of indebtedness due to Boyer, from $22,378.06, being the total receipts from the income, interest, and proceeds of sales of appellant's said properties. This judgment included the item of $2,000 received by Boyer upon the sale of the San Julian lots involved in this appeal. In the former appeal it was determined that the deeds to respondent Boyer were mere mortgages for the security of the debt due to him from Hillwig. This judgment was affirmed, since the trial of the present case. Hillwig v. Boyer (Cal. App.) 254 P. 662.

When the present case was called for hearing the appellant moved for a delay of the trial until the former case had been determined on appeal, asserting that it was material to the issues of this case that the former judgment should first become final as to the character of the deeds to the property here involved, which were held by the respondent Boyer. The subsequent affirmation of the judgment in the former action has conclusively established the fact that these deeds were mere mortgages held by Boyer for the security of the debt due to him, and that the property was therefore held by him in trust. The motion for a continuance was denied.

Upon the trial, in addition to other testimony, the judgment roll and all the evidence adduced at the former trial was received by consent and considered in the determination of this cause. Appellant's theory of this case is that Boyer is liable for the full market value of the San Julian lots sold by him in violation of his trust, and that the respondents Fetterman are also liable for the full market value of the land, regardless of the price actually received by Boyer, because, it is asserted, they had knowledge of the trust relationship in which Boyer held the land.

Appellant contends that (1) the trial court erred in refusing to grant his motion for a continuance; (2) that the court failed to find upon the material issue as to whether Boyer held said property in trust, or, upon the contrary, was the legal owner thereof; and (3) that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence.

The trial court found that no conspiracy with relation to the sale of the real property existed between any of the respondents; that the respondent Boyer in good faith sold and conveyed the San Julian lots to the respondents Fetterman for the sum of $2,000, and no more; that thereafter the respondents Fetterman resold the property to one Van Geisling, but that this sale was negotiated without the knowledge of Boyer, who obtained no part of the consideration for the last-mentioned sale, and that none of the respondents received or held any money or property belonging to the appellant, except the $2,000 which was merged in the judgment in the former action, and which sum is thereby secured to appellant.

[1, 2] It is true that the court failed to specifically find that Boyer held the property as a mere trustee, and not as the legal owner thereof. But under the evidence adduced this failure could in no way alter the judgment which was actually entered. Treating the respondent Boyer as a mere trustee of the property involved in this action, the judgment in favor of respondents is nevertheless supported by the evidence. A failure on the part of the trial court to find upon a material issue is reversible error. But, when no substantial rights of the appellant are prejudiced by a failure to find upon some particular issue, or when the judgment would not be affected thereby, its omission will be harmless, and under such circumstances the judgment will not be disturbed. 2 Cal. Jur. 1032, § 614.

In the present case, unless the evidence shows either that a conspiracy existed between the respondents by means of which the appellant was defrauded of a part of the purchase price of his land, or that respondents Fetterman knew of the fact that Boyer merely held the San Julian lots in trust without the power to sell them, and profited by the purchase of the property, it would not matter whether the trial court found that these lots were held in trust, or not, and the omission to find on that particular subject would therefore be harmless.

In spite of the fact that the entire evidence adduced at the former trial was admitted on the trial of the present case, appellant quotes at length from the trial judge's remarks in support of his assertion that the evidence of the former trial was not considered in determining the instant case. Appellant intimates that if the trial judge had considered the evidence offered at the former trial, his judgment in this case must of necessity have been favorable to him. In this belief the appellant is mistaken, for at the conclusion of the arguments, the trial judge said:

> "I will reserve my decision. I will mark the matter submitted, and will read that (the testimony taken at the former trial) if you will permit me to have one of your copies, and I will read that before giving final judgment."

The evidence amply supports the court's conclusions to the effect that no conspiracy existed between the respondents with relation to the sale of the real property; that the respondents Fetterman bought the property without knowledge of the trust relation in which Boyer held the property; that the respondent Boyer sold the property in good faith for the best market price which he was able to obtain; and that he received from the proceeds of said sale no more than $2,000 above the mortgage lien, which was fully accounted for and charged to him in the judgment procured in the former action.

To charge the respondents Fetterman with knowledge of the trust relationship in which the property was held by Boyer, the appellant relies on the following testimony of George C. Fetterman:

> "I think he (Boyer) told me that Mr. Hillwig owed him a lot of money, and that if he would pay him back * * * he could have his property. * * * In that deal I was regarding Mr. Boyer as the owner of the property. He said that Mr. Hillwig owed him a lot of money and he was holding his property as security, or something like that. I never paid no attention to it.
> "Q. Well, at this very time you considered Mr. Boyer the owner of the property? A. Mr. Boyer told me he owned it, and I knew he owned it."

[3] A fair construction of the foregoing testimony will sufficiently support the assumption that Fetterman believed that Boyer owned the property and had a right to dispose of it, in spite of the fact that he said Boyer told him Hillwig owed him a lot of money and that he was "holding his property as security, or something like that." Evidently this statement did not greatly impress him, for he adds, "I never paid no attention to it." Moreover, Mr. Boyer was afterwards called and testified, "I never told Mr. Fetterman that Mr. Hillwig owed me a lot of money, and never discussed with him my relations with Mr. Hillwig in any way." The foregoing record is therefore not sufficient upon which to upset findings of the court to the effect that Fetterman was unaware of the trust relationship in which the property was actually held by Boyer.

With relation to respondents' negotiations for the sale of the property in question, Mr. Boyer testified:

> "I first met Mr. Fetterman in October, 1920. * * * Q. What did you get for the San Julian property? A. $2,000. Q. Did you get anything else? A. No. * * * Q. Did you have anything to do with Mr. Van Geisling? A. No. Q. Did you have any interest of any kind, or anything, or any consideration moving from Mr. Van Geisling to Mr. Fetterman? A. None whatever. Q. Did you and Mr. Fetterman have any understanding, or agreement of any kind that you were to get * * * more than $2,000 for that property? A. No, sir. * * * What I meant to make clear (was that) * * * this deal was made for $2,000, no security—but just $2,000, which is all that was paid. * * * Q. What in your opinion was the value of the property at the time it was sold to Mr. Fetterman? A. What I sold it for.

* * * ($2,000; that was) the best offer I ever had. * * * Q. State it (the value) in dollars and cents. A. At the time I gave him an option (it was) $11,000. Q. What were the incumbrances? A. I think it was $8,500 mortgage, and possibly some taxes and interest. Q. Bringing it up to how much? A. I would say between $9,000 and $9,500, I can't remember exactly. Q. How long a period had you been trying to sell the property? A. About two years."

Upon the same subject-matter, Mr. Fetterman testified:

"Did you have a conversation with him (Mr. Hillwig) at the time of going into the escrow (for the purchase of the San Julian property)? A. Yes, sir. * * * That was in August, 1920. * * * I never met him after that. * * * Mr. Boyer came to my office * * * and wanted to sell that piece of land. * * * Q. Now you finally went into the escrow. * * * with Mr. Boyer? A. Yes. Q. How many parties were there in that escrow? A. Nobody but me and Mr. Boyer. Q. Now wasn't there anybody else, another party? A. Later on, we made it to—some one; that is later. Q. Who was the third party? A. Van Geisling. Q. Did Mr. Boyer have anything to do with any deal between you and Mr. Van Geisling? A. No, sir; none whatever. Q. Did Mr. Boyer know Van Geisling, or have anything to do with him in that connection? A. No, sir; I don't believe that Boyer knew anything about the contract between me and Mr. Van Geisling, for I didn't tell him. * * * Q. How much did Mr. Boyer get out of that deal? A. Well, I paid him $2,000, and had to put up all the back interest, taxes, etc. * * * Q. Did you pay Mr. Boyer more than $2,000? A. I did not. * * * Q. Did you and Mr. Boyer have any side agreement or any conversation about anything more that was to be paid him, or anything else that was to be given him? A. No, sir. * * * Q. Did Mr. Boyer receive any part of the consideration directly or indirectly that you got for the property when you sold it to Mr. Van Geisling? A. No, sir; (I) never even discussed it or talked with him about it. He didn't know anything about it, as far as I know; I never told him. * * * Q. What did you get from Mr. Van Geisling when you sold the property to him? A. I got $3,000, and some lots in Yonkers, N. Y. * * * I got $2,100 for these lots, but had to pay back taxes, sewer, street assessments, etc. * * * Q. Mr. Fetterman, you never had any talk with Mr. Hillwig about his relations (with Mr. Boyer) did you? A. No, sir. Q. You are absolutely sure of that? A. Yes, sir."

[4, 5] From the foregoing testimony it sufficiently appears that the respondents Fetterman negotiated an independent sale of the real property, without knowledge of the trust relationship between the legal owner thereof and Boyer, that they were in no way implicated in any fraud or conspiracy with relation thereto, and that the court therefore properly awarded judgment in their favor. A bona fide purchaser of property from a trustee, without notice, is not liable to the owner for a breach of the trust. 2 Perry on Trusts (6th Ed.) 1342, § 815, page 1369, § 830.

[6] It also sufficiently appears that the respondent Boyer was in no way implicated or interested in the sale of said real property to Van Geisling, and obtained none of the consideration therefor; that his previous sale to Fetterman was in good faith, free from fraud, and for the highest market value which he was able to procure. In fact, there is some evidence to indicate that he did in fact sell the property for market value, for he testified:

"Q. What in your opinion was the value of the property at the time you sold it to Mr. Fetterman? A. What I sold it for. That was the best offer I had ever had. Q. State it (the value) in dollars and cents. A. I gave him an option for $11,000. Q. What were the incumbrances? A. $9,000 or $9,500."

By the weight of authority, it has been held that:

"Where lands were sold in breach of trust, * * * their value at the time of the sale has been fixed upon as the sum to be accounted for." 2 Perry on Trusts, supra, 1387, § 147.

The record discloses the fact that the interest which was paid to the mortgagee, Mr. Taylor, was $779. Thus it appears that Mr. Boyer obtained $2,000 plus $9,779, the amount of the mortgage and accrued interest, for the property, which was in excess of the $11,000 which he fixed as the market value. It is true that the purchaser Fetterman was more fortunate in securing a sale at a further profit of about $3,000. But, in the absence of fraud, if Boyer, in the exercise of his best judgment, with reasonable efforts to procure a purchaser, succeeded in obtaining not more than $2,000 in excess of the mortgage lien, he can be held liable for no more than the price for which the property sold. In 39 Cyc. 364c, it is said:

"A trustee who has made a wrongful sale is liable to account for the real value of the property, instead of the price at which it was sold; but this personal liability for the difference does not attach where he has acted in good faith and according to the best of his judgment."

[7] Since the entire evidence and judgment roll in the former action were received and considered in the present case, it must be assumed that the trial judge in this case accepted the theory disclosed by the former judgment, that Boyer held the property in question as a trustee. But, since it was found in the present case that, upon sale of the San Julian lots, Boyer received only the $2,000 with which he was charged in the former judgment, and held no money or property belonging to the appellant, and that no fraud, conspiracy, or lack of good faith was shown, it would be immaterial whether he held the property as a trustee or not. Under such circumstances the refusal to continue the trial until the former judgment became final was harmless.

The record fails to disclose any proceeds of sale of said real property in the hands of respondents which belongs to the appellant, except the $2,000 for which appellant now holds a separate valid judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

GOODWIN v. RIVERSIDE HEIGHTS ORANGE GROWERS' ASS'N.

(Civ. 4895.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 17, 1928.

1. Principal and agent 🔑40—Burden was on administrator to show that death of deceased revoked order for payments to third persons.

In administrator's suit to recover money ordered paid to third persons on ground deceased's death revoked order for subsequent payments, burden was on plaintiff to show that death of deceased revoked order.

2. Principal and agent 🔑43(2)—Deceased's order for payment to third persons for oranges harvested from deceased's orchard held not revoked by deceased's death under statute (Civ. Code, § 2356).

In administrator's action to recover money which defendant, pursuant to deceased's order, had paid to third persons, after deceased's death for oranges harvested from deceased's orchard, deceased's death held not to have revoked the order under Civ. Code, § 2356, since, if third persons under terms of order simply became subrogated as lessees to deceased's rights, there was no agency, and, if an agency existed, it was coupled with an interest, and not terminated by deceased's death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; William H. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Frank J. Goodwin, as administrator of the estate of William H. H. Goodwin, deceased, against the Riverside Heights Orange Growers' Association, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas K. Case, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. L. McFarland, of Riverside, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. The above action was brought by plaintiff as administrator of the estate of Wm. H. H. Goodwin, deceased, to recover the sum of $2,771.96, which plaintiff claims is due him on account of oranges received by defendant from two properties formerly owned by said deceased. One property was located in San Bernardino county, Cal., and was known as the Moorman Hill or San Bernardino county property; the other was located in Riverside county, and was known as the Iowa avenue or Riverside county property.

The following facts are not disputed: That between December 14 and December 20, 1919, defendant and respondent entered into an agreement with said Wm. H. H. Goodwin, deceased, wherein and whereby defendant agreed "to pick, hand pack, ship, and market all the citrus fruit now growing on his [Goodwin's] land and all that, during the term of this agreement, may be grown upon his lands and premises." It is conceded that the two ranches above mentioned were the lands and premises referred to.

The agreement was to continue for five years, unless terminated on November 15th of any year by either party giving written notice during the last 15 days of the preceding August. It is not claimed that it was so terminated. Other provisions of the contract are not material here.

On January 14, 1920, Wm. H. H. Goodwin in writing notified defendant that he had leased his grove to W. A. Pfunder and S. D. Vincent, and to make all payments for December, 1919, and for the future, to them; that thereafter defendant during the years 1920 and 1921 made the following payments by check to the parties whose names appear after the respective amounts:

Date.	Amount.	Parties.
March 2, 1920	$895.75	Pfunder & Vincent
June 28, 1920	451.50	Pfunder & Vincent
August 19, 1920	701.27	Jennie Cook
January 31, 1921	250.00	Jennie Cook
February 8, 1921	100.00	Jennie Cook
March 8, 1921	99.25	Jennie Cook
May 4, 1921	150.00	Jennie Cook
May 26, 1921	150.00	Jennie Cook
June 15, 1921	300.00	Jennie Cook
August 11, 1921	407.25	Jennie Cook

No claim is made by plaintiff for the amount of $895.75 paid March 2, 1920. In addition, defendant has in its possession the sum of $162.69, which is the aggregate of the amount retained by defendant from the sale of the oranges taken from the San Bernardino county property, and certain refunds. Appellant only claims payments commencing with June 28, 1920.

On or about January 27, 1920, Wm. H. H. Goodwin executed two deeds to said Jennie Cook, one for the property in Riverside county and the other for the property in San Bernardino county. Wm. H. H. Goodwin died in San Bernardino county on May 6, 1920. On May 7, 1920, the above two deeds from him to Jennie Cook were recorded. Defendant was first notified of Goodwin's death on May 10, 1920. On May 18, 1920, notice of pendency of action was filed by plaintiff (this appellant) in Riverside and San Bernardino counties, respectively, in actions against said Jennie Cook et al., to set aside the aforesaid deeds. Judgment was rendered October 10, 1921, in the action in Los Angeles county of Frank J. Goodwin as administrator of the estate of Wm. H. H. Goodwin, deceased, against Jonathan Snyder, Jennie Cook et al., setting aside these deeds, and ordering said Jennie Cook to forthwith account to the plaintiff for all of his receipts and disbursements in the matter of her occupation, maintenance, and control of said parcels of real property in Riverside and San Bernardino counties, providing that plaintiff have judgment for any property shown to have been received and retained by her "since she has been in possession of said real property." (Italics ours.)

There is much argument in appellant's and respondent's briefs as to the law establishing the right of parties to the crops from lands which are out of the possession of the owner of the land, tending to show that, where one is in alleged possession and subsequently ousted, where possession is recovered by the owner, he takes the growing crops with the land, but that crops harvested are the property of the one in unlawful possession, and the owner's remedy is only to recover the rental value of the land, citing Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412, 416, 2 Am. Rep. 462; Rector v. Lewis, 46 Cal. App. 168, 188 P. 1018; Grossman v. Yip Wing et al. (Cal. App.) 216 P. 634; and Halleck v. Mixer, 16 Cal. 574, 579, all tending to show that defendant (respondent) was justified in making these payments to Jennie Cook while she was in possession under these deeds, even if they were subsequently set aside and the plaintiff restored to possession.

But appellant states that the only question in this suit is whether the death of Wm. H. H. Goodwin revoked the order to defendant to pay Pfunder and Vincent, and argues that, if it did, defendant is liable to plaintiff, because defendant never had any authority to make the payments to Jennie Cook.

Without reference to the last proposition at this time, we think this fairly states the issue, because, if Goodwin's death did not revoke the order to pay Pfunder and Vincent, they, and not plaintiff, would be the only ones entitled to object to the payments being made to Jennie Cook or to any one else.

[1] Under the order which Goodwin gave defendant January 14, 1920, to pay the money to Pfunder and Vincent, it is conceded by appellant that "the defendant was protected in making the payments as they became due to Vincent and Pfunder until the order was revoked." So that it clearly does not concern plaintiff to whom the money was paid until he has shown that the order was revoked. The respondent, having paid this money once, and nothing appearing to show it was not paid in good faith, is entitled to ask, as it does, that the rule be strictly invoked that the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove the necessary facts to entitle him to recover.

The plaintiff (appellant), in support of his contention cites section 2356 of the Civil Code, as follows:

> "The power of an agent * * * is terminated, as to every person having notice thereof, by:
> "1. Its revocation by the principal;
> "2. His death; or
> "3. His incapacity to contract."

We think he should have quoted the entire section, the remainder of which reads as follows:

> "Unless the power of an agent is coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency, it is terminated, as to every person having notice thereof, by:
> "1. Its revocation by the principal;
> "2. His death; or,
> "3. His incapacity to contract."

The clause "unless the power of an agent is coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency," is the material part of the section in its application here. No point is raised as to Goodwin's "incapacity to contract." Appellant's argument assumes two propositions, first, that the so-called "order" constituted Vincent and Pfunder the agents of Goodwin, and, second, if it did, that it was not "coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency."

Assuming the agency for the moment (without deciding it), the first question to be decided is, Was it "coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency," and therefore not revoked by Goodwin's death?

If there was an agency—and respondent follows appellant's argument that there was—the "subject-matter" of it was the contract between respondent and Wm. H. H. Goodwin, which appellant admits was in force up to his death, under which Vincent and Pfunder were interested directly and continuously to the extent at least of being entitled to receive all money which, except for the said "order," Goodwin would have been entitled to receive; a very material "interest" it appears to us.

[2] So that it becomes apparent on either alternative that the order was not revoked under section 2356 of the Civil Code, for, if we consider that Vincent and Pfunder, under the terms of the "order," simply became subrogated as lessees to Goodwin's rights under the contract to receive the money, there was no agency, and section 2356 of the Civil Code does not apply. If, on the other hand, we assume the agency, then "the power of the agent was coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency," and the agency was not terminated by Goodwin's death. Norton v. Whitehead, 84 Cal. 263, 268, 24 P. 154, 18 Am. St. Rep. 172; Cox v. Hughes, 10 Cal. App. at p. 558, 102 P. 956; Travers v. Crane, 15 Cal. 12, 18.

Therefore, since appellant assures us that this question of whether, under section 2356 of the Civil Code, the death of Wm. H. H. Goodwin revoked the order to defendant (respondent), is the only question in this case, and it appearing clearly that such order was not so revoked, we deem it unnecessary to consider further any of the other arguments of appellant or respondent (Buena Vista Oil Co. v. Park Bank of Los Angeles, 39 Cal. App. at p. 713, 180 P. 12), which arguments might have been material had we decided this proposition differently, but which arguments now become merely academic.

MOX, Inc., v. LEVENTHAL et al.★

(Civ. 3397.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 14, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 12, 1928.

1. Time ⇒10(4)—Where last day to commence action falls on a Sunday or holiday, suit may be filed on following day.

General rule is that where last day on which to commence an action falls upon a Sunday or holiday, suit may be filed on following day.

2. Mechanics' liens ⇒260(1)—Statute prescribing time within which action to foreclose mechanic's lien may be brought held one of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 1190).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1190, providing time within which action to foreclose mechanic's lien may be brought, held statute of limitations.

3. Time ⇒10(4)—Statute designating provisions applicable to practice in mechanic's lien proceedings held not exclusive in computing time for doing act (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 12, 1198; Civ. Code, § 10).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1198, providing that except as otherwise provided in this chapter provisions of part 2 of this Code (section 307 et seq.) are applicable to and constitute rules of practice in proceedings mentioned in this chapter, held not to furnish only rules to be employed in mechanic's lien cases, so as to bar application of Civ. Code, § 10, and Code Civ. Proc. § 12, providing means of computing time for doing act required by law to be done, to such cases.

4. Time ⇒10(1)—Statutory rule for computing time when last day falls on Sunday or holiday applies to any act required by law, except where statute specifically otherwise provides (Code Civ. Proc. § 12).

Code Civ. Proc. § 12, providing that time within which act required by law to be done is to be computed by excluding first day and including last, unless last is a holiday and then it is also excluded, is not merely a rule of proceeding, but is a general rule for computing time, applicable to any act which is required by law except where statute specifically provides otherwise.

5. Time ⇒10(4)—Ninety days to sue to enforce mechanic's lien having expired on Monday, October 13, "Columbus Day," commencement of action on October 14 was timely (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 10, 12, 1187, 1190; Civ. Code, §§ 7, 10).

Where 90 days for commencing action to enforce mechanic's lien under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1187, 1190, expired on October 13, and day preceding was a Sunday and also "Columbus Day," under section 10 and Civ. Code, § 7, providing that if October 12 falls on Sunday, the Monday following is a holiday, held that under section 10 and Code Civ. Proc. § 12, action commenced on Tuesday October 14th was timely.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Mox, Inc., against Sam Leventhal and another to foreclose mechanic's lien. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

L. M. Pritchard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chas. H. Brock, Earl E. Johnson, and Fred W. Mears, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien which was rendered against plaintiff after a demurrer to the complaint had been sustained without leave to amend.

The complaint alleged that the notice of lien upon which the action was based was filed pursuant to section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, on July 15, 1924. The complaint was filed October 14, 1924. Section 1190, Code of Civil Procedure, declares:

> "No lien provided for in this chapter binds any property for a longer period than ninety days after the same has been filed, unless proceedings be commenced in a proper court within that time to enforce the same. * * *"

The 90 days allowed by the provisions of the last-quoted section expired on October 13th. The preceding day was Sunday, which was also "Columbus Day" by enactment of both section 7, Civil Code, and section 10, Code of Civil Procedure. These sections last cited provide that:

> "If the * * * twelfth day of October * * * falls upon a Sunday, the Monday following is a holiday."

Hence Monday October 13, 1924, became a holiday. Both section 10 of the Civil Code and section 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure declare:

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

"The time in which any act provided by law is to be done is computed by excluding the first day and including the last, unless the last day is a holiday, and then it is also excluded."

[1] The general rule is that where the last day on which to commence an action falls upon a holiday, the suit may be filed on the following day. 23 Cal. Jur. 973. Section 1190, Code of Civil Procedure, supra, in effect, is a statute of limitations prescribing the period of time within which an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien may be brought. In Hughes Brothers v. Hoover, 3 Cal. App. 145, 150, 84 P. 681, 683, it is said:

"Giving to section 1190 the only force which it can possibly have is to interpret it as a statute of limitation which provides the time within which an action may be brought for the enforcement of a right."

Evidently, by the terms of section 1190, supra, the Legislature intended to grant to a claimant for compensation for materials or labor furnished 90 full days after the filing of the notice of lien in which to commence the action. It is said:

"The theory of the statute of limitations is that a creditor has the full statutory period on any day of which he may of his own volition commence an action, and if he cannot do so because of legal prohibition, the statute does not run." 16 Cal. Jur. 563, § 160; Hoff v. Funkenstein, 54 Cal. 233.

[2] The same principle would apply where the statutory period for commencing an action is prevented from running because the final day chances to fall upon a Sunday or a holiday, during which final day the claimant would be unable to file his action. Unless such final holiday is eliminated from the statutory period, it is apparent that the letter and spirit of the statute would be defeated, and the claimant would thereby be denied his full 90 days in which to commence his suit. The case of Branagh v. Chicago, B. & S. Co., 39 Cal. App. 610, 179 P. 543, was an action against the sureties on a bond for materials furnished to a construction company pursuant to the statute which permits the suit to be commenced at any time "within six months after the filing of the claim with the California Highway Commission." It appeared that the claim was filed April 12, 1915. The six months' limitation within which to commence the action therefore expired October 12. But this was the same holiday which has raised the controversy in the present case. Yet it was there held that under section 10, Civil Code, the action was authorized to be filed upon the following day.

[3] Respondent contends that neither section 10, Civil Code, nor section 12, Code of Civil Procedure, have any application to the provisions of the Mechanic's Lien Law, the procedure affecting which, they claim, is governed exclusively by section 1198, Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that:

"Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, the provisions of part two of this Code are applicable to, and constitute the rules of practice, in the proceedings mentioned in this chapter."

[4, 5] We are not in accord with this view. The foregoing section does not declare that part 2 of that Code furnishes the only rules to be employed in mechanic lien cases. Nor can it be said that section 12 is a rule of proceeding. It is a general rule for computing time, applicable to any act which is required by law, except where a statute specifically otherwise provides. Part 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure is devoted to the method of procedure required to be employed in prosecuting civil actions to judgment and in satisfaction thereof. Part 3, in which we find the Mechanic's Lien Law, is devoted chiefly to special proceedings such as the enforcement of liens, eminent domain, probate, arbitration, etc. Upon the contrary, section 12 does not come under any of the so-called "parts" of this Code, but is preliminary thereto, and appears to be general in its application to "any act provided by law." There appears to be no good reason for limiting the lien law so as to exclude therefrom the general rule for computing time allowed for the commencement of an action. The general rule is that when the last day for the performance of an act provided by law falls upon a Sunday or a holiday, that day is excluded in the computation of time, and the act may be performed on the following day. With a few exceptions on account of specific statutory provisions, this rule has been applied to a variety of acts and proceedings. 24 Cal. Jur. 585, § 13; 26 R. C. L. 748, § 23. The case of Johnston v. New Omaha T. H. E. L. Co., 86 Neb. 165, 125 N. W. 153, 20 Ann. Cas. 1314, reviewing a large number of authorities construing statutes which purport to establish a uniform rule for computing time, concludes by saying:

"After a full and careful consideration of the question * * * we hold * * * that section 1841, Ann. St. 1909, was intended by the Legislature to put an end to all confusion and uncertainty by adopting a uniform rule for the computation of time, alike applicable to matters of mere practice and to the construction of statutes, and that it applies to the computation of time * * * to be taken into account is days, months, or years, and that where an act is to be done, or is permitted to be done within a specified time, and the last day is Sunday, it shall be excluded, and the act may be done on the following day."

This language applies with like force to the present case.

Respondent has cited several cases from other jurisdictions which are in conflict with the foregoing rule, but these cases are no longer authority in this state, since the enactment of section 10, Civil Code, and section 12, Code of Civil Procedure. Many states have enacted similar statutes to establish a uniform rule of computing time. We are of the opinion that section 1190, Code of Civil Procedure, should be construed with section 12, Code of Civil Procedure, so that where the last of the 90 days allowed by that section in which to institute an action to enforce a mechanic's lien falls upon a Sunday or a holiday, the limitation of time will thereby become tolled so as to permit the suit to be commenced upon the following day.

The demurrer in the present case was therefore erroneously sustained.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to overrule the demurrer and permit the defendants to answer.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 25, 1928.

1. Libel and slander ⟹104(1)—Evidence that defendant had been guilty of misconduct held inadmissible to establish malice in slander action.

In action for slander, evidence showing that defendant had been guilty of serious misconduct to plaintiff's knowledge held inadmissible to establish malice as basis for exemplary damages.

2. Appeal and error ⟹1170(6)—Conduct of plaintiff's counsel in offering inadmissible evidence held prejudicial in slander action (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In action for damages for slander, conduct of plaintiff's counsel in offering inadmissible evidence tending to prejudice defendant on condition that he would later connect it held prejudicial, and to result in miscarriage of justice requiring reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1053(1)—Order striking objectionable testimony on plaintiff's failure to connect it up as agreed held not to cure error in slander action.

Where court in action for slander, after receiving evidence to effect that defendant had been guilty of serious misconduct to knowledge of plaintiff on condition that plaintiff would later connect it up, and on failure to do so ordered testimony stricken from record, such order did not have effect of curing error in its admission.

Action by Alyce Gee against Fong Poy, also known as Fong Wan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Peter S. Sommer and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

James M. Hanley, of San Francisco, and Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in an action for slander growing out of certain statements alleged to have been made by the defendant concerning plaintiff. The case was tried by the court sitting with a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of plaintiff and assessing damages against said defendant in the sum of $5,500. Upon the verdict judgment was entered as indicated.

Both plaintiff and defendant are Chinese. The main complaint, and, indeed, the sole complaint, of appellant, is that owing to misconduct of counsel for plaintiff the defendant was denied a fair trial in the court below. This ground embraces many factors all intimately connected therewith. When we state that the misconduct alleged is the sole complaint it may be understood that we include therein the effects of this misconduct as evidenced by the verdict and judgment.

In order that there may be an application of the law relative thereto it is necessary to detail in some particularity the facts of the case and the history of its trial.

The complaint sets up three causes of action, each alleging a separate slander, though in each instance the slanderous words alleged to have been spoken are practically the same, and all within a short period of time. In the first cause of action plaintiff alleges that on or about March 1, 1924, the defendant telephoned the mother of plaintiff, and at that time and in the ensuing conversation spoke of plaintiff as follows: "Fanny is worse than a prostitute"—the Fanny referred to being the wife of defendant. "You better take care of Alyce; she is doing the same thing as Fanny"—Alyce being the name of the plaintiff herein.

In the second cause of action it is alleged that on or about March 8, 1924, at the home of the mother of defendant's wife, the defendant spoke of plaintiff as follows: "Alyce was going with Fanny; she is worse than a prostitute."

The third cause of action sets up that on the 9th day of March, 1924, at the Chinese cemetery in the county of San Mateo, in the presence of more than 100 people, defendant spoke and uttered of and concerning plaintiff as follows: When the plaintiff asked the defendant, "Why do you say talk about me behind my back, that I am worse than a prostitute?"—the defendant replied "Yes; I said that you act like it." The plaintiff replied, "I can go to court about this, you have no proof"; and the defendant answered, "Any time I go; any time I go." The plaintiff answered, "You know that I am not. How can you say I am?" The defendant replied, "You better go whitewash yourself. You walk like one."

In each cause of action there are accompanying allegations of the words being false and defamatory and prompted and actuated by actual malice, hatred, and ill will of defendant toward plaintiff; likewise allegation concerning the use and meaning of the words employed. There are no allegations of special damage, and punitive damages are asked.

There is no question raised as to the sufficiency of the complaint, and therefore the allegations are merely outlined to indicate the slanderous words charged.

The answer of the defendant is a categorical denial of the allegations of each cause of action.

Upon the issues thus joined the verdict of the jury was in favor of plaintiff.

No specific contention is made that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. No claim of error is predicated upon the instructions given or refused. Excessiveness of verdict is not urged other than the claim of appellant that its size is of the utmost importance in determining the effect of the alleged misconduct.

The plaintiff is an American-born Chinese girl aged, at the time of trial, 19. She was at different times a worker in a factory, waitress in a tearoom, helper in a Chinese herb establishment, and at the time of trial a waitress in a Chinese restaurant. The defendant is a Chinese herb doctor aged, at the time of trial, 42. The plaintiff, as a young girl and up to the time of the happening of the events around which the issues center, had been a close friend and chum of one Fanny Ng, who in 1919 became the wife of the defendant. The plaintiff was a frequent visitor at the home of defendant and was at some time in his employ, mixing herbs and medicines. The wife of defendant and the plaintiff, after the marriage of the former, continued their friendly relations and visited back and forth with frequent regularity. The plaintiff was permitted to show, over the objection of defendant, that upon one of her visits to the house of defendant in November, 1923, defendant made improper advances to her accompanied with ardent professions of affection; that when she repelled his advances he then offered her money in consideration of her remaining silent as to the episode and particularly refraining from disclosing the incident to the wife of the defendant—the purpose of this testimony being to show that because plaintiff had spurned the proffered love of defendant the latter became angry and vindictive toward her, and out of this actual malice came the words complained of. Irrespective of this incident, however, there seems to have been no open breach in the general relations of the parties or cessation of general family friendship and intimacy. On or about March 3, 1924, the defendant intercepted a letter addressed to his wife, Fanny, which letter tended to disclose a relationship between the wife and a Chinese man. In the letter were many expressions of endearment and anticipation of renewal of past association. It also contained statements of the writer that he had seen the plaintiff, Alyce, and from the context it could easily be inferred that Alyce had knowledge of this clandestine relationship. On the same morning that defendant came into possession of the letter the wife became aware of the fact that the letter had been intercepted by her husband, and some words ensued between them. The wife threatened self-destruction and left her home. Defendant, becoming aware of her departure, endeavored to locate her, and it was in this endeavor that he first called by telephone the mother of the plaintiff here. In the ensuing conversation, it was testified by the mother, defendant used the words complained of, referring to his wife as a prostitute and likewise classifying the plaintiff. The efforts of the husband to locate his wife proved futile, until the day after the day of her departure he learned that she had committed suicide at the home of one of her relatives. Thereafter and during the period between the death and burial of the wife it was in evidence that at a family gathering, where there were present many Chinese people, the defendant condemned the activities of the wife and emphasized her immoral conduct, likening her to a prostitute. At that time he again associated the plaintiff with the wife, and referred to the former as likewise a prostitute and a bad woman. On the day of the funeral and at the place of interment at the brink of the grave plaintiff approached the defendant and asked him why he had talked about her and applied to her the word "prostitute," and cautioned the defendant that she could take him into court for this; whereupon defendant again repeated the slanderous words, with the further statement that she, the plaintiff, should whitewash herself, and assuring her further that he was willing to go to court at any time—all of this occurred and the language used being in the presence and hearing of many people.

This practically is the evidence upon which the verdict finds support. The defendant denied making any of the statements or using any of the slanderous words charged as against plaintiff. He offered testimony supporting his defense, and further to show that the plaintiff was being urged and encouraged by others of the Chinese race to harass and scold him and cause him trouble and annoyance. It was also shown at the trial that the defendant is a man of some wealth, having an income of at least $1,000 a month and owning property in excess of $150,000.

The trial of the case covered 12 days exclusive of the week-end recess from Friday until Monday following.

With this synopsis of the facts before us we now approach the contention of the appellant and set forth the acts and conduct complained of.

The first witness called by plaintiff was the defendant under the provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure. In the course of his examination by plaintiff he was asked concerning his acquaintance with two Chinese girls named Grace Moy and Rosie Ng, and it was admitted by him that these two girls came over and stayed at his home all the night of Saturday, March 1, 1924. Then these questions were asked him and these proceedings had:

> "Q. You had trouble with your wife about the two children, didn't you? A. No, not two children; with my wife.
> "Q. Didn't you and your wife have a row because you attempted to get in the bed of the two little girls? A. No; no such thing.
> "Mr. Crosby (Counsel for Defendant): Wait just a minute; we object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not responsive to any issues raised by the pleadings.
> "The Court (after repeating the question): I presume the plaintiff was one of them.
> "Mr. Hanley (Counsel for Plaintiff): No; she was not. I will withdraw the question for a minute. I will ask to have these two little girls brought into the room."

These girls were then brought into the courtroom, being Chinese girls of the age of 15 years. Nothing further along this line was attempted during the examination of the defendant.

The mother of plaintiff, to whom the first slanderous words were addressed, testifying as a witness for the plaintiff, was asked on cross-examination as to the employment of plaintiff by the defendant at a time after the alleged incident wherein defendant had made advances towards plaintiff. Defendant sought to show the wages paid plaintiff upon the theory that it would show she was working to earn money and get pay and thus controvert the inference of insult some weeks before. Whereupon Mr. Hanley, counsel for plaintiff, interjected this:

> "We have a right to show that after he was satisfied, after his wife did it, he still had the rottenness in his make-up and he wanted to get it out of his system, and he wanted to get it out of his system at his wife's funeral, because he caused his wife to kill herself, and"—

At this point he was stopped by the court on the ground that this was argumentative, and the cross-examination proceeded.

On the third day of the trial plaintiff called as a witness Grace Moy, one of the young Chinese girls who were called into court for identification at the time of defendant's examination. This witness testified to visiting the home of defendant on the night of March 2d, and testified to the events of the evening, going to a show and to a lunch, and finally going to bed at about 1 a. m. with the wife of the defendant and another girl, Rosie Ng, sister of defendant's wife. Then the plaintiff, after much discussion and argument between counsel and over the objection of defendant, was permitted to show by this witness that after the three named retired the door was broken open and the defendant, clad in pajamas, entered the room in an excited and exciting manner and attempted to get in bed with the girls; that the wife tried to shield them and finally fought off the defendant, who thereupon turned and went out of the room; that the wife of defendant thereupon got the girls out of bed and dressed and started to leave the house, but were met by defendant, who assured them they would not be further disturbed, whereupon they returned to bed. They left the house about 5 a. m. on Sunday morning, March 2d, accompanied by the wife.

Counsel for defendant interposed frequent objections to this line of testimony on the general grounds of irrelevancy, incompetency, and immateriality, further specifying that the asking of the questions eliciting this testimony was prejudicial misconduct, and offered and designed solely for the purpose of discrediting the defendant in the eyes of the jury. During the argument the following occurred:

> "Mr. Hanley (plaintiff's counsel): We will show not only that he did these things but that it was known to his wife, and that he and his wife rowed in the bedroom because of his conduct at that time. We are going to show that he forced the woman to go away, made her arm black and blue, causing her to leave with the girls on the first Key Route that pulled out in the morning at 5 o'clock. It is to show that the contention of the defendant in this, that he went into this talk because of certain letters that he received, is not true."

The court at the outset in overruling the objection of defendant took the view that plaintiff could prove by circumstantial evidence that the letter claimed to have been intercepted was a fabrication, and in this effort plaintiff might show facts from which this might be inferred. However, the court qualified the admission by stating that if it developed that the evidence was absolutely immaterial and should not have been admitted the court would entertain a motion to strike.

Counsel for defendant thereupon made this statement:

> "We apprise the court now of the vice of such an admission. The force of what they are seeking to offer will have exercised its influence, will have been heard by the jury. And regardless of how any human being may attempt to cause to pass from his memory such things as this it cannot be done. And to admit anything with the right to strike it out is securing the defendant no security whatever of his right against a design purposely to injure him in matters that do not concern the case.
> "The Court: Well; that is not the avowed purpose of the offer to make this proof. The testimony will be admitted."

After the testimony of the witness on this subject had been given defendant renewed his motion to strike, and the court stated there had been no sufficient connection, whereupon counsel for plaintiff said: "We propose to follow it up with testimony of other people."

Upon further objection by defendant, the court asked counsel for plaintiff if he undertook to connect it up, and Mr. Hanley, for plaintiff, replied that it was his intention to show that from the friendly relations existing between defendant's wife and plaintiff, the defendant knew that the wife had told plaintiff of the incident of the bedroom, and that it was an element of his malice that he would close the mouth of plaintiff by defaming her. The court thereupon reserved its ruling on the motion to strike to see whether it was connected up or not, in the light of plaintiff's undertaking to connect up and show the materiality and competency of the testimony.

Thereafter plaintiff called as a witness Rose Ng, a Chinese girl of the age of 15 years. This witness, over the objection of defendant, gave similar testimony as to the occurrence when defendant is said to have entered the bedroom of these young girls. Defendant throughout objected strenuously and at sufficiently frequent intervals, on each occasion further specifying and assigning the propounding of these questions to elicit that testimony as prejudicial misconduct on the part of counsel for plaintiff, being solely for the purpose of prejudicing the rights of the defendant before the jury. The court stated that the testimony was admissible on the question of punitive damages. Plaintiff's counsel again asserted his position as follows:

> "And the purpose of it is to show malice, that all of the subsequent acts of this defendant were brought about by malice because he knew that the young lady, the plaintiff, was in possession of certain knowledge with reference to his conduct, and he wanted to besmirch her character as a matter of protection for himself. That is our position."

Counsel for plaintiff further argued the admissibility of the testimony as a circumstance to explain the real cause of the difficulty between defendant and his wife, rebutting the testimony given by defendant. The court again remarked:

> "I think, as I thought the other day, the testimony was admissible, and I think so now."

In the course of the argument Mr. Hanley, counsel for plaintiff, said:

> "I do not want to comment again on the letter (meaning the intercepted letter to the wife) except in so far as it bears out inferentially and circumstantially the contention of the plaintiff that this letter was written either personally or at the instigation of the defendant."

This statement was assigned by defendant as prejudicial misconduct and purposely designed by counsel to cast aspersion upon the character and the integrity of defendant. As the testimony referred to was being given defendant renewed his objections and the court stated:

> "Overruled. It may be considered that defendant is deemed to raise the same objection to every question asked on this line, and the ruling of the court will be the same."

At the conclusion of the testimony of the witness Rose Ng, a motion to strike was made by defendant on the grounds previously urged, calling the court's attention to the promise of plaintiff to make the necessary connection. Counsel for plaintiff then stated that neither Rome nor the earth was made in one day, and that he expected to complete the connection when the plaintiff took the stand, but could not do it until that time.

When the plaintiff was being interrogated by her counsel she was asked concerning the incident of November, 1923, when it was alleged that defendant had made improper advances to her. On objection of defendant the court said, addressing counsel for plaintiff, "You offer it on the same theory that you offer what occurred on the night of the 1st and 2d of March of last year?" to which counsel replied "Yes"; and the court said: "The objection is overruled. If you don't connect it up thoroughly it will go out on motion." Thereafter, while plaintiff was a witness, an offer was made to show that the deceased wife told plaintiff of the occurrence of the bedroom, and upon objection of defendant the evidence was excluded.

At the close of plaintiff's case, or when plaintiff announced she rested her case, defendant renewed his motion to strike out all of the testimony concerning the alleged happenings of the night in question, renewing in his motion all of the assignments of error, prejudice and misconduct. This motion was granted by consent of all parties, and the jury were instructed to wholly ignore and disregard the testimony so stricken out. The court, in concluding its instructions to the jury on this point, asked the jury if they could and would so disregard the stricken testimony, and they replied affirmatively. The admonition of the court was thorough and sufficient in itself and as complete as any such instruction should be.

Later, during the presentation of defendant's case, the defendant offered testimony concerning the relationship of the deceased wife with the alleged author of the letter in dispute. Upon objection of plaintiff to the relevancy or materiality of this testimony defendant took the stand that, inasmuch as plaintiff had argued that the letter was a fabrication, he was entitled to rebut that inference and show its genuineness. Whereupon counsel stipulated, and pursuant to such stipulation, the court instructed the jury, that under the testimony and the stipulation of counsel, in deliberating upon a verdict it should be taken as a fact established by the testimony that the defendant did not write or cause to be written the said letter.

Plaintiff before resting her case presented the certificate of a physician that a certain witness who had been under subpœna could not be present, and that her condition was such that her presence could not be secured for some 10 or 12 days. Counsel for plaintiff stated that the testimony of the absent witness was merely in the nature of cumulative evidence. It was stated that the absent witness could testify to a conversation of March 2d with the defendant and others. The subject of the conversation had already been gone into quite extensively by others present.

We have thus at length detailed the testimony taken and proceedings had as the questions raised compel such a statement. It may be repeated here that the defendant stood on a straight denial. He did not plead justification in any way, nor did he set up the truth of the statements nor claim privilege. With the case thus summarized we may proceed with the claim of appellant.

Appellant bases his right to a reversal upon the ground that the offer of testimony covering the night of the alleged occurrence in the home of defendant was itself misconduct, and was made designedly to prejudice the rights of defendant and deny him a fair hearing on the merits; further, that the action of the court in admitting the same was error, and likewise of such damaging effect to his cause that the subsequent order striking it out was of no avail to cure the harm already done. Still further, appellant insists that even if there had been a connection sufficient to persuade the court to let the testimony remain, it was still irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial.

[1] The ground upon which respondent urged the testimony to be admissible and upon which the court admitted it on counsel's promise to connect was that it would tend to establish actual malice as the basis of exemplary damages. In other words, plaintiff argued that she was entitled to show that defendant had been guilty of serious misconduct towards the young girls involved, and that defendant knew that plaintiff had knowledge of these acts on his part, and that defendant with a purpose and design of forcing plaintiff to remain silent, or, failing in this, to discredit her in advance, spread these defamatory charges of and concerning her. Respondent has cited no authority either here or in the court below supporting her contention.

The question of just what may be shown to establish malice in fact in actions has been before the courts of this state many times. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 166, 116 P. 530; Scott v. Times-Mirror, 181 Cal. 345, 184 P. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007; Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 198 P. 1. The subject is exhaustively covered by Odgers in his work on Libel and Slander (5th Ed.) p. 348, and likewise by Newell on the same subject (3d Ed.) p. 937, and by Townsend in his work (4th Ed.) p. 653. From the authorities cited herein and those cited to support the text of the writers on the subject, it is manifest that there can be no basis for the claim here made. Repeating, respondent cites us to no authority or line of reasoning in support of his contention, and we do not feel the case now warrants a review of all that may have been written or said by the courts on the subject. Suffice it to say that if the rule contended for should be approved, then the trial of slander and libel cases would be interminable affairs of endless and confusing issues. Every act of a defendant's life that would in any wise disgrace him or cause him fear of exposure could be brought into issue upon the simple announcement that the defendant knew that the plaintiff was in possession of accusing facts against him, and that the defendant was therefore malicious in his statements as to the plaintiff. We do not approve such a theory, and decline to establish such a doctrine as the law of this jurisdiction.

[2] Of course, it is apparent that acts of defendant in relation to plaintiff, or acts between the parties to the action, are not under discussion here. Therefore, with reference to the testimony here under discussion, the court should not have admitted in either upon a promise to connect or at all. The court was apprized of counsel's theory at the outset and should have declined to admit the testimony on the theory advanced. In any event, the action of the court in the admission of the objectionable matter is not specifically urged. However, with the premise established that the testimony itself was inadmissible and improperly before the court and jury, we come to the contention that the acts of counsel in offering the same constituted prejudicial misconduct sufficient to warrant a judgment of reversal herein. The concrete question presented is this: If evidence of a nature tending to degrade and vilify a party is admitted improperly under a promise of counsel to connect the same in such a manner as to render it admissible, and subsequently there is an admitted failure to so connect, what effect will the admission of such evidence have upon a verdict rendered after all of the said evidence has been stricken from the record?

That the testimony complained of was calculated to and necessarily would prejudice the defendant before any jury admits of little question. For seven trial days this testimony was being introduced or else indirectly referred to and before the jury under the expressed opinion of the court that it considered the same material. It surely cannot require argument beyond the facts hereinbefore stated to demonstrate that the offering and acceptance of this line of testimony was highly prejudicial and harmful to appellant. The defendant in this case was a native of China and of the Mongolian race. As stated, we deem further discussion and analysis of the facts unnecessary to support the conclusion that the admission of the testimony was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

[3] Next we reach the question as to the effect of the order striking the testimony from the record, and the instruction and admonition to the jury to disregard the same. Many cases are cited on this subject, and we may quote without comment therefrom. The greater number of cases are those wherein defendant was charged with the commission of some public offense. However, the reasoning of those cases is applicable alike to all cases irrespective of what the issues may be. Without attempting any historical or chronological development, we cite from a very recent case:

"It is clear that however good the intentions of the jury, or however sincere they may be in endeavoring to follow the instructions of the court to disregard such suggestions, it is well nigh inevitable that they should give weight to such suggestions. * * * It is a psychological impossibility for the jury to wholly eradicate the impression made by such questions from their minds in weighing the evidence as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant on the particular item charged. * * * The question of the district attorney asked of the defendant amounted to a charge against the defendant that he had been guilty of the offense of rape * * * upon two small girls in his custody. The human mind is not so constructed that a thing of that kind can be either forgotten or overlooked by a jury. * * * The real question is, has the defendant had a fair trial?" People v. Anthony, 185 Cal. 152, 196 P. 47.

See, also, People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 139 P. 78.

"While it is the general rule that if it can fairly be said, from all of the circumstances of the case considered in conjunction with the nature and extent of the assigned misconduct, that an admonition of the court had the desired effect, there can be no just cause for complaint, nevertheless it is a recognized exception to that rule that, where as here, in a closely balanced criminal case, misconduct is repeated and persisted in, despite the warnings and admonitions of the trial court, and is so pronounced and pernicious that it is not in human nature to forget or disregard its prejudicial effect, then manifestly a mere admonition or any number of admonitions will not suffice to right the wrong done, and the only remedy remaining is to be found in a reversal of the judgment." People v. Edgar, 34 Cal. App. 471, 167 P. 895.

In another case, referring to the asking of improper questions, the court says:

"The plain effect of the statement was that the prosecution had such proofs, but could not make them because the laws of evidence precluded such a course." People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 36 P. 291, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 881.

"When counsel are permitted to state facts in argument, and to comment upon them, the usage of courts regulating trials is departed from, the laws of evidence are violated, and the full benefit of trial by jury is denied. It may be said, in answer to these views, that the statements of counsel are not evidence, that the court is bound to so instruct the jury, and that they are sworn to render their verdict only according to evidence. All this is true; yet the necessary effect is to bring the statements of counsel to bear upon the verdict with more or less force, according to circumstances; and if they, in the slightest degree, influence the finding, the law is violated, and the purity and impartiality of the trial tarnished and weakened. * * *

"It is true that the attorney for the prosecution in this case was not permitted by the court to comment at any length upon the facts which he himself imported into the case; but while this was to the credit of the court, it does not change the fact that a matter not in evidence, and of a nature clearly prejudicial to the appellants, was laid before the jury for the purpose of affecting their verdict, and it is no answer to this to say that the jury may have disregarded it. * * * It is unreasonable to believe the jury will entirely disregard them. They may struggle to disregard them; they may think they have done so, and still be led involuntarily to shape their verdict under their influence." People v. Ah Len, 92 Cal. 282, 28 P. 286, 27 Am. St. Rep. 103.

As indicated, the foregoing citations are all from cases wherein defendant was being prosecuted for a criminal offense, and where the defendant was surrounded by the presumptions usually attaching to a defendant in a criminal case, wherein the law requires proof of guilt to be established beyond any reasonable doubt. However, the reasoning as to the impossibility of erasing from the minds of the jurors the effects of evidence improperly before them applies with equal force to the trial of a civil case. That little distinction is made on this point a brief examination will disclose.

In the case of Shay v. Horr, 78 Wash. 667, 139 P. 604, quoted in the case of Dameron v. Ansbro, 39 Cal. App. 298, 178 P. 878, it is said:

> "We have held * * * that it is improper to either directly or indirectly get before the jury any fact which conveys the information that the defendant is insured against loss in case of a recovery against it, and that the striking of the answers conveying such information and the instructing of the jury not to consider it will not save the error."

In the case of Wright v. Broadway Department Store, 49 Cal. App. Dec. 225,* the court says the testimony adduced "was offered for no other purpose than to prejudice the minds of the jury against the appellant and it must have had the effect for which it was designed, even though the trial court granted appellant's motion to strike it out."

In the case of Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538, the prevailing opinion held that the conduct complained of was improper, but that the harm was overcome by the action of the trial court, and, further, that whether or not prejudicial harm resulted was for the trial judge to determine on the motion made for a new trial. The dissent in this case, concurred in by three of the court, Justices Wilbur, Olney, and Lennon, reads as follows:

> "It seems to us that an entirely false quantity was injected into the case by plaintiff's counsel, over the repeated admonitions of the court, and that the false quantity so introduced was of a character so prejudicial to the defendant as to have prevented the jury from considering the case fairly upon its real merits. To sustain the verdict under these circumstances will, it seems to us, have the effect of encouraging similar conduct in other cases, when it should be discouraged strongly."

The case of Keena v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 197 Cal. 148, 239 P. 1061, affords an interesting illustration. When this case was before the District Court of Appeal the court considered the misconduct complained of and pronounced the same as clearly subject to criticism. But in view of the judgment of affirmance in the case of Lafargue v. United Railroads, the court was not prepared to hold that the situation demanded a reversal of the cause. A petition for rehearing was granted in the Supreme Court, and the opinion of the latter tribunal is found in 197 Cal. at page 148, 239 P. 1061. The Supreme Court adopted in toto the opinion of the District Court up to the point of misconduct of counsel, and the judgment was reversed solely on the ground that the misconduct of the attorney for plaintiff prejudicially and materially affected the substantial rights of the defendant and prevented it from having a fair trial. The court adopted the language of the dissent in the Lafrague Case, supra. The Supreme Court says:

> "It is altogether too evident that the purpose of the accusation that evidence had been willfully suppressed by the defendant was none other than to bolster up a weak case by creating a prejudice against the defendant in the minds of the members of the jury. Such means of winning a lawsuit cannot be commended or receive recognition and endorsement by this court, instituted and maintained, as it is, on the principle of administering justice."

In considering the language thus used it seems clear that by the term "bolstering up a weak case" the idea of the court intended to be expressed was "a case that might be weak." This is apparent from the fact that the trial jury, the trial judge, the District Court of Appeal, and the Supreme Court all considered the facts sufficient to sustain the judgment.

Passing from our own state, we have authority from many jurisdictions. See Loughlin v. Brassil, 187 N. Y. 128, 79 N. E. 854.

In Lopresti v. Sulkin, 49 Pa. Super. Ct. 417, appears this language, commenting upon alleged misconduct of counsel:

> "But there are certain kinds of objectionable remarks which have been held to be so prejudicial in their nature as to be beyond correction by any admonition the court may give the jury to disregard them,"—cited and approved in Dannals v. Sylvania Twp., 255 Pa. 156, 99 A. 475.

In the case of Rinehart & Dennis v. Brown, found in 137 Va. 670, 120 S. E. 269, many authorities are reviewed and the question extensively discussed in all of its phases. The court adopts the rule, namely, "If it appears that the unfavorable influence of the argument was probably not wholly removed by the court's action, a new trial may be allowed." Further quoting from this case:

> "Counsel for plaintiff lay stress on the fact that the trial court was emphatic in instructing the jury to disregard the improper reference to the insurance, and obtained from them an indication that they understood the court's instruction. We do not attach special importance to these facts."

In Coon v. Manley (Tex. Civ. App.) 196 S. W. 606, it is said:

> "It is true the court seems to have promptly acted in the endeavor to have excluded from the jury the harmful and irrelevant matter referred to; but the references to the subject were so frequent and pointed, even after repeated rulings of the court, that we do not think appellee can now complain because of the conclusion, which as it seems to us is quite natural, that the vice and harmful effect of the matter objected to were not destroyed by the court's rulings."

Also, in Kirby Lumber Co. v. Youngblood (Tex. Civ. App.) 192 S. W. 1109, another Texas authority, we find this statement:

> "When the seeds of passion and prejudice are sown and fall in fallow ground, it is difficult, indeed, to destroy its effect, even by the most careful admonition and painstaking instructions; and when counsel, either in their argument to the jury or during the trial, in the presence of the jury, go outside of the record, and indulge in remarks that are clearly intended to arouse the passion or prejudice of the jury, and likely to influence them, such conduct not only authorizes, but requires the trial court to set aside the verdict of the jury, and this should be done, even though the court may have instructed the jury to disregard such argument."

*Hearing granted. For opinion of Supreme Court, see 199 Cal. 562, 250 P. 572.

An ancient case, Stewart v. Huntingdon Bank, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 267, 14 Am. Dec. 631, sets forth the conditions prevalent even then. We quote:

> "It has grown into a habit, within these few years, for counsel to propose a chain of evidence, the first links of which depend on those which follow, and would not be supportable without them. Now, although gentlemen of honor, and such I take the counsel in this cause to be, would scorn to impose on the court, by pledging themselves for what they knew they could not perform, yet, it may happen that there may be others who would make no scruple of liberal promises, provided they could smuggle into the jury box a piece of evidence which ought not to have got there."

In the case of State v. Meader, 54 Vt. 126, we find this language:

> "It is now the settled law in this state, that illegal evidence, if objected to, though admitted under an offer to so connect it with other proofs as to make it competent will vitiate a verdict for the party offering it, if the proposed connection is not established, unless the court is able to say affirmatively, that such evidence worked no injury to the adverse party. It is not apparent how any embarrassment can arise in the trial of cases under this rule. The party offering such evidence is simply compelled to take the risk of the experiment. If he fails, he, not his adversary, should be the loser. He has no more right to hold a verdict obtained by such evidence when offered in good faith, than one, when he offers the evidence in bad faith. The rights of the adversary are imperiled to the same extent in either case, and these are the rights calling for protection. The rule has a tendency to discourage bad faith in parties, in their offers of evidence, as they understand that such evidence cannot ultimately aid them."

No further citation of authority seems necessary.

In the case at bar plaintiff urges her good faith in the premises and her attempt to connect the testimony under discussion here. This, of course, must appear from the record, if at all. We assume that all counsel act in good faith, generally speaking. But good faith in the abstract is not an all-saving virtue. Here it appears, as a demonstration of good faith, that a witness under subpœna could not appear. However, the statement of counsel to the court was that the testimony of this witness was purely cumulative; and in explanation of this counsel referred to the incident and the occasion concerning which she would testify, and this record discloses that several witnesses had already given testimony concerning the same matter. There is not a single word in the record or offer of proof or statement of counsel to the effect that testimony to connect was or had been available, or that counsel had any reason to believe in his ability to so connect. Plaintiff's counsel had stated that he could connect by the testimony of plaintiff. When plaintiff was called and objection made, the court inquired of plaintiff's counsel if the knowledge upon which they based their contention could be brought home to defendant; whereupon counsel for plaintiff replied:

> "I don't know that. I won't say that, because I don't want to promise something that I may not be able to meet. But so there will be no question about it we withdraw the question."

Respondent here contends she made the offer to connect by attempting to show by plaintiff whether the deceased wife discussed with her what happened on the night in question, but was precluded from so doing owing to appellant's sustained objection. We have held hereinbefore that the evidence would have been inadmissible, even if connected; but on this particular phase we might add that the testimony offered would not tend to connect the defendant except remotely, and that the essential connection would be defendant's knowledge of what information had been conveyed to plaintiff. We deem it futile to follow this phase further. Quoting from Smith v. Sedalia, 182 Mo. 9, 81 S. W. 167:

> "It is in the discretion of the trial court to allow counsel some choice as to the order in which they will introduce their evidence, but when counsel have been permitted to introduce evidence out of its usual order on their assurance that it will be connected and its relevancy shown later, if the promised evidence is not brought forward, and if the irrelevant evidence is of a character likely to influence the jury, and if the verdict is on that side, a new trial should be granted. The fact that the promise may have been made in good faith does not alter the effect of the illegal evidence. In this instance there had been a change of venue and a change of counsel since the former trial, and doubtless the counsel who gave the promise expected they would be able to fulfill it, but in that respect they were disappointed."

A new trial was granted.

It must be added that throughout the trial to the time the evidence was stricken out it was for seven days being constantly urged and argued; that throughout the trial there was constant and continuous strife between counsel, often requiring the caution of the court, and throughout this strife were interjected side remarks and comments reflecting on the defendant and his cause, and drawing unfair inferences from the death of the wife, as instanced by the statement of plaintiff's counsel hereinbefore referred to, and also the statement of counsel for plaintiff that he would show that she was pregnant at the time. It is unnecessary to further detail these other than to illustrate the atmosphere created and the "fallow ground into which were cast the seeds of prejudice and passion."

We conclude the conduct complained of was harmful and prejudicial, and prevented the defendant from having a fair and impartial trial on the issues submitted.

We are again confronted by section 4½, art. 6, of the state Constitution, and are called upon to determine whether or not from the errors complained of there has been a miscarriage of justice.

[4] Notwithstanding an abundance of authority going to an explanation and construction of this constitutional provision, from necessity its application depends upon each particular case as it arises. Whatever else may be said on the subject it is clear that the intent of the provision was to promote justice rather than obstruct it. It was intended, in our opinion, to insist upon substantial compliance with the law, the very foundation of justice. If there had been a substantial compliance with the law then alleged or admitted irregularities should not prevail to change a result which it might be apparent would have resulted notwithstanding. But the effect of this provision is not to permit a reviewing court to simply scan the alleged rights of one party and deny the other any rights at all. The term "justice" includes the idea of equality, and in some instances the terms are used interchangeably. The law necessarily represents and embodies man's highest concept of human justice as between individuals. Under our system no man can be said to have had justice accorded to him who has not had the opportunity to present his case and have that case heard dispassionately and fairly. To say that you can bring a person into court and, before the presentation of his case to a jury, by offering incompetent and irrelevant testimony, disgrace and degrade him to a degree that both he and his case may be deemed unworthy to be heard and he subject to punishment, and that thereby you are not infringing upon his right to a fair and impartial hearing, is to declare what is obviously absurd. In the Keena Case, before cited, it appeared that the plaintiff had been afflicted by the loss of a child; that two juries had passed upon the sufficiency of the evidence as well as two trial judges; that in the District Court of Appeal and in the Supreme Court there was no question on that score, nor were there any errors complained of other than the conduct referred to. The Supreme Court nevertheless took the view that the substantial rights of the defendant had been impaired and that justice must have miscarried. Surely the constitutional provision was intended to prevent a miscarriage of justice and not to condone it. The present chief justice of the Supreme Court in People v. De Vries, 52 Cal. App. 711, 199 P. 870, uses this apt language:

> "There are bounds beyond which the saving grace of that provision may not pass, and the appellate courts should not be called upon to spread it, like 'a mantle of sweet charity,' over intentional acts of misconduct. Frequent warnings in relation to the practice proving ineffectual, reversals on appeal must be anticipated if right of defendants to a fair trial is to prevail."

In any event, applying the section to the case here, there is little to invoke the constitutional provision. Without further commentary we repeat that section 4½ of article 6 does not compel that we halt in this case.

Counsel involved in the case are all men of highest repute in the profession. But that does not alter the situation. It simply demonstrates the necessity for some restraining influence. In the instant case, again, when defendant's counsel was making some argument to the court he was interrupted by counsel for plaintiff, and answered the interruption by stating that he was addressing the court, whereupon plaintiff's counsel replied: "But the jury is sitting here and hears it." It is unfortunate to note—and every trial judge has noted—that a trial before a jury is often a battle of wits between opposing counsel, and an occasion for delicate finesse and elusive insinuation. Modern thought and discussion seem to leave the layman with the impression that there is something deficient in the administration of justice. The courts must sooner or later meet the question and present the remedy. And we think a great step in anticipation is to give some assurance to the profession and the litigant that in a case where issues are framed the trial will be confined thereto.

Judgment reversed.

WHYLER et al. v. RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 2047. (Civ. 3357.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 17, 1928.

1. Drains ⚿68—Reclamation district may levy assessment to provide drainage for artificial waters.

A reclamation district may levy an assessment to provide drainage for artificial waters.

2. Drains ⚿91—Reviewing court may not interfere with findings of fact triers relative to reclamation district assessments unless assessment was arbitrarily or unreasonably made.

A reviewing court may not interfere with findings of triers of fact relative to assessments for reclamation districts unless assessments appear to have been arbitrarily or unreasonably made.

3. Drains 🔑76—In reclamation and drainage district matters, much must be left to discretion of officers and to court making judicial review of proceeding.

In reclamation and drainage district matters, much must be left to sound judgment and discretion of the officers appointed by law to determine the benefit and to the court which makes a judicial review of the findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Annie F. Whyler and others against Reclamation District No. 2047. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Seth Millington, of Gridley, for appellants.

Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, and George R. Freeman, of Riverside, for respondent.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of the defendant reclamation district No. 2047. This was a reclamation district organized after the development of the rice industry in the upper Sacramento Valley had shown the necessity of the drainage from the lands within the district of surplus waters which had been artificially placed upon the lands for the irrigation of the lands devoted to rice culture.

The judgment complained of upholds the validity of an assessment on the lands of appellants lying within the exterior boundaries of the district.

[1] Appellants argue that it is not within the scope of the powers of a reclamation district to provide drainage for artificial waters, such a function being provided for by the organization of a drainage district, but the grounds here urged, that the assessment for drainage purposes is invalid, were before the court in the case of Abel v. Reclamation District No. 2047 (Cal. Sup.) 257 P. 504, which case involved the validity of an assessment for drainage purposes and was decided adversely to the contention of appellants in this case, and it is to that extent binding upon this court.

The other objections of appellants are directed to the method used in levying the assessment by the assessors, in that the factors are unreasonable and variable. The evidence offered in respect to the methods was very general in character and does not tend to show that the lands of appellants were not correctly classified and that the amount assessed against this land was not at the rate as that assessed against all other lands in the district of like character similarly situated and deriving a similar benefit from the works of the district.

[2, 3] The court in the case of Abel v. Reclamation District No. 2047, supra, said:

> "But there are other alleged elements of benefit, which were considered by the triers of the facts in the order provided by the statute, and we are not permitted to interfere with the findings of those tribunals unless the assessments appear to be arbitrarily or unreasonably made. Much must be left to the sound judgment and discretion of the officers appointed by law to determine the question of benefit in reclamation and drainage matters and finally to the court which makes a judicial review of the proceedings."

For the reasons stated and upon the authority of Abel v. Reclamation District No. 2047, the judgment is affirmed.

SMITH v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR YUBA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3424.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 9, 1928.

Rehearing Denied with Modifications March 10, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 9, 1928.

1. Certiorari 🔑28(2)—Sole office of "writ of review" is to determine whether judicial tribunal has in particular case exceeded its jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068).

Sole office of "writ of review," under Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, is to try the question of jurisdiction in particular case; that is, to examine the question whether judicial tribunal has in particular instance exceeded its lawful jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Writ of Review.]

2. Certiorari 🔑64(2)—Decision of tribunal within its jurisdiction is not disturbed on certiorari on account of errors, but jurisdictional facts must appear.

Where, on writ of review it is found that tribunal whose judgment is under determination acted within bounds of its lawful jurisdiction, its decision will not be disturbed even though it committed error or irregularities in arriving at results, but it must appear that jurisdictional facts were present such as existence of pleadings and formal presentation of issues.

3. Contempt 🔑44—Essential jurisdictional facts must appear before lower court can exercise jurisdiction to punish for contempt (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1068, 1218, 1219).

In cases of contempt, essential jurisdictional facts must be shown to exist before court, in exercise of general jurisdiction conferred upon it by law under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1068, 1218, 1219, can act in given case.

4. Contempt 🔑67—Question of sufficiency of proofs to uphold judgment in contempt proceedings held reviewable on certiorari (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068).

tempt proceedings, determination as to sufficiency of proofs to uphold lower court's decision held within scope of writ as involving jurisdictional facts, though error in conducting investigation could not be considered.

5. Divorce 🔑245(3)—Order modifying alimony award held void in so far as it granted wife attorney's fees for services of attorney already rendered (Civ. Code, § 137).

Order modifying award of alimony, in so far as it awarded wife attorney's fees for professional services of attorney in prosecuting proceeding for modification of decree, held void, under Civ. Code, § 137, for reason that professional services for which allowance was made were fully performed at time fees were awarded.

6. Divorce 🔑222—Court is without jurisdiction in divorce proceedings to award wife counsel fees after professional services have been performed (Civ. Code, § 137).

Court in divorce cases or proceedings arising therein collaterally or otherwise is without jurisdiction to award counsel fees after professional services have been performed under Civ. Code, § 137, which permits court to require husband to pay as alimony money necessary to enable wife to support herself or to carry on litigation.

7. Divorce 🔑245(3)—Order modifying award of alimony held not void, rendering contempt judgment based thereon invalid, because of invalid provision in order requiring payment of counsel fees (Civ. Code, § 137).

Order modifying interlocutory divorce decree and requiring payment of monthly sums of alimony together with sum for attorney's fees to wife held not void in its entirety, so as to render judgment of contempt based thereon invalid, by reason of fact that provision requiring payment of attorney's fees was void under Civ. Code, § 137; provision for alimony being separate, distinct, and independent.

8. Divorce 🔑245(1)—Allowance for alimony for specified period of one year in interlocutory decree held not conclusive, preventing subsequent order modifying award after expiration of year (Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139).

Allowance for support of wife, originally made in interlocutory decree of divorce for period of one year, held not conclusive so as to prevent modification after expiration of year by increasing the amount of alimony by subsequent order under Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139, where divorce was granted for husband's offense.

9. Divorce 🔑236, 245(1)—Stipulation for husband's payment of monthly sum to wife for one year held not permanent settlement, or to divest court's jurisdiction to increase alimony (Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139).

Stipulation between husband and wife relative to custody of children and providing for husband's payment to wife of specified monthly sum for period of one year cannot be construed as settlement of matter of alimony for all time or as divesting court of jurisdiction, under Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139, to increase amount after expiration of year, where circumstances requiring change were brought to its attention.

10. Divorce 🔑286—Construction of trial court in modifying alimony award, as to parties' stipulation, held conclusive on proceedings to review contempt judgment.

Construction of trial court in modifying alimony award, as to meaning of agreement between husband and wife for alimony, was conclusive in proceedings to review contempt judgment based on modification of award of alimony.

11. Divorce 🔑236—Agreement between spouses for alimony was not binding upon trial court in divorce suit (Civ. Code, § 139).

Court, in trial of divorce action, was not bound by stipulation between husband and wife, in so far as it concerned award of alimony, since agreements between spouses in this regard are subject to court's power to modify or reject, under Civ. Code, § 139.

12. Divorce 🔑286—Where interlocutory divorce decree differed from agreement between spouses relative to alimony, it was presumed on review of contempt proceedings court refused to approve agreement (Civ. Code, § 139).

Where interlocutory divorce decree did not follow agreement between spouses relative to alimony, it was presumed, in proceedings to review contempt judgment based on modification of award of alimony, that trial court refused to approve of agreement under power given it by Civ. Code, § 139, even if the agreement was introduced in evidence.

13. Divorce 🔑269(11)—Evidence in contempt proceedings held to support finding that husband was possessed of sufficient means to satisfy alimony award.

Evidence in contempt proceedings held to sustain finding that husband was possessed of sufficient means to satisfy award of alimony fixed by final decree in divorce suit.

Application by Sidney V. Smith, Jr., for writ of certiorari to be directed to the Superior Court of Yuba County, Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge thereof, and others, to review a judgment of contempt for violation of a divorce decree awarding alimony. Writ denied, and judgment of contempt affirmed so far as it involves petitioner's refusal to obey the decree.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an application for a writ of review for the purpose of having reviewed, annulled, and set aside a proceeding and the judgment therein entered adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt of court, in that he violated a certain order of the respondent court fixing and awarding alimony to be paid to one Elaine T. Smith by the petitioner in an action for divorce in said court between the former and the latter.

From the petition and the return thereto the general facts may be taken and stated as follows: The petitioner and said Elaine T. Smith intermarried on the 4th day of June, 1917. Three children were born to said parties, as the issue of said intermarriage, one son and two daughters, who were minors at the time of the trial of the action culminating in the divorcement of the parties. On or about the 24th day of June, 1926, an appeal was pending from the judgment in a certain action (the nature of which is not clearly made to appear by this record, but it is fairly inferable that it was an action for maintenance) between Elaine T. Smith, plaintiff, and the petitioner here as defendant, and at the same time there was pending in the respondent court an action for divorce, instituted by said Elaine against the petitioner on the 24th day of June, 1926. The grounds upon which the divorce was sought by plaintiff in said action were willful neglect and extreme cruelty. It was alleged therein that the parties separated on the 5th day of June, 1926, and also that "there is no community property existing between plaintiff and defendant." By his answer, which was filed the day the complaint was filed, the petitioner admitted all the allegations of the complaint but those charging willful neglect and cruelty, and those he denied. Said action came on for trial before the court, sitting without a jury, on the 24th day of June, 1926, and an interlocutory decree was entered declaring the plaintiff, Elaine T. Smith, to be entitled to a divorce from the petitioner here, Sidney V. Smith. After so declaring and disposing of the matter of the custody of the three minor children of the parties, said decree proceeded:

> "It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that, commencing with the 1st day of July, 1926, and on the 1st day of each and every month thereafter, continuing for a period of one year, or twelve months, defendant Sidney V. Smith, Jr., shall pay to plaintiff as alimony the sum of $100."

The petition alleges that, on the 24th day of June, 1926, the parties entered into a written stipulation with reference to the disposition the court might make of the custody of their minor children by and in its interlocutory decree, in the event that such a decree was entered upon sufficient competent testimony; that, at the same time, said parties entered into a further written agreement as follows:

> "That, in consideration of the dismissal of the appeal heretofore taken on the judgment obtained by the wife against him in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Yuba, and his agreement not to seek repayment of any moneys heretofore paid by him to the wife under said judgment, the wife hereby releases and discharges the husband from all claims and demands of every kind and nature, whether for moneys owing or to any community property or alleged community property in his possession or control, or for alimony, or for maintenance or support heretofore accrued or hereafter to accrue, and for said consideration the wife further agrees that the husband may have undisturbed the custody and control of the children of the parties."

On June 6, 1927, the said Elaine T. Smith served the petitioner herein with written notice that she intended to and would apply to the respondent court for an order modifying the interlocutory decree, in so far as it related to the award of alimony to said Elaine, fixing and awarding to her the sum of $250 per month "as and for permanent alimony, commencing on the 1st day of July, 1927, and continuing thereafter monthly, until the further order of said court," and also would apply for a further order requiring the petitioner to pay said Elaine $250 "as and for her counsel fees and such allowance for costs as might be necessary to pay the expenses of the proceedings upon said motion." On the 19th day of September, 1927, pursuant to said notice, counsel for said Elaine moved the court for the modification and for counsel fees, as indicated in said notice, and thereafter, and on the 21st day of October, 1927, respondent court made and entered an order modifying the order contained in the interlocutory decree relating to alimony by fixing and allowing alimony to said Elaine and directing that the same be paid by the petitioner herein to the former, the sum of $175 per month, "payable monthly, commencing on the 1st day of July, 1927, and monthly thereafter until the further order of said court, and further allowing to the said Elaine T. Smith the sum of $200 as and for attorneys' fees in said proceeding; * * * and it is further ordered that the provisions of said order be incorporated in and be made a part of the final decree of divorce." Thereafter, and on the 24th day of October, 1927, said court made and entered its final decree of divorce in said action, and included in said decree the order modifying the interlocutory decree as to alimony. The petition alleges that the petitioner refused and "wholly failed to pay or comply with said attempted and purported order for the payment of alimony and counsel fees" provided in the said modified order and in the final decree, and that on the 4th day of November, 1927, the respondent, Hon. K. S. Mahon, judge presiding pro tempore in and for the respondent court, "made and issued an order directing petitioner herein to appear before said court, on November 14, 1927, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day to show cause, if any he might have, why he should not be punished for contempt of said court for failure" to comply with the terms of the final decree as to alimony; that, on said day, petitioner appeared before said court and said judge pro tempore, and that, examining the petitioner upon his oath and the evidence, oral and documentary, introduced in said proceeding, the petitioner was found and adjudged guilty of contempt for refusal and failure to comply with the mandates of said order of modification contained in the final decree of divorce as to alimony and counsel fees, and his refusal and failure to pay all sums claimed to be then due under the terms of said modified order, and ordered petitioner to be committed to the custody of the sheriff of Yuba county for imprisonment in the county jail of said county until payment in full of said moneys so purporting to be due should be made by him; that thereafter the respondent court and respondent judge pro tempore made a further order "substantially to the same effect, except that petitioner was therein found and declared to be able to pay the moneys therein mentioned." It is alleged in the petition that, upon the examination of petitioner and from the other evidence received in said contempt proceedings, it was shown that petitioner is without financial means or the ability to pay said money or any money which might become due under the order modifying the original order fixing and awarding alimony to said Elaine T. Smith.

The return consists of the entire record of the proceedings had on the citation for contempt. The order adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt and committing him to imprisonment in the county jail because of such contempt is in the following language:

> "And it further appearing to this court that on the 21st day of October, 1927, the above-entitled court duly made and entered its order requiring the defendant above named to pay to the plaintiff, commencing as of the date July 1, 1927, the sum of $175 per month, payable monthly, as permanent alimony, and the further sum of $200 as and for her counsel fees, and that said order was duly entered by the clerk of the court on the 21st day of October, 1927, and that said defendant ever since said time has wholly failed and refused and still does fail and refuse to comply with the order of the court aforesaid, without any just or legal ground or cause to show why he has not complied with such order of this court, and defendant at all of the times mentioned was and he now is able to pay the sums of money so ordered by this court, and it further appearing to this court that there is now due under the terms of said order as aforesaid to the plaintiff from said defendant the sum of $875 on account of permanent alimony, and the sum of $200 as and for her counsel fees:
> "Wherefore, the court finds that, because thereof, said defendant, Sidney V. Smith, Jr., is guilty of contempt of this court; and it is adjudged that, unless said defendant pay to the plaintiff within five days the sum of $1,075, the amount due plaintiff under said order, as aforesaid, it is adjudged that said defendant, Sidney V. Smith, Jr., be punished for such contempt by imprisonment in the county jail of the county of Yuba, state of California, until such time as he fully complies with said order."

[1, 2] The sole office of the writ of review, as is obvious from the description of that writ by our Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068), is to try the question of jurisdiction in a particular case—that is, to examine the question whether any tribunal exercising judicial functions has in a given instance exceeded its lawful jurisdiction. It is not, nor could it be, disputed that the superior court or any court may punish as for contempt the violation of any order, judgment, or mandate of any nature which such court by the law is vested with the jurisdiction to make, pronounce, enter, or issue, and may, where a judgment of contempt of its processes has been made and entered, impose a sentence of imprisonment, or a fine, or both, upon the offending party (Code Civ. Proc. § 1218), or may, as in the present case, employ the power to punish for contempt as a coercive measure to compel the performance of an act enjoined by a judgment or order which it has the lawful jurisdiction to make by imprisoning the offender until he complies with such order or judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 1219. It is the general rule that, when it is found and determined that the tribunal whose judgment or act is under examination through the agency of said writ has remained within the bounds of its lawful jurisdiction in rendering the judgment or doing the act thus attacked, the inquiry is at an end, although it may appear that error or irregularities were committed in arriving at the result complained of.

[3, 4] But the rule as thus stated must be understood as being subject to this qualification: That, even where, under the law, the tribunal is vested with jurisdiction of and over certain matters or subjects, yet, before it can perform an act or make and enter an order or a judgment in the exercise of its general jurisdiction of and over such matters or subjects there must first be made to appear the jurisdictional facts essential thereto. While the superior courts have jurisdiction to hear and determine as at nisi prius issues of fact and law in all cases which are not by law made cognizable by the courts inferior thereto, no one would for a moment hold that said courts would have jurisdiction to hear and determine such cases in the absence of pleadings or the formal presentation or the tendering of the issues of fact or of law to be tried. So, in cases of contempt the essential jurisdictional facts must be shown to exist before a court, in the exercise of the general jurisdiction conferred upon it by law, can acquire the right to exercise such general jurisdiction in a given or particular case. These general observations result from the contention of counsel for the respondents to the effect that, since admittedly the respondent court has the jurisdiction, not alone conferred by law but inherently, to protect, maintain, and preserve its dignity or enforce obedience to its processes by proceedings in contempt, there cannot legally be a review of the proceedings below, in so far as is concerned the question of the sufficiency of the proofs to uphold the order or judgment of contempt or the question of the legal propriety of the evidence upon which the order or judgment was and is predicated or other errors which may have been committed in conducting the investigation. As to the question of the admissibility of evidence or other errors committed in the trial of the issue, counsel for respondents is right. As to the other proposition, as stated, he is in error. And what counsel for the petitioner contend here is, not that the court is not clothed with power to hear and determine proceedings in contempt of its decrees, orders, or processes, but that the jurisdictional facts essential to the upholding of the order or judgment of contempt in the present case were not shown at the hearing thereof. In truth, the simple question in effect is whether the proofs support the judgment.

Several propositions in support of the petition herein are urged. Stated in the order in which they are presented in the briefs filed on behalf of the petitioner they are: (1) That the respondent court was without jurisdiction to award counsel fees for professional services rendered on behalf of Elaine T. Smith in the proceeding for the modification of the alimony clause in the interlocutory decree. (2) That, this being so, the judgment for contempt must fall, since the petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt for refusing to do two things, conjunctively set forth in the final decree, to wit: To pay the accumulated alimony under the modified order as to alimony, and to pay counsel fees of $200 awarded for legal services rendered Elaine T. Smith in the application for further alimony. The argument as to this is that, where two distinct acts are required by the order or the decree to be done or performed and they are therein stated in the conjunctive form, and one of such acts was beyond the jurisdiction of the court to require to be done, the entire judgment purporting to be predicated upon the order or judgment requiring both acts to be performed is invalid, even if it be true that it was within the jurisdiction of the court to order one of such acts to be performed, since, as counsel argue, "the word 'and' required both (the acts ordered to be done) to be valid before the order of contempt based upon both would be valid," citing Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 209, 212, 22 P. 1137. (3) That, in fixing and awarding alimony in the interlocutory decree the court exhausted its jurisdiction to make any further order or adjudication as to alimony for the wife. (4) That the evidence shows that the petitioner is without financial means or property from which he can secure the means necessary to enable him to pay the amount awarded.

[5, 6] 1. So much of the modifying order allowing Elaine T. Smith the sum of $200 as counsel fees for the professional services of her attorney for inaugurating and prosecuting the proceeding eventuating in the making of said order is void, for the reason that the professional services for which said allowance was made were fully performed before the awarding of such fees. In other words, the fees were allowed for past professional services, and the court in divorce cases or proceedings arising therein collaterally or otherwise is without jurisdiction to award counsel fees after the professional services have been performed. Civ. Code, § 137. So much of said section as is pertinent here provides:

> "When an action for divorce is pending, the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself and her children, or to prosecute or defend the action."

Of course, it will not be doubted that the situation presented here falls within the reason underlying the foregoing language of said section. Our higher courts have uniformly held, in construing said section, that the award of attorneys' fees to the wife in divorce actions or for maintenance without a divorce must be made prior to the performance of the services, compensation for which is asked; the reason given being that such an allowance for past services are "clearly not necessary to enable the wife * * * to prosecute * * * the action." Lacey v. Lacey, 108 Cal. 45, 46, 40 P. 1056; Stampfli v. Stampfli, 53 Cal. App. 126, 132, 199 P. 829; Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 494, 35 P. 87; Wickland v. Wickland, 19 Cal. App. 562, 126 P. 507; Sheppard v. Sheppard, 15 Cal. App. 619, 115 P. 751.

[7] 2. There is no merit in the proposition that, because the order allowing counsel fees is invalid, the entire modifying order and consequently the judgment of contempt based thereon are invalid. The central object of the application for a modification of the interlocutory decree was to secure an increase in the amount of alimony awarded the wife and to make it permanent, or until otherwise ordered by the court. The application for counsel's fees was merely incidental thereto. Both matters are, in their nature, so far as the effect thereof is concerned, entirely separate and distinct. They were not interdependent. The jurisdiction of the court to award alimony was in no sense dependent upon whether the court had jurisdiction to award counsel fees. There is nothing ambiguous in the language of the order. It is plainly manifest that the court intended to make both awards, and that it succeeded in making a valid order as to alimony but failed, for technical legal reasons, to make the other. It seems to us that it would be carrying technicality to a most unreasonable extreme to hold that the fact that the futile attempt to award counsel's fees has the effect of destroying the validity of the order as to alimony. The case of Kraner v. Halsey, supra, held that, as one of the grounds of the demurrer to the complaint was stated conjunctively, viz. that said complaint was "uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible," all three grounds would have to exist to justify an order sustaining the demurrer. We do not think that that case is in point here.

[8] 3. The allowance made by the court in its interlocutory decree as for alimony for the support of Elaine T. Smith, wife of the petitioner, for a specified period was not conclusive, or, in other words, the court's power in that particular was not exhausted by reason of the provision in said decree for the support of the wife. In Tayian v. Tayian, 64 Cal. App. 632, 636, 222 P. 377, 378, it is said:

> "Alimony merely means provision for the support of the wife in cases of divorce, either temporary or permanent, as the exigencies of the case [may] warrant. * * * It is an incident of divorce. Divorce or separation without divorce and alimony spring from the same root, to wit, the marriage relation. It has repeatedly been held that the right of a court to allow alimony in actions for divorce may proceed from its inherent power to make such provision in such cases and therefore the court could make an allowance of alimony in the absence of express statutory authority for such action. (Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 87, 90, 91, 118 P. 445.)"

See Duss v. Duss (Fla.) 111 So. 382, 383. There is, however, in section 139 of the Civil Code authority for the exercise by the superior courts of a broad discretion in such matters. So much of said section as is directly pertinent to the present consideration reads:

> "Where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support, during her life, or for a shorter period, as the court may deem just, having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively; and the court may, from time to time, modify its orders in these respects."

The divorce here was "granted for an offense of the husband." Speaking of this section of the Code, it is said in Soule v. Soule, 4 Cal. App. 97, 100, 87 P. 205, 206:

> "This statutory provision enters into every decree in an action for divorce which provides for the payment by the husband of an allowance for the support of the wife, as fully as though it should be incorporated into the terms of the decree. The authority of the court to modify its decree in this respect does not depend upon a reservation therefor in the decree itself, but exists by virtue of a statute, and, being conferred upon it by the Legislature, it is beyond its power to divest itself of such authority. Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 706."

Again, in the same case, it is further said:

> "The section of the Code places no limitation upon the extent to which it may make such modification; the principle upon which the authority is to be exercised being that which determines its original order, viz. that the allowance to be made by the order as modified shall be such as the court may deem just, 'having regard to the circumstances of the case.' Under this section it may modify its former order either by increasing or reducing the amount of money to be paid at any one time, or enlarging or diminishing the frequency with which the payments are to be made. Neither is the authority to modify the decree limited by the section to a mere change in the amount of the allowance to be paid, but it includes a modification of the order in any respect which, under the circumstances of the particular case, may seem just to the court."

To like effect is Gates v. Gates, 54 Cal. App. 407, 202 P. 151; the opinion being prepared by late Justice Burnett, and approved by the Supreme Court by a denial of a hearing by that court. Therein the following language, cogently pertinent to the present case, is used:

> "That the interlocutory judgment had become final before the modification was made does not render said section 139 inapplicable. The provision rests upon the theory that the trial court has a continuing jurisdiction in reference to such award. Its authority is not exhausted by the original order, nor is it foreclosed by the expiration of the time for an appeal. It is equally plain that the court is not required by express provision to reserve the authority to modify the award in order to justify such action. The language of said section becomes a part of the original order as though written therein. The section itself reserves to the court the authority to modify the allowance."

See, in addition to the authorities above considered herein, cases cited in the footnotes of 1 California Jurisprudence, at pages 1032 and 1033.

It is true that "there is no statutory authority giving the court jurisdiction to modify a divorce decree by the allowance of alimony where originally no provision was made therefor. * * * There can be no modification of an allowance for alimony where there is no allowance to modify it." 1 Cal. Jur. p. 1035, § 85, and cases therein cited. But where, as here, there is such a provision in the interlocutory decree jurisdiction over the matter of alimony as well as that of the persons of the parties is continuing. See opinion by Mr. Justice Richards in the very recent case of Moore v. Superior Court in and for City and County of San Francisco (Cal. Sup.) 263 P. 1009. Of course, the provision in the interlocutory decree adjusting "the property rights" of the parties does not involve also a definitive settlement of the matter of the wife's support.

[9, 10] The stipulation entered into between the petitioner and his wife, agreeing that the court might award the custody of their minor children as specified therein, and also that he would pay to his wife, in case the latter was granted a divorce, a specified monthly sum for the period of a year, and which stipulation was in effect adopted by the court in its interlocutory decree, cannot reasonably be construed as a settlement of the matter of alimony for all time, or as divesting the court oi jurisdiction of changing the order or decree after the expiration of the year during which the life of the stipulation was to exist, whenever circumstances were in an appropriate manner brought to its attention. The stipulation did not provide for a "lump" sum, but merely that the particular amount specified was to be paid each and every month for the period of one year, still leaving it to the court, in the exercise of its continuing jurisdiction of and over the matter of alimony, and of the parties, to increase or decrease the amount so awarded, or entirely expunge from the decree the provision awarding alimony according as its discretion, regulated by the circumstances presented, might justify or require. The respondent court, in making the modified order, thus construed the stipulation, and, even if it were necessary to concede that the language of the document was ambiguous in the particular in which it has been here considered (and we think it is not), such construction would be and is conclusive upon this court.

[11, 12] As to the written agreement above quoted herein, there is no showing in the return to the writ herein sought that it was introduced in evidence at the trial of the divorce action. Counsel for respondents, in his brief, states that it was not so introduced, and this statement is not denied. But, assuming that it was so introduced, the court was not bound by it in the matter of awarding alimony. Agreements between the spouses relative to alimony or fixing by and between themselves the amount which the court may allow are subject to the power of the court, under section 139 of the Civil Code, to modify or wholly reject, as provided in said section. Mathews v. Mathews, 55 Cal. App. 661, 662, 204 P. 27; Hughes v. Hughes, 68 Cal. App. 195, 228 P. 675; Greene v. Greene, 260 P. 845. See note Jennison v. Jennison (33 Ind. App. 275, 71 N. E. 244) Ann. Cas. 1912C, 441. The interlocutory decree, as is obvious, did not follow the agreement referred to, and therefore the presumption is, even if the agreement was introduced in evidence at the trial of the suit for divorce, that the trial court refused to approve or follow it in fixing and awarding alimony.

[13] 4. The respondent court had before it ample evidence, both direct and circumstantial, to support its implied finding that the petitioner was possessed of sufficient means to satisfy the award of alimony as made in the final decree. The affidavit of Elaine T. Smith upon which the citation for contempt was issued alleges, among other things, that petitioner, on numerous occasions, after the modified order was made and incorporated in the final decree, stated to affiant that "he would not pay the sums of money so ordered by the court to be paid by him to plaintiff (Elaine T. Smith) or any part thereof to affiant." The petitioner, in his counter affidavit, denied that he ever made such statements to said Elaine, or any other person, on any occasion, "or at all."

It is not necessary to present herein any extended statement of the evidence bearing upon the ability of the petitioner to pay the alimony fixed in and by the final decree. It was shown that petitioner was a beneficiary under a testamentary trust created by his deceased mother; that the California National Bank Association, in San Francisco, and Felix T. Smith, brother of petitioner, are the trustees of the trust and the property thereof; that the annual income from said property, prior to and at the time of the hearing of this proceeding by the respondent court amounted to the sum of $29,000, of which the petitioner was entitled to be paid as his share seven twenty-fourths, or a little in excess of $8,000 annually, in monthly installments or payments. It also appears that the trustee bank was the trustee under a testamentary trust created by the deceased father of petitioner. The trust officer of the bank trustee testified that petitioner was indebted to the estate of his father in the sum of $50,000, evidenced by promissory notes; that the trustees of the estate of the mother of petitioner paid to the latter the share of the income to which he was entitled from said estate regularly up to and including the month of November, 1926, at which time they paid petitioner the sum of $7,250; that the witness and the brother of petitioner, the cotrustee of the bank of the mother's estate, after consultation subsequent to the entry of the final decree of divorce, decided that they would not make petitioner further payments on his share of the income from his mother's estate, but would apply such income to the payment of petitioner's indebtedness to his father's estate, and continue so to do until the indebtedness was extinguished. The trustees, it appears, paid the alimony for the support of Elaine T. Smith and their children provided for in the interlocutory decree out of petitioner's share of the income.

It was further shown that petitioner had a life estate in and possession of a 600-acre ranch in Yuba county; that wine grapes were grown by him on 80 or 100 acres thereof; that, although the trustees of the father's estate held a mortgage on the crops produced thereon and the implements of husbandry as security for his indebtedness to said estate, they not only paid the taxes on the ranch but permitted petitioner to receive and use for his personal purposes the proceeds from the sale of the grapes and other products of the ranch, while also at the same time paying him his share in monthly installments of the income from his mother's estate.

Further specific reference to the evidence will not be made. It is sufficient to say, as to the witnesses for the petitioner whose testimony has above been briefly considered, that neither on their direct nor cross examination did they give a reasonable or any satisfactory explanation of the reason for so suddenly, after the final decree was entered, deciding to appropriate the petitioner's income entirely to the payment of the debt he owed his father's estate; that they wholly failed satisfactorily to explain why they permitted the petitioner to use for his own individual purposes the income from the crops produced on his 600-acre ranch when, at the same time, such crops, together with the implements of husbandry used on said ranch, were under mortgage to his father's estate to secure payment of the indebtedness to said estate. These, and other considerations arising from the evidence, which need not to be mentioned here, would seem clearly to have justified the remark of the judge, when reviewing the evidence in this proceeding, in deciding the issue herein, that the circumstances so developed plainly warranted the conclusion that the whole scheme was in furtherance of petitioner's asseverations which Mrs. Smith testified that he had in effect made to her that he did not intend to pay the alimony provided for in the final decree. Moreover, the award of alimony constituted one of the most sacred of contractual obligations—sacred because it is the creation of a solemn decree of a court of justice, sacred because it is an obligation to furnish support for the indigent and physically incapacitated (as the evidence shows) mother of the petitioner's children, the woman to whom, under the most sacred circumstances, he pledged his unswerving fealty and love for all human time, a pledge the destruction of the force of which was the product of his own offense. If the large income was to be used for the payment of his debts, why not have included in the schedule this all-important and pressing debt, of which the trustees were in possession of full knowledge. All these matters the respondent court undoubtedly considered in adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt. It must be conceded that they were of overwhelming evidentiary force in the determination of the issue.

The order to show cause is discharged, and the judgment of contempt, in so far as it involves the contumacious conduct of the petitioner in failing and refusing to obey that part of the final decree of divorce awarding alimony to Elaine T. Smith, plaintiff in the divorce action, is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.[1] All the points made in the petition for a rehearing are substantially the same as those made on the first hearing hereof. We are satisfied with the conclusions announced in the original opinion as to said points. There is disclosed by this record sufficient evidence to support the implied finding of the respondent court that the petitioner is possessed of ample means to pay the alimony allowed.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

PERRY v. A. PALADINI, Inc., et al.
(Civ. 6224.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 16, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⚷332(1)—Evidence of defendant's ownership of truck and drivers' agency held sufficient to necessitate submission of question to jury.

In action for personal injuries resulting from negligence in operation of motortruck, evidence held sufficient to create real conflict necessitating submission of questions of defendant's ownership of truck and agency of driver to jury.

2. Evidence ⚷75—It is presumed that evidence in possession of party who fails to produce it is adverse to his contention.

When it is shown that evidence which would explain transaction or show its true nature is in possession or available to a party, and he fails or neglects to produce it, it is presumed that such evidence, if produced, would be adverse to his contention.

3. Master and servant ⚷332(1)—Sufficiency of defendant's evidence to controvert inference of driver's agency following defendant's ownership of truck held for jury.

In action for personal injuries resulting from negligent operation of motortruck, whether defendant motortruck owner's controverting evidence was substantial controversion of inference of driver's agency following ownership of truck held question for jury.

[1] The balance of this per curiam corrected the opinion of Feb. 9, 1928, published above, which corrections have been incorporated in that opinion.

4. Master and servant ⚷330(3)—Prima facie case of truck driver's agency for owner stands in absence of "substantial" contrary proof.

In action for personal injuries arising from negligent operator of motortruck prima facie case of driver's agency for owner of truck will stand, in absence of substantial proof to contrary; term "substantial" including terms "credible" and "trustworthy."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Substantial.]

5. Appeal and error ⚷994(2), 1005(1)—Weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses are primarily for jury and next for trial judge.

Throughout procedure of trial and review, accepted rule is that questions of weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses are primarily for jury and next for trial judge.

6. Appeal and error ⚷1005(1)—Appellate court cannot, without positive showing, hold that error has been committed, where both jury and trial judge refuse to credit witnesses.

Where both jury and trial judge refuse to credit witnesses or accept as true evidence adduced, appellate court cannot, without positive showing, hold that error has been committed.

7. Evidence ⚷53—Presumptions are recognized as inferences, but are of somewhat greater strength, being deductions which law directs.

Presumptions are recognized as inferences, but of somewhat greater strength, by reason of being deductions which law directs or draws itself.

8. Evidence ⚷87—Disputable presumption is sufficient as proof, in absence of contradiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

In case of disputable presumption within Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, all law intends is that, in absence of contradiction, it is satisfactory.

9. Trial ⚷127—Generally it is not permissible to show that automobile owner is insured against liability.

As general proposition, in action for damages arising from negligent operation of automobile, it is not permissible to show that owner is insured against liability.

10. Master and servant ⚷330(2)—Evidence that defendant denying ownership of truck causing injuries had liability insurance on truck held admissible to show ownership.

In action for damages arising from negligent operation of truck, where defendant denied ownership of truck, evidence that defendant had taken out liability insurance on truck held admissible to show defendant's ownership.

11. Appeal and error ⚷171(1)—Where case is tried on certain definite theory, appellate court will review record accordingly.

Where case is tried before a court on a certain definite theory, appellate court will review record accordingly.

12. Appeal and error ⚷1050(1)—Testimony of truck driver's statements after accident as to ownership of truck, if improperly admitted as original evidence, held not prejudicial; being admissible to impeach driver.

In action for damages arising from personal injuries sustained by negligent operation of truck, where ownership of truck was in issue, plaintiff's testimony as to statements made by driver shortly after accident respecting ownership of truck, if improperly admitted as original and independent evidence or as res gestæ, held not prejudicial to defendant, since testimony was admissible to impeach driver's testimony that he did not recall making any such statements.

13. Appeal and error ⚷1170(1)—Appellate court must affirm judgment when defendant's claims, given fullest strength, do not result in slightest suspicion of miscarriage of justice (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where appellate court is satisfied that defendant's claims, when given their fullest strength, do not result in slightest suspicion of miscarriage of justice, Const. art. 6, § 4½, limits its power to do other than affirm judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Frank O. Perry against A. Paladini, Inc., and others, for damages for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel W. Hone, Derby, Single & Sharp, Joseph C. Sharp, and Lloyd M. Tweedt, all of San Francisco (Loring Davis, of counsel), for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford and Cyril Appel, both of San Francisco (Ivores R. Dains, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought action against defendants to recover for damages resulting from personal injuries sustained by him through the negligence of defendants. In the court below, plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant A. Paladini, Inc., a corporation, and from this judgment said defendant presents the appeal. Included in the review is the lower court's order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

The question here presented centers about the liability of appellant corporation. For the purposes hereof, certain facts are conceded. It is admitted that plaintiff did receive injuries as the result of the negligence of one Raymond Zanetta in the operation of a certain automobile truck. It is conceded that plaintiff was without contributory negligence, and no claim is made that the damages awarded are excessive. It is the contention of appellant that it was not the owner of the truck driven by Zanetta, nor was it in any manner connected with or interested in the operation of the truck. Aside from attacking the sufficiency of the evidence on the issue, appellant further contends that the court below erred in its rulings on the admissibility of certain testimony offered. The evidence adduced by plaintiff in fastening a liability upon appellant may be detailed.

[1] Alexander Paladini is and was at all of the times involved herein the president of A. Paladini, Inc., a corporation, with its main place of business at 542 Clay street in the city and county of San Francisco. Said Alexander Paladini made application to the division of motor vehicles of California for registration of the truck in question, and in the said application the name of the applicant was given as A. Paladini Company with address at 540 Clay street, San Francisco, which latter address was that of a mat-making concern and not in anywise connected with the Paladini Company or Paladini, Inc. In this application for registration the name of the legal owner was set forth as A. Paladini Company. Indorsed on the application and as a part thereof was the report of sale of registered dealer. This report shows that one De Maetini, a licensed motor car dealer, on June 7, 1923, sold to A. Paladini the truck therein described. The registration certificate for 1924 showed registration in the name of A. Paladini & Co., 540 Clay street, and in the spaces reserved therefor appears the name "A. Paladini, Inc.," as registered owner, and "A. Paladini, Inc.," as legal owner, signed by J. Chicca, the acknowledged secretary of said corporation. Thereafter a policy of insurance was issued to A. Paladini Company or to A. Paladini, Inc., covering said truck during the years 1923 and 1924. The state of the record here is as indicated, not specifying whether the insurance policy issued to Paladini Company or Paladini, Inc.

Such are the facts set up to and including the time of the accident. After the date of the accident there appears a transfer or sale of the truck in question. The sale is evidenced, as required by the Motor Vehicle Act of this state, by indorsement of the certificate of ownership issued by the division of motor vehicles. On the face of this certificate of ownership the signature of registered owner is "A. Paladini, Inc., by J. Chicca." On the back of this certificate of ownership is shown the transfer of the truck. In the transfer designated as registered owner appears "A. Paladini, Inc., by J. Chicca, secretary," and likewise is the corporation specified as legal owner. This certificate of transfer was received by the division of motor vehicles in June, 1924, some months after the date of the accident involved herein. The transfer was to E. F. Zanetta, codefendant. In rebuttal of this evidence of ownership defendants' explanation was to the effect that neither A. Paladini, Inc., nor Alex Paladini had any interest in the truck. Alex Paladini testified that one E. F. Zanetta was and had been a personal friend of his; that Zanetta had some little financial reverses, and that he (Paladini) made a loan of $1,000 to him, to apply as first payment on the truck. This ended Paladini's connection with the affair. He did testify, however, that the $1,000 was paid by check of the corporation, and upon inquiry it was learned that the canceled check had been lost; in some way even the check stub had vanished. This witness Paladini testified further that he did not know anything about the insurance. Further, the appellant claimed that the $1,000 was simply as an initial payment, and that Zanetta took the car under contract to pay out the balance of the purchase price, not disclosed. There was nothing to evidence the indebtedness of Zanetta either to Paladini or to the corporation, and the books of the corporation were not produced. The dealer, from whom the car was purchased, was not called as a witness. It is fair to assume that, had there been a conditional sale on contract, the dealer would have a demonstrative record thereof or at least sufficient memory of events from which to testify. It may be added that the truck referred to throughout is the truck involved in the accident which forms the basis of this action.

On this branch of the case, without further detail, we conclude that the evidence was abundantly sufficient to support a conclusion that A. Paladini, Inc., appellant, was the owner of the truck at the time of the accident.

We deem it important, for what might follow, to state further that the character of testimony adduced by appellant on this subject was such as to warrant the jury in the belief that the same was sham and evasive and unworthy of belief.

Appellant in its further argument makes the concession that the ownership is sufficiently shown, but that mere ownership of the truck is not sufficient to fasten liability upon the owner. It is argued that proof of ownership is put prima facie that at the time in question the truck was employed in the business of the owner, and that, when this prima facie evidence is controverted, the one seeking to fasten the liability through mere proof of ownership must go further and show additional facts sufficient to prove his case aside from the presumption. Before discussing the rule of law invoked, we will narrate the additional facts going to establish liability.

A. Paladini, Inc., is a corporation engaged in the handling and distribution of fresh fish as a wholesaler. It has a place of business in San Francisco and also in Monterey, between which said places is maintained a generally traveled and much-used highway or boulevard. The driver of the truck at the time of the accident was one

Raymond Zanetta, who at a time previous to the date of the accident was in the employ of A. Paladini, Inc., and who for ten months preceding the trial and at the time of the trial was in the employ of said concern. At the time of the accident, the truck was loaded with fish crates or fish boxes, and the scene of the accident was on the highway between San Francisco and Monterey. At the time of the accident—conceding it to be a point of time sufficiently remote to exclude it being a part of the res gestæ—the driver of the truck stated he was hauling fish for Paladini and gave to a public officer the card of Paladini.

Summarizing the evidence of plaintiff, we have these facts: The truck of appellant, engaged in a business similar to that of the appellant, at a place where the appellant would usually be engaged in the conduct of his business, and being operated by one who previous to the accident and subsequent thereto was in the employ of appellant. It will thus be noted that plaintiff went much beyond the establishing of a prima facie case resting upon mere ownership.

As against this, appellant sought to show the loan transaction negativing ownership. Then he produced a brother of the truck driver, and this witness testified that he was engaged in a general trucking business hauling fish from Monterey to San Francisco, and that in his business he served many wholesale fish dealers, including Paladini, that he was the sole owner of the truck involved, and that the driver was in his employ. This witness was named Ernest Zanetta. Appellant produced a number of dealers who testified that Ernest Zanetta had hauled fish for them at various times, and had presented bills in his own name therefor. Ernest Zanetta also testified that neither Paladini nor A. Paladini, Inc., had any interest in his business or in the truck, and that the driver of the truck was employed by, under the direction of, and solely engaged in the business conducted by, Ernest Zanetta. He produced no evidence of wage payments and no evidence of contract payments upon the truck. The driver likewise testified that he was in the employ of Ernest Zanetta.

Conceding that Ernest Zanetta had conducted or even was conducting an independent trucking business, we have simply his statement and the statement of Paladini and the driver, both interested parties, that he (Ernest Zanetta) was the owner of the truck involved and the employer of the driver. We are satisfied that the evidence was sufficient to create a real conflict sufficient to submit both questions of ownership and agency to the jury, and we will not disturb the conclusion reached on these issues.

[2] It suggests itself easily that the claims of appellant could have been proved by competent evidence readily available. For instance, the motorcar dealer who first sold the truck would have some evidence of the later payments if the sale had been one on deferred payments. The records of A. Paladini, Inc., in the usual course of business would have shown the charge to Ernest Zanetta on the loan as testified to by Paladini. The records of the insurance company would have shown the application for insurance and the circumstances surrounding the policy, which said policy, appellant argues in his brief, would have been void "if the interest of the subscriber in the property be other than unconditional and sole ownership." As a matter of giving weight to testimony, it is a cardinal rule that when it is shown that evidence which would explain a transaction or show its true nature is in the possession of or available to a party, and he fails or neglects to produce it, it is presumed that such evidence if produced would be adverse to his contention. Sufficient has been stated to apply such principles of law as are contended for.

Appellant's chief contention is, as indicated, the insufficiency of the evidence. Much of the briefs filed are on the question as to the effect of the inferences drawn from proof of ownership. We are called upon to decide this one point, namely, "Is the inference of agency as drawn from the fact of ownership sufficient in itself to create a conflict in the testimony, and prevail as against evidence to the contrary when such evidence produced remains uncontradicted by direct evidence?"

It would serve no useful purpose to attempt herein to outline all of the authority on the subject. The terms "presumption," "inference," and "circumstance" have been used interchangeably throughout almost all of the decisions, and it may be safely said that a state of apparent confusion exists. As indicated before, the record in this case renders it unnecessary for us to speculate upon what would have been the effect if plaintiff had rested upon the mere proof of ownership. In the case of Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 741, 183 P. 361, the entire subject was reviewed. The conclusion reached in that case was as follows:

> "It is not disputed that from the ownership of the automobile the presumption arises that it was being used for appellant's purposes [citing authorities]. But is is claimed that this presumption was no longer of any effect, after the introduction of testimony by witnesses to the contrary, and that the jury could not legally be influenced by it in finding a verdict. It amounts to the contention that said presumption would be sufficient to support the verdict if there were no evidence to the contrary, but it is insufficient in the presence of adverse evidence. We cannot understand how a presumption can be thus changed in its character as evidence. If it is legally sufficient to support a verdict, it must be legally sufficient to create a conflict in the evidence."

In the cited case the court said, referring to the testimony offered by defendant there to overcome the inference arising from proof of ownership:

> "It cannot be said here that the jury was bound to accept the statement of said witnesses as true. Being the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, if the testimony did not carry conviction to their minds, they had the legal right to reject it. We must assume that they did not believe the story, and we cannot say, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the jury acted arbitrarily, or otherwise than in good faith and with an honest purpose. We would not be justified by the record in branding the statement of these witnesses as false, although there are certain circumstances that tend somewhat to discredit it, but we are not in a position to interfere with the jury's discretion in that particular."

The Supreme Court, in acting upon an application to have the matter transferred to that tribunal after determination by the district court, used this very significant language: In denying a rehearing of this case we limit our approval on the question of liability of the owner, to the reason assigned in the opinion and summarized as follows:

> "The question of the alleged agreement with Triggs was submitted to the jury; it was resolved against appellant on conflicting evidence, and this finding cannot be reviewed by this court."

Explanatory, the facts of that case were that the owner of the car sought to show by the testimony of himself and one Triggs, that the car had been loaned to Triggs, and that the owner had not the custody or control thereof at the time of the accident. But the only testimony on the subject was that of the owner of the car and his son and Triggs, all of whom testified that Triggs had borrowed the car and was in complete charge thereof. And the trial court instructed the jury that, whether or not such agreement of loan or arrangement had been made was a question for the jury to decide.

[3, 4] So in the case at bar we conclude that whether or not the evidence of appellant here was to be taken as a substantial controversion of the inference of agency following ownership was a question for the jury to decide. Much has been said by the courts on the effect of the inferences flowing from proof of ownership. Without further extended quotation of authorities, the rule is succinctly stated by Mr. Justice Richards of the Supreme Court in the case of Ransford v. Ainsworth, 196 Cal. 281, 237 P. 748, as follows:

> "There is a proposition of law which is also conceded to be correct by the briefs and arguments of the appellant herein. It is that an inference arises from the foregoing facts [showing ownership by wife] that the husband was the agent of his wife in the driving and operation of her car at the time of said collision and that such inference would be sufficient prima facie to support the verdict herein in the absence of substantial proof, sufficient to destroy such inference."

[5, 6] The doctrine thus announced clearly is to the effect that the prima facie case made will stand in the absence of substantial proof to the contrary. And, as a mere matter of expression the term "substantial" includes the terms "credible" and "trustworthy." But who shall say just which evidence is trustworthy and credible? Throughout the procedure of trial and review the accepted rule is that the questions of weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses are primarily for the jury, and next for the trial judge. Where, as here, both the jury and the trial judge refuse to credit the witnesses or accept as true the evidence adduced, surely without positive showing this court cannot hold that error has been committed and injustice worked on appellant. As we have stated before, and without going into minute details, the jury did have the right to discredit much testimony adduced, and the jury likewise had before them the manifest interest of the various witnesses.

In the case of Ferris v. Sterling, 214 N. Y. 249, 108 N. E. 406, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1161, we find this language:

> " 'The property being proved to belong to the defendant, * * * a presumption arises that it was in use for his benefit, and on his own account.' * * * This presumption was not destroyed, as a matter of law, by the testimony for the defendant. Even though his explanation of the use of the car would absolve him if credited, the question whether it should be credited was one of fact for the jury. * * * *The jury * * * may have thought that witnesses who would falsely disclaim ownership of a car would falsely disclaim responsibility for its management.* These and like considerations were for them."

[7, 8] Elementarily, there are two classes of evidence, direct and indirect, and our Code recognizes both. The law, founded upon human experience, has noted the frequent concurrence of certain facts and the conclusions usually resulting therefrom. From this experience the law has established certain rules defining what are presumptions and what are inferences. These terms are often used interchangeably and with little apparent distinction. Indeed, given a premise from which a certain conclusion flows, and that conclusion being well within human experience as a natural and logical conclusion, it makes little difference whether it be called a presumption or an inference. Presumptions are recognized as inferences but of somewhat greater strength by reason of being deductions which the law directs or draws itself.

But in the case of a disputable presumption, all that the law says or intends is that in the absence of contradiction it is satisfactory. Code Civ. Proc., § 1963. It says the same thing about the inference to be drawn from ownership of an automobile. In concluding this phase of the instant case, we may say that, if we are to hold that the showing here was not sufficient as a matter of law, and that a mere denial by defendant is all that was required to overthrow plaintiff's case, then it is apparent that for years past grave injustice has resulted from the law, because upon facts and circumstances far less convincing in the question in issue many unfortunates have served long prison sentences and some even have suffered the extreme penalty.

[9, 10] The next claim of error upon which appellant urges the reversal of the judgment is the action of the court in admitting testimony showing that the defendant A. Paladini Company was insured. There would seem at first blush some merit to this claim, but upon analysis the seeming error fades away. It is true that as a general proposition in an action of this sort it is not permitted to show that the defendant is insured against liability. Roche v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 140 Cal. 576, 74 P. 147. The same case, however, recognizes the law to be that the rule is not of invariable application, and approves the holding in Barg v. Bousefield, 65 Minn. 355, 68 N. W. 45, to the effect that under certain conditions it is proper to show insurance. However, in the instant case there was no effort to show that the defendant was insured against public or any other liability. The whole extent of the testimony offered was to show that A. Paladini & Co. or A. Paladini, Inc., had procured a policy of insurance upon the truck in question. This evidence was offered to prove ownership and was properly received. Defendant had denied that it was the owner of the truck and had denied knowing anything about an insurance policy, and this testimony had been given by the president, Alex Paladini. It was competent to show every act of ownership on the part of defendant or its officers, and, if results flowed therefrom not anticipated, this is appellant's misfortune, brought about by his own misconduct. It has been a well-established principle of law for many centuries that upon a trial for a particular crime evidence which shows or tends to show the commission of another and distinct crime by a defendant is inadmissible, and it is prejudicial error, to let it go before the jury. This rule has its exceptions, and, where it appears that evidence of the commission of such other crime has a direct and logical bearing upon the guilt of the accused as to the crime with which he is on trial, evidence of the commission of such other offense is admissible. People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 725, 106 P. 65. By analogy the rule as to the instant case should be that, while it is improper and highly prejudicial to allow evidence to be introduced showing a defendant is insured against liability in case of accident, yet evidence of general insurance of certain property by a defendant who denies ownership does have a direct and logical bearing upon that particular question and is therefore admissible. The plaintiff could have gone much further than he did. He would have been permitted upon his insistence to offer in evidence the application for insurance if the same had been executed by defendant or any of its authorized officers. Plaintiff, mindful of the defendant's claim of error, went no further than to show the fact of insurance. Ordinarily men do not insure the property of others; and likewise insurance companies do not usually issue policies covering property to one having no interest therein. And, going still further, insurance companies do not roam around the byways issuing policies at their own instance and without the application of any one. And it may be further noted here that when the evidence was offered plaintiff expressly restricted the offer as "a circumstance proving ownership."

Lastly, appellant contends that the judgment must be reversed because of error in the admission in evidence of certain statements made by the driver of the truck at or about the time of the accident.

In discussing this claim we are confined to the record before us. This appeal is presented under the alternative method, and in a supplement to its opening brief plaintiff presents such portions of the record as he desires to call to the attention of this court. The appellant in his brief merely sets up that error was committed in receiving the evidence, but does not point out what the evidence was. The supplement filed with the opening brief contains the evidence which is sought to be called to our attention, but no references are made to such supplement in the briefs of appellant. However, we have reviewed the supplement and will determine the point as it is urged. The specific error alleged by appellant is thus put:

> "The court erred in admitting the pretended hearsay statement supposed to have been made by the driver after the accident to the effect that he was hauling fish for Paladini."

At the trial, while the plaintiff was on the stand, he testified that immediately after the accident he was taken to a doctor for treatment, and that upon his return to the scene of the accident there still remained quite a few people, including the driver of the truck. The driver was talking to one Schwarz, a deputy constable, who was making some inquiries into the accident. Plaintiff testified then as follows:

"They asked him what he was doing. He said he was hauling fish for Paladini, and he had some fish boxes on his wagon at the time."

Then followed this:

"Mr. Bradley (Counsel for Appellant): We ask that that be stricken in view of our objection and for the reason that the driver has not been identified as the agent.

"The Court: If the matter is not connected up, Mr. Bradley, and it is not shown that he was in the employ of the company and it was not in the course of employment, then the court will grant a motion to strike out the evidence, but a party cannot put in their entire case all at one time. If this man was an employee of the company, then his statement would be competent.

"Mr. Bradley: Otherwise not?

"The Court: Otherwise not."

When Schwarz, the deputy constable, was called, this question was asked him:

"Q. Did you speak to the driver? A. Yes.

"Q. What did you say to him?

"Mr. Bradley: Objected to as not binding on the defendant Paladini Company unless it is shown the driver was in some way connected with them.

"The Court: Overruled."

[11] This much of the record indicates that it was the theory of the case below that if agency were shown the statements were admissible. We do not concede this to be a correct statement of the law, but, if a case is tried before a court on a certain definite theory, we will review the record accordingly. As indicated hereinbefore, we have concluded that the fact of agency was sufficiently shown.

[12] The driver of the truck was called as a witness and denied that he was in the employ of Paladini, Inc. He was not interrogated as to the statement particularly, but testified that he did not recall talking to any one except some person who claimed to be a roadmaster. Another witness for defendant gave testimony that the driver did not have conversation with any one excepting the roadmaster. When the driver denied that he was employed by Paladini it certainly would have been permissible to ask him on cross-examination regarding any statements he may have made contrary to his testimony. While not exactly in point, the case of Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. at p. 653, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703, applies to the instant case. Following the doctrine of that case, plaintiff here could and did make out his case without the statements of the driver. Plaintiff was practically compelled to call the driver as a witness to prove the nature of his employment and the identity of his employer. The statements of the driver, if improperly admitted on the trial as original and independent evidence, still, as by adopting a different order of proof they must unquestionably be admitted as impeaching evidence on another trial, the mere fact that the trial court in admitting them did not fully recognize their true character as impeaching evidence could work no prejudicial injury to appellant. We may concede and readily do that the statement of the driver was no part of the res gestæ, and no claim of admissibility could be urged on that ground. Willard v. Valley Gas & Fuel Co., 171 Cal. 9, 151 P. 286; Froeming v. Stockton Elec. R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 401, 153 P. 712, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 408. However, the statement in no way bore upon the facts of the accident itself, and in no wise reflected itself upon the facts going to disclose negligence on the part of the driver. It had no bearing whatever upon the question of negligence. Its sole effect, if any, was to establish some relationship of agency. It was defendant's claim throughout the trial that this truck often did haul fish for Paladini as well as other people; that it was used in the general trucking business by Ernest F. Zanetta, and the fact that at the time of the accident it might have had a load for Paladini was as consistent with defendant's claim as it was in support of plaintiff's contention. The undisputed evidence also discloses that at the time of the occurrence the registration card showing Paladini Company to be the legal owner of the truck was exhibited in the usual place thereon. Taking all of these facts together, we see no serious harm resulting to appellant from the evidence in view of all the facts of the case.

In conclusion, we think that the case was fully and fairly tried and the verdict amply supported by facts.

With reference to the case of this appellant, we feel in a measure that we can resort to those provisions of law which trial judges are directed to give to juries by section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, and particularly subdivisions 6 and 7 thereof, which are: (6) That evidence is to be estimated not only by its own intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce, etc. (7) That, if weak or less satisfactory evidence is offered when it appears that stronger or more satisfactory was within the power of the party, the evidence offered should be viewed with distrust.

[13] Upon denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the learned trial judge, who had observed all of the witnesses and heard the evidence stated, "The court feels that it is a justified verdict." In this too we concur; and thus agreeing, and from the record before us, we hold that, if the error assigned should be deemed more grevious than we admit, nevertheless the result of the trial would have been no different in the absence of such error. We are satisfied that giving appellant's claims their fullest strength still the result gives not the slightest suspicion of a miscarriage of justice. The Constitution (art. 6, § 4½) limits our power therefore to do other than affirm the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

STANDARD SOAP CO. v. FISHER et al.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 17, 1928.

Corporations 🔑573(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding that bondholder and others did not enter contract with corporation and its president for corporation's reorganization.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding of trial court that holder of corporate bonds and others did not enter alleged contract with corporation and its president to effect reorganization of corporation by means of payments to corporate treasury and issuance of stock.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action for damages for breach of an oral contract brought by the Standard Soap Company and another against Paul Fisher and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jesse Robinson, of Oakland, for appellants.

Henry C. McPike, of Oakland, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages for alleged breach of an oral contract. The complaint, in substance, recites: That on the 16th day of January, 1923, the parties hereto entered into an agreement whereby defendants agreed to pay to plaintiff John M. Simpson the sum of $32,000 and also agreed to pay into the treasury of plaintiff corporation the sum of $25,000, and of this latter sum $12,500 was to be paid by defendant Paul Fisher and a like amount by defendant Julius Wilbur. That defendants likewise agreed to pay into the treasury of plaintiff corporation a sum of money sufficient to cancel or pay off $40,000 of a total bonded indebtedness of $100,000 which was then outstanding against said corporation. That plaintiff John M. Simpson on his behalf agreed to pay into the treasury of plaintiff corporation the sum of $12,500 and further agreed to pay into such treasury a sum of money sufficient to pay off or cancel $60,000 of the said total bonded indebtedness of the company. That the respective sums of $12,500 to be paid by plaintiff Simpson and defendants Fisher and Wilbur were to be used by the corporation for the general purpose of carrying on its business. That it was further agreed by the respective parties that the plaintiff corporation should remain liable to the Mercantile Trust Company for approximately $60,000 on an unsecured indebtedness. That, after the payment of said sums as aforesaid, the corporation was to be reorganized and the entire issue of its capital stock was to consist of 500,000 shares, 250,000 of which was to consist of preferred and a like amount of common stock. That said issue of capital stock was to be divided between Simpson, Fisher, and Wilbur in equal proportions. It is then charged that defendants Fisher and Wilbur failed to perform their part of the agreement, and damages are prayed for in the sum of $85,000. Defendants denied that they ever entered into such agreement and as a separate defense pleaded lack of consideration and in an amended answer set up the statute of frauds.

The trial court found in effect that no contract as alleged was ever entered into between the parties. It is here claimed that the findings are contrary to and not supported by the evidence. There is no merit in appellants' contention. At the trial it was shown that defendant Fisher was the owner of certain bonds in plaintiff corporation. During the year 1922 he called upon plaintiff Simpson, the president of the company, and discussed with him the condition of its business and the probability of collecting the interest on the bonds which he owned. The company was engaged in the manufacture of soap and was heavily indebted. Simpson suggested that Fisher purchase stock in the company. Nothing definite was proposed at this meeting. Some time later Fisher again called upon Simpson, accompanied by defendant Wilbur. The subject of the purchase of stock was again taken up. There is evidence to show that a tentative agreement was presented by Simpson to the defendants containing certain terms upon which he was willing to make a sale. Simpson testified that the parties finally reached an agreement upon the subject, which was essentially one of partnership. Respondent, on the other hand, claims that the alleged agreement was not one by which the parties agreed to enter into a partnership, but, if anything, it was merely an oral agreement to purchase for the sum of $45,000 a two-thirds interest in the capital stock of the corporation, or, as a possible alternative, to buy and sell a two-thirds interest in a going manufacturing business as represented by its stock, an agreement which the statute requires to be in writing. The evidence upon the subject as to whether defendants ever entered into a partnership or any agreement was sharply conflicting. Defendants positively denied that they made any offer of any kind or character to enter into a partnership and likewise denied that they agreed to purchase any stock in the corporation. The testimony introduced on their behalf showed that there were certain conversations had between the parties which were directed to a sale of an interest in the going business by the purchase of certain shares of its stock. There was also evidence to show that it was impossible for plaintiff Simpson to perform the agreement which he alleged had been made for the reason that he was not the owner of the requisite number of shares of stock or bonds in the company which he engaged to transfer under his alleged agreement, nor had he the control over the same. He did not own the stock and the bonds were pledged as security for a large sum of money and his personal resources were exhausted. The trial court found upon this subject that Simpson could not perform the agreement he alleged had been entered into. The evidence as a whole justifies and fully supports the findings of the trial court to the effect that defendants never entered into any agreement of any character as alleged in plaintiffs' complaint. This being so, the appeal is without merit.

RADDANT v. WATSON et al. (Civ. 4866.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 8, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 5, 1928.

Highways ⚿184(2)—Evidence justified finding driver of autmobile with which bus collided while attempting to pass was not negligent in passenger's action for injuries.

In action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff as passenger in automobile bus with which defendant's automobile collided when bus attempted to pass defendant's automobile on highway, evidence held sufficient to justify trial court in finding that defendant automobile driver was not guilty of negligence contributing to plaintiff's injuries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by Esther Raddant against A. B. Watson, etc., defendant, and S. W. Mims. Judgment for plaintiff, as against A. B. Watson only, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Marks & Launer, of Fullerton, for appellant.

Culver & Nourse, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. This is an action in damages for personal injuries, pain and suffering, loss of time, etc., resulting to plaintiff in a collision of an autostage in which she was a passenger, operated by defendant Watson with an automobile operated by defendant Mims.

Plaintiff was given judgment against defendant Watson for $2,850.50, but was awarded nothing against defendant Mims.

Plaintiff appeals from that portion of the judgment denying her relief against defendant Mims and awarding him costs, contending that the evidence shows that respondent Mims was negligent in the operation of his automobile to such extent that his negligence was one of the causes which contributed directly to the accident, and was one of the proximate causes of appellant's injuries and losses.

The evidence introduced by the parties to this action shows substantially the following events occurring immediately preceding and at the time of the collision:

The stage was operated on a public highway as a common carrier for hire by a servant and employee of defendant Watson, appellant was a passenger therein, and respondent was driving his automobile on the highway in the direction the stage was being driven. The stage was driven past respondent's machine, and shortly thereafter was stopped at a railroad crossing or for passengers, when respondent drove past the stage. A few minutes later the stage driver drove to the center of the highway at a speed of 35 to 38 miles per hour and attempted to again pass respondent's machine, which was traveling on the right half of the highway, when the stage driver discovered a third automobile approaching in the opposite direction and distant about 200 to 250 feet. Thereupon, when the front of the radiator of the stage had reached a point about opposite the center of respondent's machine, the stage driver looked for respondent's machine but did not see it, applied the brakes of the stage, and swerved the stage to the right towards respondent's machine crowding it partly off the highway to the right. The back end of the stage was wider than its front end. Respondent found his machine in a pocket, leaving him the probable alternative of having his machine hit by the back end of the stage or attempting to drive ahead of the stage by speeding up, which latter course appeared to be the safer for him to follow in the emergency. Respondent then swerved his machine slightly to the right and drove ahead, hitting the hub of the right front wheel of the stage with the left rear wheel of his machine, thereby cramping the front wheels of the stage to the left, the stage skidded about 40 feet and turned over on its right side, injuring appellant. The skid marks commenced about four feet from the right side of the highway, indicating that respondent's machine was crowded off the highway. The third machine was driven suddenly off the highway to the left into an adjacent orange grove to avoid colliding with the stage.

Those facts show but a conflict of evidence, and justify the trial court in finding that respondent was not guilty of negligence which contributed to appellant's injuries.

The findings and judgment of the trial court have sufficient support in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Where defects in plaintiff's case are overcome by evidence subsequently introduced by defendant, and all evidence given at trial, considered together, supports the judgment, order denying nonsuit will not be disturbed on appeal, however weak a case plaintiff may have made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by Esther Raddant against A. B. Watson, etc., and another. Judgment for plaintiff as against defendant named, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 264 P. 588.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, and Clyde Bishop, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Marks, Launer & Collins, of Fullerton, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages suffered by plaintiff by reason of personal injuries, pain, and suffering, loss of time, etc., caused in a collision of an autostage in which she was a passenger, operated as a common carrier for hire by defendant A. B. Watson, with an automobile operated by defendant S. W. Mims, on a public highway.

Plaintiff was given judgment against defendant Watson for $2,850.50, but was awarded nothing against defendant Mims.

Defendant Watson appeals and assigns as errors on the part of the trial court that the court erred in denying plaintiff's motion for a nonsuit; the proof fails to show negligence on the part of Watson or the driver of the stage; and the decision is contrary to the evidence and is against the law.

Appellant Watson discusses the above assignments together, stating that but one question of law is involved in the errors assigned, to wit: Whether the stage driver, who was the employee of appellant, so negligently operated the stage as to make appellant liable for plaintiff's injuries and her consequent pain and suffering and loss of time.

The facts that the stage was a common carrier for hire, that respondent was a passenger therein, that the collision with the automobile operated by Mims occurred, and that respondent suffered thereby, are established by respondent and not controverted by the evidence for defendants.

Respondent testified in relation to the events occurring immediately before and at the time of the collision, as follows: That the two machines were traveling in the same direction on the public highway; that before the collision the stage passed Mims' automobile and stopped at a railroad crossing; that Mims then passed the stage, and in a few minutes the stage driver drove to the center of the highway and attempted to drive past the automobile; that the stage was then traveling about 25 to 38 miles per hour; that, when the front of the radiator of the stage was about opposite the center of the automobile, the automobile was speeded up and cut into the left, its rear left wheel caught the right front wheel of the stage, and the stage turned over on its left side at the center of the pavement; and that she heard no signals or horn from the stage at any time before or while passing.

Defendant Mims, called by respondent for cross-examination, testified that, when the driver of the stage attempted to pass his machine just preceding the collision, another car was approaching in the opposite direction distant about 200 feet; that the radiator of the stage was about the center of his car when he (Mims) stepped on the car and swerved to the right side of the road to get away from the stage; that the stage was going 32 to 35 miles per hour and his machine a little faster.

Thereupon respondent rested and appellant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that respondent had failed to make out a case of negligence against him, asserting that the injuries suffered by respondent were the proximate result of negligence on the part of defendant Mims. The motion was denied, to which ruling appellant excepts.

It is true that respondent made a rather weak case, but, after the motion for nonsuit was denied, the testimony of the stage driver and the evidence given by and in behalf of defendant Mims showed substantially the following facts: When the stage driver attempted to drive around Mims' machine immediately before the collision, he drove the stage at about 35 to 38 miles per hour, and he discovered the third automobile approaching distant about 200 to 250 feet. He then applied his brakes, looked for Mims' machine, but did not see it, and, when the front end of the radiator of the stage was about opposite the center of Mims' machine, he swerved the stage to the right towards Mims' machine, crowding it partly off the highway and leaving Mims the probable alternative of having his machine struck by the back end of the stage, which end was wider than its front end, or attempting to drive ahead of the stage. The latter course appeared to be the safer course for Mims to follow in the emergency in which he found himself. Mims then swerved his machine to the right so that his two right wheels were off the highway and drove ahead fast, hit the right rear wheel of his machine against the hub of the left front wheel of the stage, thereby cramped its front wheels to the left, and the stage skidded about 40 feet and turned over on its right side. The skid marks commenced about four feet from the right side of the highway, indicating that Mims' machine was crowded partly off the highway by the stage. The third machine was driven suddenly off the highway to the other side into an orange grove to avoid colliding with the stage.

[1] By reasons of the provisions of sections 20 and 22 of the Vehicle Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 397), as amended (St. 1919, pp. 215, 220), then in effect, under the circumstances shown by all of the evidence considered together, it was the duty of the stage driver, in attempting to pass Mims' machine, to make a "suitable and audible signal," in order to require Mims "to give way to the right" in favor of the stage (section 20, subd. [d]); the stage driver was required "to not again drive to the right until reasonably clear" of Mims' machine (section 20, subd. [c]); and the stage driver was prohibited from driving faster than 30 miles per hour in passing, for the reason that the third machine was approaching within 400 feet (section 22).

The stage driver violated each of those requirements and that prohibition, and he also violated the general requirement of section 22 in failing to drive the stage in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway.

The stage driver was negligent in the operation of the stage, and his negligence was the proximate cause of respondent's injuries and losses. Therefore the findings and judgment of the trial court have sufficient support in the evidence.

[2] Referring to the order of the trial court denying the motion of appellant for a nonsuit, and his exceptions thereto, it appears that the somewhat weak case made by respondent was greatly strengthened by the evidence afterward introduced by defendants. Under such circumstances, where the defects in a plaintiff's case are overcome by evidence subsequently introduced, and all the evidence given at the trial by the plaintiff and defendants, considered together, supports the judgment, the order denying the nonsuit will not be disturbed, however weak a case plaintiff may have made. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Petition by Mary Gertrude McDowell and others, opposed by Pray Ellis, for distribution of the estate of George B. Ellis, deceased. From the decree, Pray Ellis appeals. Affirmed.

Walter J. Little and Wm. B. Gilroy, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Denio, Hart, Taubman & Simpson, of Long Beach, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from that portion of a decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of George B. Ellis, deceased, which orders one-fourth only of a cash item of $22,126.43 distributed to Pray Ellis, the surviving widow and appellant herein.

Prior to July 14, 1923, the decedent was a widower having adult children and minor grandchildren. On that day he married the appellant. On November 1, 1924, he died. He left a will whereby he bequeathed one-fourth of his estate to his widow and the remaining three-fourths to his children by the former marriage and to his grandchildren. The estate was originally inventoried at $137,245.74, and it is not questioned but that this estate was the separate property of the decedent. A controversy arose on petition for distribution as to the character of 210 shares of stock of Associated Telephone Company, subsequently inventoried, which on a sale by the executrices netted $22,126.43. It is contended by the appellant that the proceeds of this sale are community property and should be distributed one-half to her as her share of the community and the other half in accordance with the provisions of the will, to wit, one-fourth to her and three-fourths to the children and grandchildren. The respondents claim that the stock was the separate property of the decedent. The circumstances surrounding the acquisition of the stock by the decedent were stipulated to be the following:

"That in December, 1923, an arrangement was entered into between four parties, Mr. Fishburn, Mr. Heffley, Mr. Ellis, and Mr. Judkins, whereby they had issued by the Associated Telephone Company 843 shares of its capital stock; that those shares of stock were issued in three certificates and were issued in the names of three banks, the First National Bank of Long Beach, the First National Bank of Los Angeles, and the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles; that, as a part of the same transaction and consummated at the same time, these four men either executed as makers or as guarantors three promissory notes to these banks; that the stock was pledged or held as security for these notes; that none of these men paid anything to the Associated Telephone Company for the stock except the money they received from the banks by signing their notes and putting this stock up as collateral; that that situation remained until the death of Mr. Ellis, and that at no time from the date in December, 1923, until Mr. Ellis died, were any payments made on those notes except that the money which was derived from dividends paid on the stock was credited to the payment of the interest on the notes and in a very slight degree to reduce the principal; that these three notes were signed by Mr. Heffley and guaranteed by a separate instrument by the other three gentlemen named; that there was a verbal agreement between these four men to the end that they would use this stock to make some money out of."

[1] The trial court found that—

> "Said loan, as far as said Geo. B. Ellis was concerned, was made upon the faith and credit of his separate property, and his financial standing with said banks, at the time of entering into said agreement, for the purchase of said stock."

The appellant contends that this finding is not supported by evidence sufficient to overcome the presumption that property acquired by the husband after marriage is community property, and cites Estate of Holbert, 57 Cal. 257, and Moulton v. Moulton, 182 Cal. 185, 187 P. 421. In each of these cases, however, it appeared that there was no evidence showing that the loan was made on the personal credit of the spouse owning the separate property. In the Holbert Case the court said, at page 259:

> "There was no evidence to go to the jury upon which they were authorized to find that Holbert borrowed money upon the strength of credit created entirely by his separate property."

In the Moulton Case, in holding that the loan was not made upon the wife's personal credit, the court said:

> "The note was unsecured, and was not indorsed or guaranteed, and there is no evidence to show that the members of the [loan] committee, other than decedent, had any knowledge that plaintiff was possessed of any separate property."

Both of these cases recognize the general rule that the proceeds from a loan made to a spouse on the credit of his or her separate property are the separate property of that spouse. See cases cited in Moulton v. Moulton, supra, at page 189 (187 P. 421).

[2] In the present case there is evidence to support the trial court's finding. The appellant was not known in any way in the transaction. All of the property owned by the decedent was his separate property. In addition to the impelling inference from other portions of the record that his guaranty was accepted on the faith and credit of his separate property, there is direct evidence that the guaranty was accepted on the financial standing of the decedent. One of the officers of the First National Bank of Long Beach testified:

> "I had a guaranty with this note signed by J. E. Fishburn and George B. Ellis. * * * We took the note of Sam R. Heffley; inasmuch as we loaned practically the market value, we took the guaranty of Mr. Ellis and Mr. Fishburn as security. * * * At the time we loaned Mr. Heffley this large sum of money, he was manager and I think vice president of the Associated Telephone and had been for years. He was a man on a salary down at the city of Long Beach, and the people we had guarantee these notes were men of large financial interests, Mr. Fishburn and Mr. Ellis."

It is clear from the record that the credit was extended on the faith of the separate property of the decedent existing at the time the loan was made. The court was therefore correct in finding that the cash item in the estate and over which this controversy arose was the separate property of the decedent.

The judgment is affirmed.

Assignees of land contract could not recover damages from vendor of property alleged to have been caused by statements negligently made by vendor to assignees regarding condition of title of property, where vendor gratuitously, in good faith, inquired, over telephone, of an abstract and title company regarding condition of title of property and plaintiffs acted on information thus obtained in buying property from assignor, since defendant's act amounted to exercise of slight care required under Civ. Code, § 1975, of one who, without consideration, undertakes to do service for another.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by James Robert Higgins and wife against the Security Trust & Savings Bank for damages alleged to have been sustained by reliance upon statements concerning the condition of the title to real property. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Arnold Praeger, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Newlin & Ashburn and W. C. Mathes, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. The above-entitled action was commenced in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles by the assignees of a contract to recover damages from the vendor of the property alleged to have been suffered by said assignees by reason of statements negligently made by said owner to said assignees as to the condition of the title of said real property. The facts are stated below:

The second amended complaint, which the trial court held did not state a cause of action, and accordingly entered a judgment of dismissal of the action, from which judgment this appeal was taken, alleged: That appellants' assignor, Charles S. M. Segelbaum, entered into a contract with respondent, Security Trust & Savings Bank, for the purchase of a certain described lot or parcel of real property situate in the county of Los Angeles. One George W. Markens was the agent of said Segelbaum. That on or about January 30, 1925, Segelbaum assigned said contract and his interest therein to appellants, who paid to said Segelbaum as a consideration therefor the sum of $3,000. That prior to the assignment of said contract, and prior to the payment of said sum of $3,000 by appellants, appellants and said George W. Markens called at the office of respondent corporation. That the purpose of Markens' visit was to pay respondent the balance due from Segelbaum to respondent on account of said contract of purchase, "and for the further purpose of the plaintiffs [appellants] ascertaining from defendant [respondent] that said balance was paid and ascertaining that the title to said lot was free and clear of incumbrances, and to arrange with defendant [respondent] for a deed to said property conveying the title thereof to plaintiffs as joint tenants, and to secure a certificate of title showing the title thereto vested in plaintiffs free and clear of incumbrances." That one T. H. Boysen was assistant trust officer of said respondent corporation. That Markens "talked with said Boysen with regard to the transfer of the interest of said Segelbaum in said lot to plaintiffs, * * * the plaintiffs informing said Boysen that they were paying the said Segelbaum cash for his interest in said lot, and that they wanted a deed from defendant to said lot with themselves named as grantees * * * and that they desired defendant to furnish a certificate of title showing the title to said lot vested in plaintiffs free and clear of all incumbrances, and that they wanted to know if the title to said lot was clear before they paid the said sum of $3,000 to said Markens. * * * That when advised of the fact that the plaintiffs were buying said contract for the purchase of said lot * * * and that they wanted to know if the title was clear * * * and that they desired a certificate of title showing the title * * * vested in them free and clear of incumbrances, the said Boysen stated he would ascertain if the title to said lot was clear. That before the payment of said $3,000 * * * the said Boysen undertook to ascertain if the title was clear, knowing that the plaintiffs were relying thereon, stated to the plaintiffs that the title to said lot was clear," and plaintiffs, relying on said statement, paid the sum of $3,000 to said Markens, agent of Segelbaum. That at said time Boysen accepted from plaintiffs the sum of $6.75 "to cover the cost of recording the deed from defendant [respondent] to plaintiffs, conveying the title to said lot to them, and the charge for showing in said certificate of title the title thereto vested in the plaintiffs." The usual allegations in such cases, to the effect that the statements as to the title being clear and free from incumbrances were relied upon by plaintiffs and they would not have entered into the transaction but for their faith in said statements, follow. It was further alleged that subsequent to the payment of said $3,000 by appellants to said Markens, said Boysen informed appellants that a search of the title of said lot made by respondent disclosed that an action had been filed in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles prior to said payment and a lis pendens filed against said lot, and by reason thereof respondent was not able to convey a title free and clear of incumbrances.

It is plaintiffs' contention that Boysen, by stating to plaintiffs in the manner set out in the second amended complaint that said title was clear and free of incumbrances, failed to take or exercise ordinary, customary, or usual care in the premises.

[1-3] Whatever may be said in support of the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint as stating a cause of action as above epitomized is, we think, put to rest by paragraph V of said second amended complaint, which purports to state the facts by which appellants were influenced to consummate said transaction. Read in the light of the familiar rules of construction, which are to the effect that it is presumed that the pleader has stated his case as strongly as it can be stated in his favor, and that ambiguities must be resolved against the pleader, and that the pleading is to be most strongly construed against the pleader, it would seem that the matter set forth in said paragraph V was sufficient to defeat plaintiffs' action. It is therein alleged:

> "That said Boysen * * * before stating to plaintiffs that the title to said lot was free and clear of incumbrances, in that said Boysen called a title company on the telephone to ascertain if said title was clear, instead of having title to said property searched by a title or abstract company before stating that the title to said lot was free and clear of incumbrances when such search would have disclosed the existence of the said incumbrance against said lot, and the fact that such a search would disclose any incumbrance against said lot was, or should have been, known to the said Boysen, and that by reason of the carelessness and negligence of said Boysen as aforesaid, plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $3,000."

The inference from the foregoing quoted paragraph is that the only time Boysen's opinion was asked as to the condition of title was when the plaintiffs visited him in company with Markens, and it was then that he called the title company on the telephone in the presence of plaintiffs to obtain the information imparted by him, and that plaintiffs were fully informed as to the source and extent of his information on the subject. This construction is in harmony with the recital in paragraph III of said amended complaint, which alleges that Boysen, when asked by plaintiffs concerning the title, "undertook to ascertain if the title to said lot was clear," etc. The inference is that he "undertook" to gain the information by the use of the telephone from said title company. It is wholly unreasonable to suppose that he would have had a search made during the visit of appellants to respondent's place of business. The amended complaint nowhere alleges that Boysen agreed to furnish plaintiffs with a certificate of title or agreed to have the title searched in order to answer plaintiffs' question. It was not reasonable to expect that Boysen would have assumed so onerous a service gratuitously. Besides, there existed a valid and binding contract on the part of Segelbaum to purchase the property, and it was doubtless a matter of indifference with either respondent corporation or Boysen, its agent, whether Segelbaum did or did not assign his contract to plaintiffs. If it had been alleged that the transfer of Segelbaum's contract to appellants would have benefited respondent in any way, a different situation would be before us. But such is not the case.

Appellants state at the outset that the action is not based on fraud and concede that at the time of the commission of said negligent acts no privity of contract existed between appellants and respondent. It is also admitted that respondent's alleged undertaking was wholly gratuitous. Respondent was a stranger to appellants and owed them no contractual duty. The title record was as accessible to appellants as to respondent.

[4, 5] Appellants' sole point is that the amended complaint states a case of negligence, disassociated with any imputation of fraud. It is very doubtful if the major premise upon which appellants rely, to wit, that an action may be maintained against another for an injury occasioned by want of due care and skill in doing what one has promised to do, although there was no consideration for the promise, is present in the instant case. Does the amended complaint allege a promise on the part of respondent? Certainly it does not so far as the preparation of a certificate of title was concerned.

The inference to be drawn from the allegations of the pleading is that Boysen did not undertake or assume to do more than to make a telephonic inquiry of a title company as to whether or not the title was clear, and that appellants were satisfied to act upon the information thus obtained. It is nowhere alleged in the amended complaint that he misrepresented or misreported the title company's statement as to the condition of the title. It is a general rule, in the absence of a statute governing the particular case, that negligence without fraud, express or implied, is not actionable, and that negligence cannot arise when there is no duty owing by the person charged to the person injured or a contractual relation existing between them.

Section 1975, Civil Code, provides:

> "One who, without consideration, undertakes to do a service for another, is not bound to perform the same, but if he actually enters upon its performance, he must use at least slight care and diligence therein."

If, under the foregoing section, respondent in good faith inquired of an abstract and title company which would be likely to have knowledge on the subject as to the condition of the title of said property, as alleged in the amended complaint, this would certainly amount to the exercise of slight care.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Pietro Bonfiglio against Pellegrino Bonfiglio, in which Rosa Bonfiglio intervened. From a judgment quieting title to land in the intervener, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest M. Torchia, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert P. Carrey, Andreani & Haines, and Harold E. Prudhon, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. [1, 2] This is an appeal by the plaintiff from that portion of the judgment entered herein which quiets the title to a certain piece of real property in the plaintiff in intervention. Plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant, and the trial court gave judgment in his favor for the amount of his debt. In the action he had attached certain real property, alleged to be the community property of defendant and his wife. The wife, by leave of court, intervened, claiming the property to be her separate property, and to have been purchased with funds inherited from her father. The record title to the property was in the wife, creating a presumption in her favor, and, in addition thereto, her testimony and that of her husband was emphatic that she had paid the consideration for the property with money which she had brought from Italy, and which she had inherited from her father. The appellant relies upon other testimony in the record which would contradict the testimony supporting the finding of the trial court, but this merely creates a conflict in the record, and under such circumstances this court is disposed to follow the trial court, which has had a better opportunity than this court to judge of the credibility of the witnesses. This disposes of the objection that the evidence does not support the findings and judgment.

[3] The other matters urged, i. e., that the court erred in permitting the filing of the complaint in intervention, and that the demurrer to said complaint should have been sustained because the said complaint does not state grounds for intervention, are answered by the cases of Carter v. Garetson, 56 Cal. App. 238, 204 P. 1090, and Vincent Whitney v. Superior Court, 48 Cal. App. Dec. 692,[1] both holding that a claimant to real property which has been attached in an action between two other persons to recover upon an indebtedness, in which action the claimant of the property has no interest, has the right to intervene in defense of his property against the attachment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Bertin A. Weyl, Judge.

Action by Thomas R. Lynch and others against Clarence E. Coe, Ernest E. Gagnon, and others. From the judgment, Ernest E. Gagnon appeals. On motion for diminution of record. Motion denied.

Leonard S. Barnes, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank P. Jenal, Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Philip C. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The respondent Lynch presents herein a motion for diminution of record, and seeks thereby to have stricken from the files of this court the transcript of the testimony taken before the lower court. This attempt to have the reporter's transcript stricken is based upon the assertion that the appellant's notice to the clerk to prepare a record neglected and failed to request that a transcript of the testimony be made up. The appellant seeks to explain the omission or defect by stating that he had contemplated making an independent arrangement with the reporter in connection with the preparation of a transcript of the proceedings in the trial court. Appellant's notice to the clerk, which was timely filed, reads in part as follows:

> "* * * Said defendant hereby requests that the judgment roll be made up and prepared and contain any and all matters of record herein, together with all exhibits and documentary evidence introduced and on file, and any and all matters and facts pertaining to said action except the transcript of testimony."

[1] The most cursory examination readily discloses that said notice and request is, to say the least, inartificially drawn. In fact, it may be stated to be wholly defective in so far as the preparation thereunder of a transcript of the testimony might be concerned. However, the defect is not fatal, nor such as would preclude an appellate court from considering upon an appeal from the judgment a properly certified transcript of the proceedings in the court below. In this connection the case of Carr v. Stern, 17 Cal. App. 397, 402, 120 P. 35, may be said to be in point. It is there declared:

> "As to the omission to embrace in the notice a request that a transcript of the testimony offered or taken and evidence offered or received be made up and prepared, the reply is that such record was made up, was approved by the judge, and as so prepared and approved is now before us."

[2] It has consistently been held that defects appearing in a request for a transcript are not jurisdictional to an appeal. Tasker v. Warmer (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 474. Moreover, technical objections are not favored, and this court, whenever possible, seeks to review the decision of the lower court upon all the facts which that tribunal had before it when it made such decision. McMahon v. Hamilton (Cal. Sup.) 260 P. 793.

[3, 4] The authorities cited by respondent in support of the motion are not in point. In Des Granges v. Des Granges, 175 Cal. 67, 165 P. 13, and the other cases relied upon, the appellant had failed to file any request for a transcript within the time prescribed by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, and it was held that, in the absence of a timely filing of request for a transcript, or of relief from default, a transcript thereafter filed did not merit consideration. The later cases, however, have modified this rule, and declare that the act of certification by the trial judge is, in effect, the equivalent of relief from default under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. Upon this point see Stenzel v. Kronich (Cal. Sup.) 255 P. 199. From what has been said we conclude that the reporter's transcript properly certified and filed herein is available to the appellant upon the appeal from the judgment even though his request for a record is, as already indicated, defective.

The motion is therefore denied.

Appeal from the Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

★Rehearing denied.

Action for a commission as real estate broker by B. H. Hiss against Ernest E. Sutton and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. J. McMahon, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bernard G. Hiss and William P. Boland, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action instituted by him for the recovery of a commission alleged to be due in pursuance of an agreement between himself and the defendants involving an option for the sale of the latter's real estate. The evidence in the case is practically without conflict, showing that on March 1, 1924, the defendants executed an option agreement to plaintiff for the sale of their said real estate "free and clear of all incumbrances" upon certain specified terms. The agreement contained the following further provision: "First party agrees to pay B. H. Hiss as commission, in the event of the exercise of this option, 5 per cent. of the total purchase price, to be paid through and at the close of escrow;" that the plaintiff assigned the foregoing option to one J. J. O'Regan, reserving the commission to become due in the event of the exercise of the option, and that O'Regan thereafter notified the defendant of his election to purchase their said property pursuant to the terms of said option, and that thereupon an escrow agreement was entered into between said defendants and said O'Regan, wherein it was provided for the delivery of the property free and clear of incumbrances, with the exception of certain easements, leases, and taxes for the ensuing year, and which escrow agreement contained the following clause: "Pay commission to B. H. Hiss, 261 So. Western Ave., $2,500." Before the time when said escrow agreement was to be completed, it appeared that the defendants' property, together with all other properties within a certain area, was subject to a restriction agreement to the effect that the property within the area in question was not to be used for any other than residential purposes. When this restriction agreement was brought to the attention of the proposed purchaser, he notified the defendants that he could not take the property subject to the foregoing restriction, and the defendants being unable to remove the same the purchaser withdrew from the escrow, and upon his demand the money which he had deposited was returned. Thereupon the plaintiff herein demanded the payment of his commission from the defendants, which, being refused, this action followed. The foregoing being the stipulated facts in the case, the trial court rendered judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the recovery of said commission; whereupon the defendants have taken and prosecuted this appeal.

[1] The appellants' first contention is that the plaintiff was not, under the terms of said option, an agent or broker employed by the defendants to obtain a buyer for their property, and that they never agreed to pay any commission to the plaintiff for any such service. While it is true that the option in terms ran to the plaintiff, the fact that it contained an express provision providing for the payment of a commission to him, and the further fact that after plaintiff had procured a purchaser for the property in question, to whom he assigned said option, the defendants without objection entered into an escrow agreement with said purchaser, fully justifies the inference that it was the intent of the parties in entering into said option with the plaintiff, who was a real estate agent, that he was to act as such in the procurement of a purchaser, and in the event of doing so was to receive the commission stipulated in the option agreement. This contention on the part of the defendants is, therefore, without merit.

[2] The defendants further contend that since the contract for the sale of the property to O'Regan was rescinded and canceled, the plaintiff's cause of action was thereby terminated and his right to the recovery of the commission provided for in the option agreement was at an end. This contention is equally without merit, since the option agreement, if construed to be one which sufficiently authorized the plaintiff to procure a purchaser for the defendants' property thereunder, was fulfilled prior to its said rescission by the plaintiff's procurement of O'Regan, whom the defendants accepted as a purchaser under the terms and conditions of said option, which provided that they should furnish to the purchaser title to the property free and clear of all but the specified incumbrances. Having failed to furnish such title, and the escrow agreement for that reason alone being rescinded, the plaintiff's right to a recovery of the stipulated commission was complete. The fact that in the option agreement it was provided that the plaintiff's commission was to be paid "through and at the close of escrow" is not to be interpreted to mean that the plaintiff was to be entitled to no commission unless the agreement for the sale of the property was fully executed through the medium of such escrow, but only that if such escrow was completed plaintiff was to receive his commission through and at the time of such completion. But this interpretation does not militate against the right of the plaintiff to receive his agreed commission when it appears that the failure to carry into effect such escrow agreement was wholly due to the defendants' inability to furnish title to their property in accordance with both their option and escrow agreements so to do. The plaintiff, having fully completed his part of the option agreement to be by him performed, became therefore entitled to his commission, notwithstanding defendants' failure to perform.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Clara K. Schade, as executrix of the estate of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased, against Addie L. Stewart. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Matthews & Walter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hugh A. McNary, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action in ejectment. The plaintiff brought the action in her representative capacity as executrix of the estate of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased. She prayed for a judgment of possession and damages for unlawful withholding. The decedent in her lifetime had been the owner of the real property in question. She sold it to the defendant, who executed, as part of the purchase price, a note payable in installments and a trust deed conveying the title to said property as security to Title Guarantee & Trust Company, a corporation, as trustee. At the time of the death of the decedent said note and trust deed were a part of the assets of her estate. She left a will in which the Salvation Army, a corporation, was named as a legatee. In addition to this provision she named some sixteen natural persons as legatees and devisees. The defendant failed to make her payments required by said promissory note. The plaintiff, as executrix, declared the defendant in default, and directed the trustee to sell the property pursuant to the terms of the trust deed. The sale was held, and the plaintiff, as executrix, bid in the property, and received a purported deed thereto in which Title Guarantee & Trust Company was named as grantor, and the "heirs or devisees of Jennie C. Hurd, deceased," were named as grantees. At the trial, the defendant objected to the introduction of this deed in evidence on the ground, among others, that the same was void for uncertainty in the designation of the grantees. The objections were overruled, and the court received the deed in evidence as proof of the plaintiff's title and right of possession. At the close of plaintiff's case, the defendant moved the court for a nonsuit, which was denied. The alleged errors of the court in admitting the deed in evidence and in denying the motion for a nonsuit form the principal grounds now urged for a reversal of the judgment.

[1, 2] The plaintiff cites and relies on numerous authorities to the effect that a deed naming the "heirs of a deceased person" as grantees is a sufficient designation, and that a designation of the "executors" of a deceased person is also sufficient, on the theory that that is certain which may be made certain. Newlove v. Mercantile Trust Co., 156 Cal. 657, 105 P. 971; Peeples v. Rudulph, 153 Ga. 17, 111 S. E. 548; Hoover v. Malen, 83 Ind. 195; Shaw v. Loud, 12 Mass. 447; Hill v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 51 S. W. 357. The plaintiff also relies on section 1582 of the Code of Civil Procedure as authority for bringing the action as personal representative. That section provides that an executor or administrator may bring an action for the recovery of real or personal property in all cases in which the same might have been brought by the testator or intestate. But the plaintiff has cited no authorities holding that the "heirs or devisees" of a deceased person is a sufficient designation. Nor have we discovered any authority where it has been held that a deed so uncertain in the description of the grantees as the one here involved is sufficient to pass the title. Since a conveyance of real property must be in writing, the parties who are to take as grantees must be sufficiently ascertained by the written instrument or it is a nullity, and fails to pass the legal title. Rixford v. Zeigler, 150 Cal. 435, 438, 88 P. 1092, 119 Am. St. Rep. 229. Assuming that a deed to "the heirs" alone of a deceased person is sufficient, it still cannot be ascertained from an inspection of the present deed whether it is a conveyance to "the heirs," who constitute one class, or to "the devisees," who may constitute another entirely different set of grantees. It is difficult to perceive how a court, upon an inspection of the document, could find and adjudge who the grantees were intended to be. If the designation had been to the "legatees and devisees" of the deceased, the conveyance might have been sufficient under the authority of Webb v. Den, 17 How. (58 U. S.) 576, 15 L. Ed. 35, a case relied upon by the plaintiff. Again, if the designation in the present deed had been to the "heirs and devisees" of the decedent, the situation might have been different. This, of course, we do not decide. But, when the words are, as here, used in the disjunctive, it is impossible to tell to which class it was intended to convey the title.

We are satisfied that the said deed was and is void for uncertainty, and passed no title. It must therefore be held that the proof failed to show title or right of possession in the plaintiff, and the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted.

The foregoing determination renders it unnecessary to pass upon other points made by the parties.

The judgment is reversed.

RANDALL v. RANDALL. (L. A. 8804.)★

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank March 29, 1928.

1. Divorce 🔑79—Service by publication and mailing, of "supplemental complaint," complete in itself, held sufficient without service of original complaint (Code Civ. Proc. § 410).

Where plaintiff's original complaint for divorce was on grounds of cruelty and habitual intemperance, service by mail and publication of copy of so-called "supplemental complaint" asking divorce for desertion, which complaint was complete in itself, held sufficient without service of original complaint, under Code Civ. Proc. § 410, providing copy of complaint must be served.

2. Divorce 🔑79—Service by publication and mailing held not void because summons and complaint were mailed to defendant in care of attorneys (Code Civ. Proc. § 410).

Service by publication and by mailing in divorce action held not void, under Code Civ. Proc. § 410, because summons and copy of complaint were mailed to defendant in care of attorneys instead of to residence, where after due diligence exact residence could not be found.

3. Judgment 🔑142—Defendant served by publication on application to vacate judgment need not present any excuse, except lack of personal service (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Defendant in divorce action, served by publication only, on application made, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to vacate judgment against him and to be allowed to answer to merits, need not present any excuse for failure to appear, except fact that he was not personally served; there being no presumption against him of knowledge of proceedings or of inexcusable negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Hazelle M. Randall against James W. Randall. From an order denying motions to set aside service of summons and default judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Tobias R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jesse R. Shafer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Appeal in an action for divorce by defendant from order denying his motions to set aside alleged attempted service of summons and default judgment.

On July 19, 1920, plaintiff filed a complaint for divorce upon the grounds of cruelty and habitual intemperance, upon which no further action was ever taken. On March 2, 1922, she filed a so-called "supplemental complaint," praying for divorce upon the ground of desertion. Pursuant to order of the court, service of summons upon defendant was made by publication and by the mailing of a copy of the summons and so-called "supplemental complaint" to him in the care of his attorneys in Detroit, Mich. On April 23, 1924, the cause came on for hearing. Plaintiff appeared and the court rendered an interlocutory judgment of divorce in her favor, based upon the ground of complaint set forth in the second pleading, and containing the following recital:

> "And it appearing that defendant was duly served with process and has not appeared or answered the supplemental complaint; that the default of defendant has been entered," etc.

Almost a year later, but before entry of final judgment, viz. April 17, 1925, plaintiff and defendant both being personally present in court and represented by counsel, defendant moved the court to quash the alleged attempted service of summons upon him and to set aside said default and judgment entered against him. Both these motions were denied by the court and final judgment of divorce was entered on May 22, 1925, whereupon appeal was taken from the order denying said motions.

The original complaint appears in the judgment roll, but no reference is made to it therein, and all orders, affidavits, and other papers are based upon and refer only to said so-called "supplemental complaint." Section 410 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "A copy of the complaint must be served, with the summons, upon each of the defendants. * * *"

★Hearing denied in bank.

The sole question here is whether the service made upon defendant in the manner above set forth satisfied said provision of section 410. If it did, the court had jurisdiction to enter the default and render final judgment.

The second complaint, although designated "supplemental complaint," was in reality a substituted pleading, complete in itself. It stated the same cause of action, to wit, a cause of action for divorce, but, however, based upon a new ground of complaint, namely, desertion. It contained no reference to the allegations of the original complaint. As stated, it was complete in itself and alleged all necessary facts upon which to base jurisdiction of the court.

[1] Had said second complaint been in reality a supplemental pleading, supplying facts occurring after the filing of the original pleading, supplementing the allegations thereof, it is plain that service of a copy of the original complaint would have been required to give the court jurisdiction. But where, as here, the complaint, irrespective of its erroneous title is in itself a complete new pleading, alleging all necessary facts, it is the true complaint in the cause and the action as to the new ground set up therein must be considered as being commenced when said pleading is filed (Valensin v. Valensin, 73 Cal. 106, 109, 14 P. 397); hence, service of a copy thereof is all that is required under the statute. Service of a copy of the original complaint would be wasted effort, for that pleading is dead, being superseded in its entirety by the new complaint. Said copy would be of no value to defendant for any purpose whatsoever, nor would it convey to him any other or further information relative to the allegations against him than is given him by service of a copy of the true pleading.

[2, 3] There is no merit in the contention that said service was void because, pursuant to order of the court, the summons and copy of complaint were mailed to defendant in care of his attorneys in Detroit, Mich., instead of to his residence in that city, where, as here, a proper showing was made that, after due diligence, the exact residence of defendant in said city could not be found and he could be reached only through his said attorneys.

It is to be noted that a defendant served by publication only, on application made, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate a judgment against him and to be allowed to answer to the merits, need not present any excuse for his failure to appear, except the fact that he was not personally served with summons and that in such case there is no presumption against him of knowledge of the proceedings or of inexcusable negligence on his part. Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 352, 90 P. 691, 12 Ann. Cas. 990. Although defendant here was present in court for the special purposes of this proceeding, yet he made no attempt to take advantage of the provisions of the above statute, as he would doubtless have done had he really desired to answer to the merits of the cause.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

Application by Nellie J. Morris for letters of administration in the estate of Lewis R. Morris, deceased, opposed by Barnett Morris. From an order denying the application, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

John J. Craig, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McPherrin & Ottofy and L. Frank Ottofy, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. [1] This is an appeal from an order denying the application of the appellant for letters of administration in the matter of the estate of Lewis R. Morris, deceased. The application of the appellant for such letters was made upon the alleged ground that she was the lawful widow of said deceased and as such the proper party to be appointed administratrix of his estate. The trial court denied her application after a hearing thereon, upon the ground that said applicant was not the lawful widow of the decedent, and upon findings of fact wherein it set forth the basis of its conclusion in that regard, and which findings of fact are fully supported by the evidence in the case, and from which it appears: That Lewis R. Morris, the decedent, was, prior to July, 1922, lawfully married and living with his wife, Margaret Morris, in Chicago, Ill. That in July, 1922, having become enamored of the appellant herein, he deserted his said wife in said city and removed to Los Angeles, where he was joined by the appellant, and where for the following two years or more they lived together in adultery, but as man and wife. In March, 1925, the said Lewis R. Morris, while so living with the appellant, filed an action for divorce from his lawful wife Margaret in the superior court of Los Angeles county. That service was had by publication, the proof thereof showing Margaret to be then living in Chicago, and that an interlocutory decree of divorce was granted upon such showing on December 9, 1925, which interlocutory decree was docketed and entered in said court on December 15, 1925. On December 26, 1925, Lewis R. Morris and the appellant proceeded to Tia Juana and there entered into what purported to be a marriage, immediately after which they returned to Los Angeles, where they continued to reside until the death of the decedent on January 19, 1927. That a final decree of divorce between said decedent and his wife Margaret was docketed and entered on December 22, 1926. That no marriage ceremony other than that performed in Tia Juana ever occurred between the deceased and the appellant.

The evidence in the case abundantly shows that the appellant, during all of the times between July 22, 1922, and the date of her said purported marriage to Lewis R. Morris in Tia Juana, knew that he had a lawful wife living, and also knew of the fact of said divorce proceeding and of the making and entry of the interlocutory decree therein. It is true that the appellant upon the hearing of her said application testified that at the time of her marriage with the deceased she did not know that his lawful wife was still living and did not know of the institution and result of said divorce proceeding. But her testimony in these respects is directly contradicted and is found to be untrue by the express findings of the trial court, in connection with which the court further found that the appellant, knowing of the fact that Lewis R. Morris had a lawful wife still living, went with him to Tia Juana and had the marriage ceremony between herself and the deceased performed there for the sole purpose of attempting to evade and avoid the force and effect of the laws of California. The foregoing facts sufficiently supporting the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial court were such as would fully justify its order refusing to appoint the appellant administratrix of the estate of Lewis R. Morris, deceased, upon the ground that she was not his lawful wife. The cases of Wilcox v. Wilcox, 171 Cal. 770, 155 P. 95, and Estate of Hughson, 173 Cal. 453, 160 P. 548, cited by the appellant, afford her no comfort upon this appeal, since the presumption in favor of the validity of marriage referred to in those cases was fully overthrown by the evidence presented in the instant case. Neither can the appellant derive any support from the provisions of section 61 of the Civil Code, which declare that:

> With certain exceptions, "a subsequent marriage contracted by any person during the life of a former husband or wife of such person, with any person other than such former husband or wife is illegal and void from the beginning."

And which further provides that:

> "In no case can a marriage of either of the parties during the life of the other, be valid in this state, if contracted within one year after the entry of an interlocutory decree in a proceeding for divorce."

The appellant utterly failed to bring herself within the exceptions noted in said section of the Civil Code and there was, therefore, no basis either for her application to be appointed administratrix of the estate of Lewis R. Morris, deceased, upon the ground that she was his lawful wife and widow, or for her appeal to this court from the order denying her said application.

[2] This is a gross case of a plainly frivolous appeal, having for its only apparent purpose delay in the course of administration of said estate. For that reason a penalty of $100 for the taking and prosecution of a frivolous appeal is hereby imposed upon the appellant herein, the same to be charged as costs against the appellant and paid to said estate.

The order is affirmed.

Matters not raised by motion to set aside decree may not be considered on appeal from court's ruling thereon.

2. Divorce 🔑161—Refusal to set aside default divorce decree held abuse of discretion under uncontroverted evidence showing decree was obtained by affidavit for publication falsely stating defendant's last-known residence.

Refusal to set aside default divorce decree entered against wife, whom husband had sent from his home to residence of her brother in another state, held abuse of discretion, where uncontroverted evidence on motion to set aside judgment showed that plaintiff had made false statement in affidavit for publication relative to defendant's last-known place of residence.

3. Divorce 🔑161—Six months' delay in moving to set aside default divorce decree held not fatal, where defendant's return was hampered by distant location and lack of funds.

Six months' delay prior to filing motion to set aside default divorce decree held not to show lack of diligence on part of defendant, where defendant at time she first heard of decree was located in California and was delayed, not only by distance, but by lack of funds.

4. Divorce 🔑161—Default divorce judgments are not favored, and courts are alert to detect fraud therein.

Law does not favor default judgments in divorce actions, and courts are always alert to detect and correct fraud therein.

5. Divorce 🔑165(3)—Procuring of default divorce by false statement in affidavit for publication held fraud on court, which permitted setting aside judgment independent of statutory time limitation (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Action of plaintiff in divorce suit in filing affidavit for publication containing known false statement with regard to defendant's last-known place of residence held to constitute extrinsic fraud upon defendant and upon the court, which gave court inherent power to set aside the judgment of divorce obtained through the fraud without regard to time limitation prescribed by Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Eddy M. Aldrich against Mary M. Aldrich for a divorce. A default divorce decree was granted plaintiff, which defendant moved to have set aside. From an order denying defendant's motion, she appeals. Reversed.

Schauer & Ryon, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Mygatt, Robertson & Crawford, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of Santa Barbara refusing to grant a motion by defendant to set aside a decree of divorce granted by said court to plaintiff. The interlocutory decree was entered in April, 1923, and the final decree was granted in April, 1924. No personal service was made upon the defendant; the summons having been served by publication. The motion to set aside the judgment was made on the ground that a fraud had been committed on the court by plaintiff in causing to be filed an affidavit to secure service on defendant by publication, which stated that defendant's last-known place of residence was Vermont, when plaintiff well knew that defendant was a resident of Champlain, N. Y., and on the further ground that defendant received no notice of this action and was thereby prevented from protecting her interests by defending the same.

[1] Defendant, in her brief, advances additional reasons for granting said motion; i. e., that service by publication founded on this affidavit was wholly void and of no effect, and that the court obtained no jurisdiction over defendant, and that plaintiff never secured a bona fide residence in this state on which to ground this action. These matters were not raised by the motion made in the trial court, and we shall not consider them upon appeal. Upon the questions raised by the motion of defendant, she filed an affidavit stating that the parties had married in Vermont and had lived together as husband and wife from 1896 to 1919, and that since that time they have been living separate and apart, that during said marriage the parties lived in New Hampshire and saved and invested the sum of $20,000 out of plaintiff's earnings as a locomotive engineer, and that this amount was invested in the name of plaintiff. The affidavit continues as follows:

> "That without cause, on or about the said 3d day of June, 1919, plaintiff herein ordered defendant herein to return to her brother in Champlain, N. Y. She protested and wanted to stay with him in Nashua, N. H., but he insisted and put her on the train after buying her a ticket to Champlain, where her parents lived. Shortly thereafter he sent her clothes, and, though she begged to return, he refused. That, after said defendant was compelled to leave plaintiff, as aforesaid, he, the said plaintiff, transmitted to her the sum of $50 nearly every month to live on, he, the said plaintiff, depositing the said amount for defendant in the Second National Bank of Nashua, N. H. That the plaintiff well knew that defendant was living in Champlain, N. Y., as he had considerable correspondence with her through the medium of the said bank, and Champlain, N. Y., was the town to which he had forced her to go as aforesaid. That plaintiff kept up said payments of $50 a month until the month of January, 1924, when he ceased making the payments."

Defendant then set forth that through the investigations of her attorneys she learned, in June, 1924, for the first time, that plaintiff had secured a divorce and that he refused to pay further for her support; that thereafter a search was made by defendant's attorneys through the records of New Hampshire to ascertain if plaintiff had secured a divorce in that state, and they could find no such record; that defendant had no knowledge of where plaintiff claimed to have secured such divorce; that, after considerable searching through different firms of attorneys, defendant learned for the first time on September 27, 1924, that plaintiff had secured a divorce in California; that thereupon defendant, through her eastern attorneys, took the matter up with a California firm of attorneys, and it was not until October 24, 1924, that a report was received from said California attorneys which was sent to defendant several weeks later; that with due diligence she took up the matter with the attorneys in California, making her motion in April, 1925.

The plaintiff meets this affidavit by the following evasive and nonrelevant allegation in his affidavit:

> "That I personally spoke with John Betters, now deceased, and Fred Betters of Nashua, N. H., as to the whereabouts, if they knew, of Mary M. Aldrich. Previous to the service of the libel on Mary M. Aldrich, both John Betters and Fred Betters returned to their home in Champlain, N. Y., and had previously thereto moved from said Champlain."

There is no allegation as to what John and Fred Betters replied to plaintiff's alleged questions, and there is no denial of the facts which would show personal knowledge of defendant's whereabouts on the part of the plaintiff. The only portion of the affidavit of plaintiff which has any force or effect herein is the portion wherein he states that in January, 1924, before the final decree of divorce, he sent defendant her customary yearly railroad pass, which she returned to the office of the railroad, stating that she was not entitled to it, as divorce proceedings were pending. He further alleges:

> "Since Mary M. Aldrich left her home in Nashua, N. H., no correspondence was made between herself and myself, excepting two or three letters relative to money."

Plaintiff filed a second affidavit, the only portions of which are pertinent upon the motion before the court are the following:

> "That on the 3d day of June, 1919, she (defendant) returned to Champlain, N. Y., to live with her brother without my knowledge or consent," and that, when she returned to Champlain, N. Y., she used her yearly railroad pass, and "that her said statement that I put her on a train after buying her a ticket is not, and cannot be true."

It is to be observed that plaintiff does not deny that he put her on a train for Champlain, N. Y., but only that he put her on a train after buying her a ticket.

[2] Respondent concedes the power of the superior court to grant defendant's motion under the facts of this case, but states that there was no abuse of discretion in denying the same. It is true, of course, that, if there is a substantial conflict in the facts presented by the affidavits, the determination of the controverted facts by the trial court will not be disturbed; but, from the foregoing allegations, and from other matters appearing in the record, it is apparent that there is no such condition existing here. The defendant has made positive allegations in her affidavit, showing that plaintiff committed a fraud upon the court and upon the defendant. The plaintiff has introduced nothing to controvert this. His affidavit is evasive and insincere on its face, and it is obvious from the entire record that he knew the residence of defendant and planned to have notice mailed to her at an address which was never her address during the married life of the parties. This is extrinsic fraud—fraud on the defendant which prevented her from having her day in court and which, according to her affidavit, has deprived her of the savings of a lifetime, and it was also a fraud upon the court.

[3, 4] Nor does the record show a lack of diligence on the part of the defendant. Defendant alleged that her eastern attorneys received a report from counsel in California on October 24, 1924, and that two or three weeks elapsed before they could communicate with her. The notice of motion to set aside the decree was filed on April 28, 1925, six months later. This is not such an unreasonable time under all the circumstances. Defendant was across the continent and claims that she was hampered, not only by distance, but by lack of funds. Her action, under the circumstances, was within a reasonable time. Furthermore, the law does not favor default judgments in divorce actions and courts are always alert to detect and correct fraud.

[5] The limitation of time prescribed by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, is inapplicable here. In the case of McGuinness v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 222, 237 P. 42, 40 A. L. R. 1110, it was held that a trial court has inherent power to set aside a judgment obtained through a fraud committed upon it, and its right so to do is not derived from section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor limited to the time therein specified.

[6] Respondent urges that defendant has a remedy in a new equitable proceeding to set aside this judgment on the ground of fraud, and with this we agree, but it seems useless to subject her to the delay and expense of another action when relief could and should be given herein, and we have concluded, therefore, that the order appealed from should be reversed. It is so ordered.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Claudian Bannister against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

B. J. Bradner and R. C. Gortner, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, Philip C. Sterry, and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of the trial court made and entered after it had granted the motion of the defendant for a nonsuit at the close of all of the evidence in the case. The action was one for damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of the defendant in the operation of one of its cars on and along Spring street at its intersection with Fifth street, in the city of Los Angeles. The accident occurred on May 17, 1924, at or about the hour of 1:45 p. m., while the plaintiff, with others, was in the act of traversing the crossing at Spring street on the north side of Fifth street, and while so doing was struck by the defendant's car while it was going south on Spring street and was in the act of traversing the intersection of the two streets. At said time there were ordinances in force in the city of Los Angeles regulating travel and traffic at the intersections of its business streets, by the terms of which, generally speaking, street cars and vehicle traffic were required to stop when certain signals indicated that the transverse travel and traffic were to go on.

Upon the trial of the cause before a jury the plaintiff and several of her witnesses testified that she, with several others, started to cross Spring street at the above crossing when the traffic signals indicated that foot passengers and vehicular traffic proceeding in the same direction with herself were to "go"; that when she started she looked to the northward and saw the street car, which presently struck her, standing still and receiving and discharging passengers; that she paid no further attention to it and heard no warning signals from it until she was struck by it in the middle of the street. At the close of the plaintiff's case, wherein the above facts were shown, the defendant made a motion for nonsuit, which the trial court denied; whereupon the defendant produced the motorman of its car and certain passengers thereon and other witnesses, who testified that the car was in motion and in the act of crossing said intersection when the stop signals were shown, and which evidence tended, if believed, to contradict the evidence given by the plaintiff's witnesses in the foregoing regard. Some of these witnesses also testified that warning signals on the car were given as the car entered the intersection and up to the moment of its collision with the plaintiff. It thus clearly appears that, when the evidence on both sides was in and the cause was ready for submission to the jury, the evidence, taken as a whole, was clearly and substantially conflicting upon the main issues in the case. Under these circumstances and at the close of the whole case, the defendant again moved the court to grant a nonsuit upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove a sufficient case for the jury, and also upon the ground that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The trial court granted said motion upon both grounds and entered its judgment accordingly in favor of the defendant. The sole question presented for consideration upon this appeal is as to whether or not the trial court was guilty of an abuse of discretion in granting said motion for nonsuit.

[1] The rule governing the power and propriety on the part of the trial judge in the matter of granting a nonsuit at the conclusion of the whole testimony in the case is clearly and correctly stated In the Matter of Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 P. 631, wherein it is declared to be the rule that the right of the court to direct a verdict and the right of the court to grant a nonsuit at the conclusion of the evidence in the case are absolutely the same, and that the court may grant such a nonsuit only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled and indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such verdict were given. The foregoing rule is fully supported by the authorities which are cited in the foregoing case in support of it. The court, after referring to these authorities, sums up the rule to be the following: That if the plaintiff present evidence of so substantial a character as that, notwithstanding the conflict raised by the defendant's evidence, it would support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, it would have been error for the court to have granted a motion for nonsuit, and it would have been error on the part of the court to direct a verdict for the defendant.

[2-4] Applying the foregoing rule to the facts of this case, we are led to the inevitable conclusion that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the defendant's motion for nonsuit at the close of the evidence in the case, and this conclusion applies equally to both grounds upon which the motion for nonsuit was made and granted, since as to the latter ground, namely, the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, the evidence was also sharply in conflict, and, this being so, it is the general rule that the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury.

It follows from the foregoing conclusions that the judgment rendered and entered in favor of the defendant must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 24, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑406(4)—Failure to allege that negligent driver was acting within scope of employment held inconsequential, where parties consented to trial on such theory.

Failure of complaint for personal injuries to allege that negligent taxicab driver was acting as agent of defendant within scope of employment at time of accident held of no consequence, where plaintiff, in answer to court's question before trial, stated that complaint was intended to allege agency, and defendant, in answer to court's further question, thereupon stated that he was willing to consider his answer as denying agency, and case was tried on such issue.

2. Master and servant 🔑330(3)—Finding that negligent taxicab driver was acting within scope of employment held not without supporting evidence.

Finding that negligent taxicab driver was acting as agent of defendant within scope of employment at time of accident, rather than as independent contractor, held not without any supporting evidence, where driver was intrusted with vehicle, with permission to use it at his discretion in business of employer.

3. Master and servant 🔑300—Where employee intrusted with vehicle to use at his discretion in employer's business injures another, injured person need prove only that employee was negligent and acting within general scope of employment to recover from employer.

Where employee intrusted with possession and operation of vehicle, with permission to use it at his discretion in business of employer injures another person, injured person need not prove that employee was engaged in executing any particular business or specific command of principal at time of injuries to recover from employer, but need prove only that employee was negligent and was acting within general scope of employment.

4. Master and servant 🔑332(5)—Findings held sufficiently to show that negligent taxicab driver was acting within scope of employment.

Findings that defendant was conducting taxicab business, that negligent driver was in his employ, and that such driver was operating automobile belonging to defendant, and driving it within scope of employment at time of injury, held sufficiently to show that negligent taxicab driver was acting within scope of employment at time of accident.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Ella Reed against Joe Parra and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Parra appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Richard A. Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This action was commenced against the defendants Joe Parra, as owner, and Frank Fernandez, as driver, of a taxicab, which, on September 4, 1924, backed into the plaintiff, causing the injuries complained of. Judgment was rendered against both defendants. The judgment as against the defendant Fernandez has become final and this is an appeal by the defendant Parra.

The principal contentions of the appellant are that there is (1) no allegation in the complaint, (2) no evidence in the record, and (3) no finding of fact that at the time and place of the accident the defendant Fernandez was acting as the agent of the appellant and within the scope of his employment.

[1] As to the first point: It is true that there is no specific allegation that when the injury to the plaintiff occurred Fernandez was the agent or employee of Parra. It is alleged, however, that at the time in question Fernandez was operating the car, the same being the property of his codefendant Parra, and acting within the scope of his employment. But the omission specifically to allege agency was cured by what took place at the trial. When the case was called and the trial judge had examined the pleadings, he addressed the following question to counsel for the plaintiff:

> "Is it intended to allege in the complaint that one of the defendants is the agent of the other?"

To which counsel for the plaintiff answered in the affirmative. After some discussion counsel for the appellant stated:

> "So that I may not be misunderstood: Our contention is that we made the denial to meet the complaint as it was drawn, and we say—we deny that at the time of the accident the codefendant was engaged in the performance of any duty as agent or that he was acting as agent for the defendant at the time of the accident."

Following this statement the court inquired of counsel for appellant:

> "You are simply treating it as a denial under that theory, but you are willing to consider that it does deny, and we will try that issue?"

To which counsel for appellant answered in the affirmative. The case was then tried as though the question of agency were at issue. The infirmity of the plaintiff's pleading thus became of no consequence on the trial of that issue.

[2] The evidence bearing on the question of agency is disclosed in part by the testimony of the appellant himself on direct examination as follows:

> "In September, 1924, I was engaged in the taxi business. I did employ Frank Fernandez as a driver. I was the legal owner of the car. I did authorize Mr. Fernandez to take it to the garage or to his home, wherever he wanted to take it. I don't care where he went after he got through working. I gave him that authority."

The accident occurred near the home of Fernandez about 8:30 o'clock in the morning, just as he was leaving to engage in the day's business. It further appeared in evidence that Fernandez was employed by Parra on a percentage basis to take passengers and collect fares from them at times and places convenient to Fernandez. While there is evidence in the record from which the court might have concluded that Fernandez was acting as an independent contractor, there is also sufficient evidence upon which to base a finding that the relation of employer and employee existed between the two defendants.

[3] The evidence favorable to the plaintiff's contention, therefore, warranted the application of the "roving commission" rule approved in Jessen v. Peterson, Nelson & Co., 18 Cal. App. 349, 123 P. 219, wherein it is stated on pages 353 and 354 (123 P. 221):

> "It is the accepted rule in this and other jurisdictions that where an employee is intrusted with the possession and operation of a vehicle, with permission to use it at his discretion in the business of the employer, the latter will be held responsible in damages for injuries inflicted upon the person of another resulting from the negligence of the employee in the use and operation of the vehicle; and in such a case it is not necessary for the person seeking damages to prove that at the time of the injuries the employee was engaged in executing any particular business or specific command of his principal. That the employee, at the time of the commission of the tort, was acting within the general scope of his employment, and that the injury occurred as the result of his negligence, is all that need be shown in order to charge his employer with liability for such injury."

See, also, Brimberry v. Dudfield Lumber Co., 183 Cal. 454, 462, 463, 191 P. 894; Grantham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 764, 182 P. 73.

[4] As to the third point: The court found that on and prior to the day of the accident the defendant Parra was conducing an automobile rental and taxicab business as a carrier of passengers for hire; that the defendant Fernandez was on said day in the employ of said Parra as driver of an automobile used in said business; that on the day in question the defendant Fernandez was operating an automobile belonging to the defendant Parra and was driving the same within the scope of his employment at the time of the injury. These findings were abundantly sufficient on the issue of agency. No other points require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

PATTERSON v. JOHN P. MILLS ORGANIZATION, Inc. (L. A. 9251.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⚷37(2)—Agreement held subject to rescission for vendor's misrepresentation of quantity of land, whether constituting purchase contract or obligation to enter into future purchase contract.

Agreement relative to purchase of real property containing misrepresentations by vendor as to amount of land in parcel to be sold held subject to rescission by purchaser, entitling purchaser in such case to recover money paid under contract, irrespective of whether contract was for the purchase of real property or constituted merely an obligation to enter into a future contract to purchase property.

2. Principal and agent ⚷146(3)—Liability of one executing purchase contract as owner held not voided on purchaser's rescission by claimed existence of undisclosed principal.

Where contract relative to purchase of property did not disclose name of principal, defendant, executing contract as owner, could not avoid liability to return payments made thereunder, in purchaser's suit for rescission, on ground that he was merely a selling agent.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by Ned R. Patterson against the John P. Mills Organization, Inc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. L. Nichols, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newcomb Condee and Vernon P. Spencer, both of Inglewood, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment against it for $393, the amount, together with interest, paid by plaintiff upon a contract involving a purchase of real property, which contract plaintiff sought to have rescinded in the present action. Plaintiff alleged that in April, 1924, defendant represented to plaintiff that a certain piece of ground belonging to defendant in Riverside county, Cal., contained 2½ acres, and plaintiff was thereby induced to purchase the same at a price of $750 per acre, or $1,875 for the parcel; that plaintiff signed an agreement, a copy of which was annexed to the complaint, and no deed for the land had been executed to him; that he paid $356.25 upon the purchase price of said land to the defendant; that in pursuance of said contract defendant thereafter requested plaintiff to sign an agreement to purchase land in Riverside county, which was not the same land which plaintiff had agreed to purchase, and, in fact, contained only 1.92 acres; that plaintiff refused to execute said agreement and notified defendant that he rescinded his former contract and demanded the return of the money paid thereunder; and that defendant refused to return said amount.

The answer of defendant denied that the piece of ground described in the second contract which defendant requested plaintiff to sign was not the same piece of ground that plaintiff had theretofore agreed to purchase and denied that said piece of ground described in said second contract did not contain 2½ acres.

The trial court found that the defendant had represented to plaintiff that the property which he was contracting to purchase contained 2½ acres, and that by said representation plaintiff was induced to purchase said property at a price of $1,875, and that plaintiff paid on account of the purchase price thereof the sum of $356.25; that thereafter defendant requested plaintiff to sign an agreement to purchase land therein described, stating that such land was the same land described in the former agreement, which plaintiff had already agreed to purchase; that the said land was not the same land that plaintiff had agreed to purchase, and that the said piece of ground contained only 1.92 acres, while plaintiff had contracted to purchase a piece of land containing 2½ acres; that plaintiff thereupon rescinded the agreement to purchase said land and demanded the return of his money and tendered to defendant any benefits which he had received under said first agreement.

[1, 2] On the appeal no defense to the action on its merits is urged and the only points made upon the appeal are technical ones, to the effect that the contract sought to be rescinded was not really a contract to purchase and that the defendant acted as a sales agent for the owner of the property and was not the owner. Both objections are without merit. The contract, whether it be for the purchase of real property or an obligation to enter into a future contract for that purpose, was the subject of rescission, under the circumstances found by the court, because of the misrepresentations as to the amount of land in the parcel to be sold. Upon rescission of the contract plaintiff was entitled to have the money returned to him which he had paid thereunder. Appellant concedes this, but contends that plaintiff should have brought his action against the owner of the property; that defendant was a mere selling agent. The contract does not disclose the name of the principal, and under such circumstances the plaintiff was entitled to hold the defendant. The rule applicable here is stated in 1 Cal. Jur. p. 819 et seq., § 103 et seq., as follows:

> "The rule has been long and continuously settled that an agent who signs his own name, instead of that of the principal, when he intends to bind the latter, becomes himself liable, the contract being considered his own. This is true when he describes himself as agent or is known to be or avowedly acts as such as well as where the existence or identity of his principal is not disclosed. No person in making a contract is considered to be the agent of another unless he stipulates for his principal by name, stating his agency in the instrument which he signs. To exclude the personal liability of an agent who signs in his own name, an intention to bind the principal must appear upon the face of the instrument."

The authorities cited in support of the foregoing text are abundant and conclusive.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MOREL v. MOREL. (L. A. 9157.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1928.

1. Pleading ⚿=350(1)—Notice of motion for judgment on pleadings is unnecessary, where motion is made in open court at inception of trial.

Where motion for judgment on pleadings was made on day of trial without previous notice having been given to defendant, contention that failure to give notice was error held without merit, since Code of Civil Procedure contains no requirement for giving notice of motion for judgment on pleading when parties are in open court when such motion is made at inception of trial.

2. Pleading ⚿=350(1)—Notice of motion for judgment on pleadings, if necessary, held waived, where motion was made in open court without objection.

Where motion for judgment on pleadings was made in open court without notice previously given, and no objection was made thereto on ground that notice had not been given, held, that had such notice been necessary it would have been waived.

3. Pleading ⚿=345(1)—Judgment on pleadings held proper, where complaint to quiet title contained facts on which title rested and answer denied ownership; denial being legal conclusion.

Where plaintiff, in action to quiet title, set out her title in detail and probative facts on which it rested, and defendant, in answer, denied that plaintiff was owner or was entitled to possession of real property described in plaintiff's second amended complaint, held, that motion for judgment on pleading was properly granted, since denial was not sufficient to present an issue, being merely a legal conclusion.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by Dorcas Lorena Morel against Jules Morel to quiet title. From an order granting a motion for judgment on pleadings, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dryer, Castle & Hartke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order of the trial court granting the motion of the plaintiff for judgment on the pleadings in an action to quiet title. The complaint herein was filed on October 11, 1922. The plaintiff therein set forth with much of detail her chain of title to the property and also set forth with like detail the sources of the appellant's claim of an estate or interest therein and that his claims thereto are false, fictitious, and fraudulent. Thereafter and on October 4, 1924, the plaintiff, by leave of court, filed her second amended complaint, wherein she set forth with equal or even greater detail her chain of title and the basis of the defendant's alleged fictitious claims. The defendant, on October 14, 1924, filed his answer to said second amended complaint. The cause, being thus apparently at issue, was set for trial in the superior court and came on regularly for trial therein on December 16, 1925, before the court sitting without a jury, whereupon and at the inception of said trial the plaintiff moved for a judgment in her favor upon the pleadings, and upon the ground that the defendant's answer contained no sufficient denials of said second amended complaint. The trial court granted said motion and accordingly made and entered its judgment in the plaintiff's favor, and it is from such judgment that this appeal has been taken.

[1-3] The cause upon appeal is presented upon the judgment roll. The appellant makes two contentions, the first of which is that the trial court was in error in entertaining said motion for judgment on the pleadings without previous notice having been given to the defendant that such motion would be made on the day of trial. There is no merit in this contention. The Code of Civil Procedure contains no requirement for the giving of notice of a motion for judgment on the pleadings when the parties are in open court when such motion is made at the inception of the trial. The parties were in open court when this motion was made and made

⚿=For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes no objection thereto upon the ground that notice thereof had not been given. Such notice, even if it had been necessary, would thereby have been waived. The appellant's second contention is that the answer of the defendant raised a sufficient issue to require a denial of said motion. It is true that the answer contains the following clause: "Denies that plaintiff is the owner or is entitled to the possession of the real property described in plaintiff's second amended complaint." This denial, however, cannot be held sufficient to present an issue, in view of the fact that the plaintiff's second amended complaint sets forth in detail the probative facts upon which the plaintiff's title to the ownership of the property in question is based, and, the defendant having failed to deny these in his answer, his denial of such ownership in the plaintiff must be held to be merely the denial of a legal conclusion. Davies v. Ramsdell, 40 Cal. App. 427, 181 P. 94. It follows that the trial court was not in error in granting the plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, nor in entering judgment thereon in plaintiff's favor.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLARK v. CLARK. (L. A. 9167.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 25, 1928.

1. Husband and wife 🔑4—Husband's duty to support wife held to continue, notwithstanding they were separated and wife earned some money and received voluntary help from father.

Husband's duty to support wife held to continue, notwithstanding they had maintained separate homes for some time and wife earned some money and received voluntary help from her father.

2. Divorce 🔑131—Evidence held sufficient to support trial court's findings that wife was entitled to divorce for willful neglect and failure to provide.

Evidence held sufficient to support trial court's findings, entitling plaintiff to divorce, that defendant had for more than 6 years willfully neglected to provide plaintiff with common necessaries of life, having the ability to do so.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action for divorce by Lilian Trask Clark against Samuel Boyd Clark. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward H. Miller and Arch G. McLay, both of Huntington Park, for appellant.

Luce & Swing, of San Diego, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. [1, 2] Action for divorce upon the ground, first, of desertion, and second, willful neglect and failure to provide. Nonsuit was granted as to the first cause of action, but as to the second cause the court found that defendant had, for a period of more than 6 years, willfully neglected to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life, having the ability so to do, and accordingly entered in her favor an interlocutory judgment of divorce, from which defendant now appeals. The only real question presented is the sufficiency of the testimony of the parties, and the sufficiency of the evidence given in corroboration thereof, to justify the findings in favor of plaintiff.

The evidence in brief fairly tends to show the following: The parties were married in 1895. In 1914 or 1915 plaintiff left their home in New Mexico, with the consent and approval of defendant, to take care of their daughter, who was seriously ill in Brooklyn, N. Y. Upon arrival there she took a position as teacher and also took roomers in order to maintain herself and two daughters. Defendant followed some six months or so later. There was no room for him at the apartment of plaintiff, and he did not provide any home for her to come to. Although his friendship with her was continuous, he lived separate and apart from her, and they never thereafter resumed marital relations. Defendant was unemployed and contributed nothing to her support at this time. Some 2 years thereafter he started sending her monthly payments of $50, which she used for the children. He continued this contribution for several years; then reduced it to $35 a month, which amount he sent her at intervals until about 1924, when payments ceased entirely. Friendly relations between plaintiff and defendant were unceasing, and apparently she was living apart from him at all times with his consent, express or implied, upon the understanding that she would come to him whenever he should supply a home and support for her. Upon more than one occasion she permitted him to stop at her house upon payment to her of a nominal amount to cover his own expenses. Under these circumstances, his duty to support her existed, notwithstanding the voluntary help of her father and the fruits of her own efforts, and there appears to be no valid excuse for his failure to do so. "Until defendant, in good faith, had offered a new abode, suitable to the family station, it was not incumbent on the wife to rejoin her husband, and though living away from him she retained all her conjugal rights, one of which was the right to continuing support." Winslow v. Winslow (Cal. App.) 255 P. 880.

Defendant was trained as a bookkeeper and there is no showing that the ill health of which he complains was of such a nature as to deprive him of this means of livelihood. In other words, under the evidence, the court could have properly concluded that he lacked neither ability nor opportunity to do better, and that his failure to provide for his family and neglect of them were, therefore, willful. "The support of his wife is a continuing obligation on the part of the husband, and his failure to meet this obligation is a continuing cause for a divorce. * * * The law does not fix the amount of income which the husband must receive in order to impose upon him the obligation of supporting his wife, nor does it attempt to designate what are the common necessaries of life. These matters vary with the varying circumstances of the parties to the marriage, and it is left to the discretion of the judge in each case to determine whether the husband's income, as well as the relation between him and his wife, are such as to impose upon him the obligation of providing for her wants. * * *" Wagner v. Wagner, 104 Cal. 293, 296, 297, 37 P. 935, 936.

In short, we hold that although the evidence in this case, both in chief and as to corroboration thereof, is meager, nevertheless it cannot be said that it is insufficient to support the findings attacked, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1928.

1. Abatement and revival ⚷58(1)—Personal injury action held not to survive death of plaintiff.

Action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence held not to survive death of plaintiff; common-law rule that such action does not survive death of either party being effective unless modified by statute.

2. Appeal and error ⚷333—On death of plaintiff in personal injury action, defendant's appeal should be dismissed and appropriate proceedings taken to dismiss action in trial court.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by Domenica Munchiando against Hollis Bach and another for damages for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Bach appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, and Hollis Bach, for appellant.

J. M. Fursee, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. A motion for a nonsuit was granted as to the defendant Four-Wheel Hydraulic Brake Sales Corporation. At the close of the trial a judgment was entered in favor of the defendant Bach on an instructed verdict. The plaintiff moved for a new trial as to both defendants. The motion was denied as to the defendant corporation and granted as to defendant Bach, the latter of whom prosecutes this appeal from that order. The alleged injuries were suffered by the plaintiff on the 1st day of January, 1925. Upon a showing made by the defendant Bach, it appears that the plaintiff died on the 13th day of May, 1927. From this showing it is urged that the action is abated.

[1, 2] The common-law rule is that an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, except under certain conditions which do not exist here, does not survive the death of either the person to or the person by whom the wrong was done. See Clark v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 527, 150 P. 357, L. R. A. 1916A, 1142; 1 Cal. Jur. p. 71. This rule is in effect in this state except where modified by statute, and there seems to be no statute which would affect the situation here presented. The appeal has become moot and should be dismissed for that reason. Appropriate proceedings should be taken in the trial court to dismiss the action on account of the abatement thereof.

The appeal is dismissed.

Action for materials furnished, by P. A. Behannesey, doing business under the firm name and style of the Behannesey Art Studio, against Stuart Paton and others, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Stuart Paton Pictures Company, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Cinema Finance Corporation appeals. Affirmed.

Farrand & Slosson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

David E. Fulwider and Harold A. Fendler, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment entered against appellant on account of its obligations arising from the production of a motion picture. Judgment by default went against H. C. Maynard and Stuart Paton Pictures Company of Los Angeles. The appeal is prosecuted alone by Cinema Finance Corporation.

Stuart Paton Pictures Company of Los Angeles was an association of individuals consisting of Stuart Paton, H. C. Maynard, and W. G. Taylor. Cinema Finance Corporation was incorporated under the laws of the state of Delaware, engaged, apparently, in the business of distributing motion pictures to the trade. Prior to the execution of any of the contracts herein mentioned, Stuart Paton Pictures Company had entered into a contract with the Associated Exhibitors, Inc., the terms of which are not important, by which said Stuart Paton Company agreed to manufacture and deliver said motion picture for distribution. This contract, however, was reckoned with by the Stuart Paton Pictures Company and Cinema Finance Corporation in the contract entered into by them on May 14, 1925, which contract is of paramount importance in determining the rights of the parties to this appeal. All of the parties herein were engaged one way or another in the motion picture industry. Cinema Finance Corporation seems not to have been limited merely to furnishing financial assistance to producers of pictures and promoters of enterprises, but, according to a term selected by itself and inserted in its contract, it lent its "co-operation" as well as its financial assistance to the producers and manufacturers of motion pictures to whom it furnished money to accomplish or complete picture enterprises. The contract made by it indicates very clearly that it was more than a mere financial concern and that it entered into joint enterprises or ventures with producers, reserving unto itself almost absolute power in directing, supervising, and controlling the production and manufacture of pictures which it undertook to finance.

The estimate cost of producing the picture which forms the basis of this controversy was $60,000. Of this sum the Cinema Finance Corporation was "willing to advance $26,500" and the Stuart Paton Pictures Company was "willing to furnish the sum of $33,500," said sums to be advanced by both parties during the course of production as the ratio of each party's total advance bore to the total cost of production. As security for the repayment of all sums advanced by said Cinema Finance Corporation, together with interest thereon, it was agreed that said Stuart Paton Pictures Company assigned, transferred, mortgaged, and pledged unto said Cinema Picture Corporation all right, title, and interest in and to all negatives and positive prints of every kind that might be made of said motion pictures, together with the right of possession. Every possible right or privilege that may have accrued to Stuart Paton Pictures Company by reason of its part in the production of said picture or its interest therein was covered by said assignment and mortgage. It was also provided in said contract that all contracts made or which might be made thereafter by said Stuart Paton Pictures Company "with actors, actresses, and members of their staff in the production of said picture, shall be in form assignable to second party (Cinema Finance Corporation) and provide that the said persons in said contracts mentioned or referred to shall be obliged, when requested to do so by said second party, in case first party (Stuart Paton Pictures Company) shall fail, refuse, neglect, or be unable to personally carry on the production of said pictures, to perform the services thereunder in the making of said pictures for said Cinema Finance Corporation and under the direction of such directors as second party shall designate. First party shall, upon execution hereof, deliver to second party copies of such contracts as first party may have entered into with any persons for services to be performed in the course of said production; it being understood that as to such contracts second party shall be subrogated to the rights of first party." The contract contains a provision that, in the event that the director Stuart Paton, placed in charge by Stuart Paton Pictures Company, shall become incapacitated for a period of more than five successive days, or in the event of his neglect or refusal to personally supervise and direct said production, said Cinema Finance Company may, under certain contingencies, assume the direction, supervision, control, and completion of the said picture and for such purposes employ such director or directors as may be acceptable to said Associated Exhibitors, Inc., and may employ such persons and means as to it (Cinema Finance Company) may seem best, and in the event it shall undertake the completion of said picture it shall have access to and full use of the studio where the same is being produced and full use of the services of all actors, actresses, directing staff and employees of said Stuart Paton Pictures Company and all costumes, sets, scenes, properties, paraphernalia, apparatus, and equipment, and immediate and continuous access and use of all contracts, records, books, stories, scenarios, etc., and other materials belonging to or under the control of or available to said Stuart Paton Pictures Company for use in said production. It is expressly provided that said Cinema Finance Corporation "shall not be obligated to advance for any and all purposes a sum in excess of $26,500 in the production of said picture," but it may do so if it sees fit.

Said contract is very full in detail and gives to the Cinema Finance Corporation, for its protection, absolute power to take over the entire venture, substituting itself in the place of Stuart Paton Pictures Company, at its option, upon the happening of the contingencies named therein and complete the production of the picture. This contract was made and recorded some time before the contract upon which the judgment herein rests was made by Stuart Paton Pictures Company with respondent, P. A. Behannesey, doing business under the firm name and style of Behannesey Art Studio, by the terms of which said Behannesey was to furnish certain dressings for sets and properties to be used in the production of said picture at the agreed price of $1,500. Appellant admits and urges as an argument in support of its appeal the fact that Behannesey had knowledge of the contract existing between the Stuart Paton Pictures Company and the Cinema Finance Corporation at the time he entered into his contract with the Paton Pictures Company, and for that reason was bound by all the terms of the appellant's contract. There can be no doubt that Behannesey had full knowledge of said Cinema Finance Corporation's contract, as asserted by appellant, nor is there any doubt that appellant had full knowledge of the Behannesey contract long prior to the day it took over the completion of the picture. Behannesey's knowledge of the powers expressly reserved by Cinema Finance Corporation to take over all contracts made by Stuart Paton Pictures Company with third parties and its right to be subrogated in the place of said Picture Company in outstanding contracts if it should elect to complete the picture, which it actually did, is a fact in support of respondent's case rather than against it. Behannesey's knowledge of the Cinema Finance Corporation's contractual rights no doubt had some influence upon his action. The fact that a financial concern was interested in the project to the extent that it reserved to itself the right to complete the picture in the event the original promoters failed therein was a circumstance calculated to inspire in the minds of those who engaged to furnish skill, labor or materials in and for the production of the picture an assurance that the financial sponsor, in the event it should elect to complete the picture, would compensate those whose skill, labor, and materials contributed to its production.

Respondent's contract was made with Stuart Paton Pictures Company on May 30, 1925. Appellant, on June 9th, paid the full amount it unconditionally obligated itself to pay by its contract, to wit, $26,500, but the picture was not completed. It thereupon, on said June 9th, assumed full charge of the production and completion of said motion picture, discharged the production manager placed in charge by Stuart Paton Pictures Company, and placed in his stead a Mr. Travers, a manager of its own selection. Other officers of appellant became active in the production of said picture. On June 16th Stuart Paton, Maynard and Taylor executed a bill of sale conveying all of their right, title, and interest in and to said moving picture production to appellant. Respondent's property, including sets and props, remained in the studio. The greater portion of it had been used in the production of the picture under the Stuart Paton Pictures Company régime. Some of it, however, was reused by appellant, and other property not before brought into the picture was furnished by respondent to appellant.

We think there is no ground upon which the appeal can be sustained by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 1624, Civil Code, or on the theory that Douglas Travers exceeded his authority in acknowledging the past indebtedness due under respondent's contract.

The positive testimony of John Hauerwaas, assistant secretary and assistant manager of appellant, Cinema Finance Corporation, and Douglas Travers, specially appointed by appellant production manager for the completion of said motion picture, is that said production manager was authorized by Maurice Barber, manager of appellant, to do all things necessary to keep the picture in production, which included the hiring and assembling of sets and props and the doing of everything necessary to complete the production of said picture. Upon assuming his duties, Travers told respondent and other creditors that he had been placed in charge of the production of the picture by the Cinema Finance Corporation and was engaged in checking up the indebtedness of the Stuart Paton Pictures Company. The only possible inference that may be reasonably drawn from the testimony of Travers, Gatzert, L'Estrange, Agard, Essey, and Hartley is that Travers gave respondent's representative and various other creditors to understand that the indebtedness incurred by the Stuart Paton Picture Company was assumed by the appellant and that it had subrogated itself in place of Stuart Paton Pictures Company, as in its contract with said company it had expressly reserved the right to do, and that a continuance of the performance of the contracts made by said creditors with Stuart Paton Pictures was the condition upon which and thereby furnished a consideration—if indeed appellant was not obligated for other reasons—for the assumption by appellant of all obligations arising from partially performed contracts in the production of said picture. That the statements made by Mr. Travers immediately upon assuming the position of manager of production of the picture, to wit, on June 11th, as to the money due respondent upon his incompleted contract to the effect, "You needn't worry about your money; it will be paid," would, if there were no other question involved, be deemed a promise under subdivision 3, § 2794, Civil Code, to answer for the obligation of another, made upon a consideration beneficial to the appellant, there seems no room for doubt. Respondent had furnished under its original contract dressings and props for a number of settings and agreed to furnish a draper to hang all drapes, and did, after appellant had taken over the completion of the picture, furnish to appellant properties in accordance with its original contract with Stuart Paton Pictures Company, and supplied the services of a draper, set dresser, and assistant set dresser. The property and services furnished by respondent formed a substantial part of the picture when completed, and some of the property which was furnished under the original contract was "shot" over again by appellant, and the scene as thus revised was used in the production of the picture.

Appellant has cited a number of appellate court decisions of this state, as well as certain sections of the Civil Code, to the effect that a special promise to answer for the debt or default of another is invalid unless in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged or his agent, except in the cases provided for in section 2794, Civil Code. We have been cited to no case where the court applied appellant's contentions to facts similar to the facts of the instant case. The respondent in this case was induced to complete his indivisible contract upon the promise of appellant that he would be treated as an original contractor, based upon a consideration that was beneficial to the promisor. It is not probable that respondent would have otherwise agreed to complete the contract, but for the promise on the part of appellant that it would place itself in the place of the original promisor. All of the inferences support respondent's claim.

Judgment affirmed.

SPENCER v. WEMOTT et al.

(L. A. 9985.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied March 22, 1928.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑14—Whether language used in will impliedly appoints executors depends on particular circumstances of case and testator's intent (Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1318, 1321, 1324, 1327).

Determination whether language used in will constitutes appointment of executors by implication depends on particular facts of case and testator's intent, to be determined with reference to language of will under Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1318, 1321, 1324, 1327.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑14—Appointment as executors of persons directed by will to act as custodians of property for testatrix's children and as guardians held not abuse of discretion (Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1318, 1321, 1324, 1327, 1371).

Provision in holographic will, "I desire my two friends * * * to act without bonds as custodians of property for both children and guardians for L. R. S.," held sufficient indication of testatrix's intent to appoint friends named as executors under Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1318, 1321, 1324, 1327, so that order of trial court appointing them as executors of her will was not abuse of discretion under section 1371, permitting issuance of letters testamentary to persons intended by testator to be given administration of estate, though not actually named as executors.

Spencer & Dennis, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cantillon & Hamilton and Frank A. Sievers, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. Appeal by C. E. Spencer, petitioner for letters of administration with the will annexed in the above-entitled matter, from that portion of an order of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, whereby Wallace W. Wemott and Robert R. Curry were appointed executors of the last will of deceased, and whereby the petition of said appellant was denied.

The question presented upon the appeal is whether or not the trial court erred in holding that the will of decedent named Messrs. Wemott and Curry executors, by implication, if not directly. The will was written in its entirety by testatrix in her own handwriting and is as follows:

> "I hereby do give and bequeath to my daughter Lois Roberta Spencer all my personal property and furnishings at the home at 1601 Country Club Dr. Glendale.
> "Out of my share of the community property I leave to my mother Alice V. Anable the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000) the same to be used at least in part to put her in some home.
> "Of the remainder of my share of community property I leave two-thirds (⅔) to my daughter Lois Roberta and one-third (⅓) to my son William Edward Spencer.
> "I desire my two friends Wallace W. Wemott and Robert R. Curry to act without bond as custodians of property for both children and guardians for Lois Roberta Spencer.
> "Marguerite I. Spencer.
> "April 14, 1927."

[1, 2] The problem of the trial court was to find the intention of the testatrix from the language used. In seeking for such intent, there are certain well-settled principles of interpretation and construction enumerated by this court in Estate of Peabody, 154 Cal. 173, 97 P. 184, as follows:

> "The important thing is the intention of the testator. Section 1317. This is to be ascertained from the words of the will, taking into view the circumstances under which it was made. Section 1318. All parts of the will are to be considered in relation to each other so as to form, if possible, a consistent whole. Section 1321. Words are to be taken in their ordinary grammatical sense, unless a clear intent to use them otherwise is apparent and that sense can be ascertained. Section 1324. Technical words are not to be taken in their technical sense if it satisfactorily appears that the will was drawn solely by the testator and that he was unacquainted with such technical sense. Section 1327. 'A technical construction of words and phrases, although prima facie the one which should prevail, will not go to the extent of defeating any obvious general intention of the testator, since wills are often prepared by those wholly unacquainted with the precise technical force of legal formulas.' [Citing numerous authorities.]"

In the instant case, also, section 1371 of our Civil Code is applicable. That section provides that, when it appears by the terms of a will that it was the intention of the testator to commit the execution thereof and the administration of his estate to any person as executor, such person, although not named as executor, is entitled to letters testamentary in like manner as if he had been so named.

It is apparent that there is some ambiguity and a lack of precision in the language of the testatrix, which is not unusual in holographic wills. In solving a problem such as is presented here, each case must depend upon its own peculiar facts, as was pointed out in Estate of Henderson, 161 Cal. 357, 119 P. 496.

We do not think the court abused its discretion in making the order appealed from, and that order is affirmed.

WAYLAND v. LATHAM. (Civ. 5986.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 7, 1928.

Rehearing Denied March 7, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 5, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑199(1)—Court, after improperly denying verdict and return of verdict, may enter judgment contrary thereto for same reason that motion should originally have been granted (Code Civ. Proc. § 629, as added by St. 1923, p. 749, § 1).

Where a motion for a directed verdict has been made and improperly denied, and the verdict has been returned, the court notwithstanding the verdict may, under Code Civ. Proc. § 629, as added by St. 1923, p. 749, § 1, enter a judgment contrary thereto under the same rule and for the same reason that court should have granted motion for directed verdict, and is not precluded from entering such judgment because motion was properly denied for any reason whatsoever.

2. Trial 🔑139(1)—Court may direct verdict unless there is substantial evidence tending to prove all controverted facts.

Trial court has power to direct jury to render a verdict in absence of substantial evidence tending to prove all controverted facts necessary to contestant's case, and it is not necessary that there should have been an utter absence of conflict in evidence.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑291(16)—Evidence in unlawful detainer action as to modification of lease for reduction of monthly rent held insufficient for jury.

In action of unlawful detainer after default in payment of rent and three days' notice to pay rent or quit, evidence as to modification of lease by reducing monthly rent held insufficient for jury.

4. Trial 🔑139(1)—Directed verdict is proper whenever judge would be compelled to set contrary verdict aside.

A directed verdict is proper whenever, under the whole evidence, the judge would be compelled to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by evidence.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑33—Alleged oral modification of lease without consideration held void (Civ. Code, § 1698, and § 1624, subd. 5).

An alleged oral modification of lease providing for reduction of monthly rent without any consideration therefor held void, under Civ. Code, § 1698, and § 1624, subd. 5.

6. Landlord and tenant 🔑33—Tenant's threat of removing from premises unless rent was reduced held not consideration placing agreement within category of executed oral agreement (Civ. Code, § 1698).

Tenant's threat of removal from premises unless rent was reduced held not to constitute consideration for oral modification of lease contract within category of an executed oral agreement as required by Civ. Code, § 1698, for modification of written contracts.

7. Landlord and tenant 🔑33—Purchaser of interest in property under oral agreement did not have sufficient interest therein to modify lease.

Purchaser of interest in leased premises under oral agreement giving him no control or enforceable interest in property held not to have had a sufficient interest in property so as to authorize modification of lease irrespective of agency.

8. Landlord and tenant 🔑291(1)—Notice to pay rent or quit by agent of owner to whom lease was assigned without lessee's knowledge held sufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 1161; Civ. Code, §§ 821, 1111).

Three days' notice to pay rent or quit by owner's agent after assignment of lease without notice to lessee of change of ownership held sufficient under Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, and Civ. Code, §§ 821, 1111, particularly where lessee had knowledge that agent signing notice was agent of property and to whom she had paid rent for more than two years previous.

9. Jury 🔑37—Granting motion for judgment notwithstanding verdict in accordance with uncontradicted evidence did not deprive defendant of constitutional right to jury trial.

Where evidence in action of unlawful detainer in favor of plaintiff's cause of action was without conflict, and no other different judgment could have been entered thereon, and judgment entered was for specific relief prayed for and that supported by uncontradicted evidence, granting of motion for judgment notwithstanding verdict did not deprive defendant of constitutional right of trial by jury.

Knight, Boland & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Theodore M. Monell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an action of unlawful detainer after default in payment of rent and three days' notice to pay rent or quit. The cause was tried by a jury and a verdict returned in favor of the defendant. Before the entry of judgment thereon, the court, notwithstanding the verdict, on motion of plaintiff, rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff declaring a forfeiture of the lease, a restitution of the premises, $2,650 rent due, and an attorney fee in the sum of $500, together with his costs of suit.

It is the contention of the appellant that the court erred in setting aside the verdict of the jury and substituting its own judgment therefor, in that it is claimed the verdict finds substantial support in the evidence.

Before reviewing the evidence we will consider and analyze the law governing the subject of the power of the court to enter a judgment contrary to the verdict of the jury. Section 629, Code of Civil Procedure, added to said Code in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 750), so far as pertinent to this decision, provides:

> "When a motion for a directed verdict, which should have been granted, has been denied and a verdict rendered against the moving party, the court, at any time before the entry of judgment, either of its own motion or on motion of the aggrieved party, shall render judgment in favor of the aggrieved party notwithstanding the verdict."

This section of the Code has been before the courts for interpretation and construction in several cases. In Estate of Fleming, 199 Cal. 750, 251 P. 637, it is said:

> "It is a settled rule of law regarding trials by jury that in a proper case the court has full power to direct * * * a verdict. Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 459, 177 P. 283. When a motion for a directed verdict, which should have been granted, has been denied, and a verdict rendered against the moving party, it is the duty of the court, at any time before the entry of judgment, either of its own motion or on motion of the aggrieved party, to render judgment in favor of the party aggrieved, notwithstanding the verdict. Code Civ. Proc. § 629. Appellant is here contending that the power of the trial court in these matters is limited, by the provision of the section, supra, to granting a motion for judgment notwithstanding a verdict in those cases in which the antecedent motion for a directed verdict 'should have been granted,' and that, therefore, if for any reason the motion for a direction by the court was properly denied, the court is without power to grant the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Her first contention is that the motion for a directed verdict was properly denied, for the reason that the grounds on which it was based were not sufficiently stated, from which it follows, she argues, the court had no authority to grant the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. * * *

"We are of the view that section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure relates to the granting of a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict in a case in which the motion for a directed verdict 'should have been granted' on the evidence, and does not lend itself to the narrow construction appellant attempts to put upon it."

[1] The foregoing decision definitely settles the rule that, where a motion for a directed verdict has been made and improperly denied, and a verdict has been returned, the court, notwithstanding the verdict, may enter a judgment contrary thereto, under the same rule, and for the same reason that the court should have granted the motion for a directed verdict.

[2] This calls for a consideration of the law relative to the conditions under which a court may direct the verdict of the jury. In the case last cited it is said:

> "Appellant's second contention is that the motion for a directed verdict in this case was properly denied, for the reason that the evidence was sufficient to take the case to the jury. The trial court had power to direct the jury to render a verdict in favor of the respondents, unless there was substantial evidence tending to prove all the controverted facts necessary to establish the contestant's case. It was not necessary that there should have been an utter absence of conflict in the evidence. To deprive the court of the right to exercise its power, if there was a conflict, it must have been a substantial one. Estate of Sharon, supra, p. 459 [177 P. 283]; Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 P. 267."

In Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 P. 283, it is said:

> "It is a settled rule of law regarding trials by jury that in a proper case the court has full power to direct the jury to render a verdict. This power exists in favor of the defendant where there is no substantial evidence tending to prove all the controverted facts necessary to establish the plaintiff's case. It is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence. To deprive the court of the right to exercise this power, if there be a conflict, it must be a substantial one. There are numerous decisions to this effect. We cite the following: Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 473, 123 P. 267; Sill v. Ceschi, 167 Cal. 704, 706, 140 P. 949; Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 150, 155 P. 631; Jacobson v. Northwestern, etc., Co., 175 Cal. 468, 473, 166 P. 3; Perera v. Panama-P. I. E. Co., ante, 179 Cal. 63, 175 P. 454."

The cases cited by counsel for appellant are not in conflict with this rule. In Re Ross, 173 Cal. 178, 159 P. 603, it is held that:

> "It is elementary that a motion for nonsuit is not to be granted where there is any substantial evidence which, with the aid of all legitimate inferences favorable to the plaintiff, would support a verdict or finding that the material allegations of the complaint are true."

It was held in the Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 P. 631, also cited by appellant, that the right of the court to direct a verdict is, touching the condition of the evidence, absolutely the same as the right of the court to grant a nonsuit. In the latter case it is further held that the court may grant a nonsuit only when, disregarding conflicting evidence, and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such a verdict were given. We have no doubt that, in using the expression "disregarding conflicting evidence," the court refers to a substantial conflict, one that would be sufficient to support a verdict.

In the light of the foregoing well-established principles of law, and which are controlling in this case, we will examine the evidence.

September 12, 1922, one A. F. Rousseau, as lessor, and the defendant, as lessee, entered into a written lease of certain real property on Geary street in San Francisco, for a term of five years, commencing December 1, 1922, and ending November 30, 1927. This lease was, on October 5, 1922, assigned to the plaintiff in this action. By its terms the lease provided that the rent for the first year should be $400 per month, with an increase of $25 per month each year thereafter during the term of the lease, the rent to be paid on the first day of each and every month, in advance, during the life of the lease. The lease further provided:

> "If default be made in the payment of any rent, * * * the lessor may re-enter said premises and remove all persons therefrom, and, if any rent shall remain unpaid for ten days after the same becomes due, then this lease, at the option of the lessor, may be canceled and terminated."

The defendant went into possession under said lease and continued to occupy said premises until dispossessed by virtue of the judgment in this action. It is alleged in the complaint that defendant had failed to pay the rent due under said lease for the months of May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1926, the amount due and unpaid being $3,150, and that the three days' notice to pay or quit had been duly served and payment thereof had not been made.

The answer denies notice of the assignment of the lease to the plaintiff; denies the forfeiture of the lease; alleges that the rent was paid to October 1, 1926, and an offer made to pay rent for October, which offer was refused, demand being made for $3,150, the amount claimed to be due. As a special defense, it is alleged that on or about the 1st day of June, 1924, it was agreed that the rentals thereafter should be the sum of $350 per month. As to this last defense the defendant testified:

> "Sometime in June, 1924, I told Mr. Rucker, I could not afford to pay the rental which was at that time, I think, $425 a month. He listened to my story, and after all I told him he said, 'Well, what could you afford to pay?' and I told him $350 a month; and he said, 'Very well, we will let it go until further notice,' and I have been waiting ever since."

On cross-examination she testified:

> "He asked me how much I could afford to pay, and I said $350 a month. Q. What did he say then? A. And he said, 'Very well.' * * * Q. That was the final climax? A. Yes. Q. 'I cannot pay more than $350,' and he said, 'We will see what we can do about it'? A. Yes."

Joseph H. Rucker, president of Joseph H. Rucker Company, testified:

> "I had a conversation in the summer of 1924 with Mrs. Latham at my office. She had been asking regarding a reduction in the rent. * * * Joseph H. Rucker Company, of which I am president, were the agents for Dr. Wayland. Miss Carr had called me on the phone before that, some time in May, and complained about the rent, about business being bad, and I told Miss Carr that I had taken up the matter with the owner of the property, Dr. Wayland, at San José, and that she was asking for more than a temporary reduction for two or three months, and I told her the very best he was willing to do was to give her a reduction in her rent for the summer months to get her past the dull season, June, July, and August, and during that time he would allow her a rebate of $75 a month for those three months only, I mean June, July, and August, 1924. Such a rebate was given."

From June, 1924, to October 2, 1926, the defendant paid $350 per month rent, and the letter of October 2, 1926, was the first demand made upon her for the full amount of rent provided by the lease. It further appears in the record that during the months of June, July, and August, 1924, upon the payment of the rent of $350, the defendant signed a receipt for $75 rebate of the rent for those months, but she disclaims knowledge of the contents of the receipts. It is further in evidence that from the month of September, 1924, the payments of rent were entered on the books of the agent as payments on account, but without the knowledge of defendant. Dr. Wayland, the owner of the premises, testified that he knew of the reduction of the rent for the three summer months of 1924, and told Mr. Rucker he could give such a reduction. He further testified that he accepted $350 each month thereafter for twenty-four months on account, and that he never wrote Mrs. Latham to pay up the balance. Anna Hughes, an employee of the Rucker Company, testified she was present in the office of Rucker Company when the conversation took place between Rucker and the defendant, that Rucker said he had taken the matter up with the owner and the best they could do was to allow her a rebate of $75 per month for the three summer months, and that she (the witness) heard nothing about a further reduction for an additional period, and that she was present during the entire conversation; also this witness testified she called the defendant several times on the telephone, in regard to her rent, and told her that the rent payment was late, she was only paying on account, to which she replied that she would pay whenever she got the money. September 15, 1925, this witness mailed a letter to defendant, in which she said:

> "As your rent is now considerably increased and as you have paid nothing since the 12th of last month, we are compelled to ask that you give our collector a check for at least $350 tomorrow morning when he calls."

The testimony of Harry L. Nelson, a collector for the Rucker Company, was: That he presented numerous bills to the defendant during her tenancy and that all bills were marked, "Do not give receipt. $350 on account." All receipts presented to her read for $425. "November 19, 1925, she paid me $350. I gave her no receipt. All bills I presented to her she looked at." This witness called on defendant after he had read a copy of the letter of September 15, testified to by Miss Hughes. Defendant had received a letter from Rucker, and she said Rucker could go ahead and do what he wanted. In addition to all this, the defendant, on her cross-examination, stated that, in the conversation in which she claims Joseph H. Rucker reduced the rent to $350 per month until further notice, his reply to her request was, "We will see what we can do about it."

[3, 4] From the foregoing résumé of the evidence we are satisfied that the verdict of the jury finds no substantial support in the evidence, and as said in the Estate of Caspar, supra:

> "A directed verdict is proper unless there be substantial evidence tending to prove in favor of plaintiff all the controverted facts necessary to establish his case. In other words, a directed verdict is proper whenever, upon the whole evidence, the judge would be compelled to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by the evidence."

In Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 661, 34 P. 504, it is said:

> "We are adverse to holding that a finding by a jury or trial court on an issue of fact is not warranted by the evidence, whatever we might think as to its preponderance, where there is presented a fair, reasonable ground for a difference of opinion, and where a conclusion either way could not be considered as the necessary result of the exercise of an unsound judgment. But where the great current of the evidence is against the verdict, and we cannot escape the conviction that it is wrong, we should not be deterred from setting it aside by the contention that one or two general statements or assertions of one or two witnesses bring the case within the rule which governs in cases where there is a material conflict of evidence.'"

In the case at bar, as we view the evidence, the verdict of the jury could find support only in the contradictory evidence of the defendant, where on her direct examination she stated that the agent of plaintiff said that the rent would be reduced to $350 per month until further notice, but, on cross-examination, she testified that this statement was he would see what could be done. The fact the owner accepted $350 per month for twenty-four months might have raised an inference to support the claimed modification but for the uncontradicted evidence that these were payments on account. This is all the evidence we find in the record to support the alleged modification. Such evidence is too inherently weak to sustain a finding that the lease was modified either by an executed oral agreement or otherwise; especially is this true, when viewed in the light of the overwhelming evidence that the only reduction in rent was a rebate of $75 per month for the three summer months of 1924. We are satisfied that the court's action in entering judgment in favor of the plaintiff, notwithstanding the verdict for defendant, was correct.

[5] It is the claim of respondent that, even giving to the evidence offered in behalf of the appellant the dignity of a "substantial conflict," the alleged modification of the lease being oral was void, as falling within the inhibition of the statute of frauds, and that the agent of the plaintiff was without authority to modify or change the terms of the lease. These claims are met by the appellant with the assertion that the modification was a reduction of the rent for a period of time until further notice, and plaintiff, having accepted the rent for each month for a period of twenty-four months without notice or demand for the full amount provided in the lease, it became an executed oral agreement for the twenty-four months, and her tender of the amount provided for in the lease for the month of October, 1926, saved the lease from forfeiture.

Subdivision 5 of section 1624, Civil Code, provides:

> "An agreement for the leasing for a longer period than one year of real property is invalid unless it is in writing, subscribed by the party to be charged or his agent, and unless the authority of the agent is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged it is also invalid."

Section 1698, Civil Code provides:

A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise.

Sinnige v. Oswald, 170 Cal. 55, 148 P. 203, is a case of somewhat similar import to the case at bar. In that case there was a written lease for ten years commencing May 1, 1912, the rent reserved being at the rate of $347 per month, payable monthly. The defendant entered into possession of the leased premises and paid the rental reserved for the months of May, June, and July, 1912, and thereafter at the rate of $317 per month to and including April, 1913. Defendants claimed that the lease was changed by a reduction of the rent for the entire term, bringing it down to $317 per month. There was no written modification of the terms, but the smaller amount was accepted from time to time and receipts in full given for the installments paid. The complaint was filed June 11, 1913, for the rent of May, 1913, in the sum of $347, and for a like sum for the June, 1913, rent. The trial court found that there was no change in the term of the lease in the alleged particular of reducing the rent. The Supreme Court held that concessions of the kind shown, when supported by a sufficient consideration, are valid to the extent that a lower rent has been tendered and accepted as satisfaction in full of the installments thus paid. They are not sufficient to establish a change in the written contract so as to affect the amount of future installments of rent where no such change of terms had been in writing. In the case at bar it is clear that, unless the reduced payments by defendant were supported by a sufficient consideration to bring the case within that portion of section 1698, Civil Code, as constituting an executed oral agreement, it was void because not in writing. There is no evidence in the record of a consideration therefor; its nearest approach is the following evidence given by the defendant:

> "Q. Did you at any time have a conversation with Mr. Rucker wherein you or he stated or spoke with reference to your moving in the event that the rent was not reduced? A. Yes sir. Q. When? A. Let me see, I don't know whether it was the first time I saw him or the second. Q. When was that conversation when you made that statement? A. Well, it was the first time I saw Mr. Rucker; that was really our longest conversation. Q. Was that in the summer of 1924? A. Yes sir."

[6] But the defendant had already obligated herself to pay the full amount of rent, and her removal from the premises would not have relieved her of that obligation. There was therefore no consideration that would place the agreement within the category of an executed oral agreement, even conceding there was such an agreement. As said in Dodge v. Chapman, 42 Cal. App. 612, 183 P. 966:

> "The agreement, then, to receive for a limited time a reduced monthly rental was not in writing, and was supported by no consideration. * * * There was no period of time under the lease, when any instalment of rent was due and unpaid, that the terms of the lease could not have been enforced for the full amount."

In the case at bar, the alleged modification not being in writing, and there being no consideration therefor, the same was void under the provisions of section 1698, Civil Code. The alleged modification of the lease was made through Joseph H. Rucker; his authority to make such modification having been questioned, and his authority not being in writing, appellant contends that she was entitled to the benefit of the verdict of the jury upon that question. It was admitted that the Joseph H. Rucker Company, of which said Joseph H. Rucker was president, was the agent of the plaintiff in this transaction. The only testimony appearing in the record as to agency or the agent's authority was that of the plaintiff and Joseph H. Rucker. The former testified that the only authority of his agent was to have general care and supervision over the property, secure tenants, and collect the rents; the latter testified to the same state of facts, both testified that the agent had no power to change the terms of the lease or make any reduction in the rent; therefore there was no disputed fact upon which the jury could pass judgment. However, if we are correct in our conclusion that the oral modification claimed by the defendant is unsupported by the evidence and that no consideration passed therefor, the question of agency becomes immaterial.

[7] It is also claimed that said Rucker had a sufficient interest in the property to modify the lease irrespective of any question of agency. This claim rests upon the evidence that said Rucker had an oral agreement with the owner, that upon payment of a certain sum of money the owner would deed to him a one-third interest in the property. A portion of said sum had already been paid. But the agreement rests entirely in parol and the undisputed evidence shows that Rucker had no control or enforceable interest in the property and that no interest of any kind had vested in him. It follows that this contention is unsound.

[8] It is further claimed by appellant that the three days' notice to pay rent or quit was insufficient, and the court should have granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The notice is signed, "Charles A. Wayland, Owner, by Joseph H. Rucker & Co., Agent, by A. M. Hughes, Cashier." The lease was made between Arthur F. Rousseau, as lessor, and the defendant as lessee, and no notice was given the lessee of the transfer of the lease to the plaintiff, nor of his ownership of the property. It is claimed that, in the absence of such notice to her, appellant was justified in disregarding the notice given.

In support of this claim, appellant cites the case of O'Connor v. Kelly, 41 Cal. 432, but that was an action of ejectment and not unlawful detainer. In the former action the denial of title constituted the basis of the action and is a fundamental requisite of ejectment, while in the latter the foundation of the action is the failure to pay rent after the notice required by statute. We are of the opinion that the notice given was sufficient. Section 1161, Code of Civil Procedure, so far as material to a decision of this question, reads as follows:

> "A tenant of real property, for a term less than life, is guilty of unlawful detainer: When he continues in possession, * * * without the permission of his landlord, or the successor in estate of his landlord, if any there be * * * after default in the payment of rent, * * * and three days' notice, in writing. * * *"

It is also provided by section 821, Civil Code:

> "A person to whom any real property is transferred or devised, upon which rent has been reserved, or to whom any such rent is transferred, is entitled to the same remedies for recovery of rent, for nonperformance of any of the terms of the lease, or for any waste or cause of forfeiture, as his grantor or devisor might have had."

It is further provided by section 1111, Civil Code:

> "Grants of rents or of reversions or of remainders are good and effectual without attornments of the tenant; but no tenant who, before notice of the grant, shall have paid rent to the grantor, must suffer any damage thereby."

It is apparent from the provisions of the section of the Code last cited that the only object of a notice to the lessee is the protection of the tenant who pays rent to his landlord before notice of the grant. No such condition exists here. Further, in the case at bar the notice to quit was signed by the owner through his agent and this agent was known by the defendant to be the agent of the property and to whom she had paid her rent for more than two years previous to the notice to pay rent or quit.

The case of Plummer v. Agoure, 20 Cal. App. 319, 128 P. 1014, is, we believe, in point. In that case the complaint shows that on August 31, 1907, plaintiffs and several other persons owning the tract of land in question, executed to defendant a lease thereof upon certain covenants and reservations of rent contained therein; that thereafter the plaintiffs acquired from their colessors title to the whole property. The defendant made default in the payment of an installment of rent, and the plaintiffs, pursuant to the provisions of section 1161, Code of Civil Procedure, caused to be served upon defendant a written notice, signed by them, requiring defendant to pay said installments of rent or surrender possession of the premises. Appellant contends that, in the absence of an allegation showing an attornment by defendant as tenant, none but the original lessors named in the lease could give the notice or maintain the action. Upon this claim the following language was used by the court in its opinion:

> "Appellant contends that, in the absence of an allegation showing an attornment by defendant as tenant, none but the original lessors named in the lease could give the notice or maintain the action. The right to maintain an action by 'the successor in estate of his landlord' is expressly conferred by section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Moreover, section 821 of the Civil Code, provides: 'A person to whom any real property is transferred or devised, upon which rent has been reserved, or to whom any such rent is transferred, is entitled to the same remedies for recovery of rent, for nonperformance of any of the terms of the lease, or for any waste or cause of forfeiture, as his grantor or devisor might have had.' Nor was any attornment of the tenant necessary to enable plaintiffs as vendees of the leased lands to maintain the action. Civ. Code, § 1111; McDonald v. Hanlon, 79 Cal. 442, 21 P. 861. The case of Reay v. Cotter, 29 Cal. 168, relied upon by appellant, is not applicable to the existing statute. Martel v. Meehan, 63 Cal. 47. Appellant's contention upon this point is without merit."

In the case of Felton v. Millard, 81 Cal. 540, 21 P. 533, 22 P. 750, it is said:

> "Appellant objects to the validity of the notice to quit because it was not signed by respondent personally, the signature being, 'C. W. Felton, by H. G. Platt, Atty.' But the notice purported to come from respondent. It was proven at the trial that Platt had authority to sign it; no written authorization was necessary (Civ. Code, § 2309); and appellant questioned the authority (if he did question it) at his own risk."

We are satisfied that under the foregoing authorities the notice given to the appellant was sufficient. In addition to this, the record shows that the appellant at all times during the ownership of the property by the plaintiff paid the rent to his agent Joseph H. Rucker Company.

[9] One further reason has been advanced by appellant in support of her claim for a reversal of the judgment—that the granting of the motion for judgment deprived her of her constitutional right to trial by jury. We do not understand that appellant attacks the constitutionality of section 629, Code of Civil Procedure, but that, where a jury has been called, and a motion for judgment, notwithstanding a verdict for the defendant, has been granted, the court in assessing damages and passing on the issues, is depriving a party litigant of his right to a jury trial. In a proper case no doubt counsel's contention would be sound. In the instant case, however, as we have pointed out, there is no substantial evidence from which the verdict of the jury in favor of the defendant could find support. The evidence in favor of plaintiff's cause of action is without conflict, and no other or different judgment could have been entered thereon. The trial court did not undertake to assess damages, but entered a judgment for the specific relief prayed for and which, under the contract between the parties, was supported by the uncontradicted evidence.

This disposes of the several points presented for a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

PERELLI-MINETTI et al. v. LAWSON et al. (Civ. 3149.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 8, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 6, 1928.

1. Frauds, statute of 🔑56(9)—Parol agreement for partnership in lands is valid and enforceable between parties.

Partnership in lands may be formed by parol agreement, and such agreement is valid and enforceable between the parties.

2. Partnership 🔑70—Partners bear confidential relations and are trustees for each other in partnership transactions.

Partners sustain confidential relations towards each other, and each is a trustee for the other in all partnership transactions.

3. Partnership 🔑67—Whether property owned by partner before formation of partnership and used for partnership purposes became partnership property is determined by agreement and conduct.

Whether property which was owned by one of partners before formation of partnership and thereafter used for partnership purposes has become part of partnership property or remains property of the one partner is determined by partnership agreement and conduct of partners.

4. Partnership 🔑68(1)—Partnership property need not be purchased with partnership funds and, as between partners, whether land standing in names of partners as individuals is partnership property is determined by understanding and intention.

Partnership property need not be purchased with partnership funds, and true method of determining, as between partners, whether land standing in names of partners as individuals is partnership property is to ascertain understanding and intention of partners themselves from their conduct and course of dealing.

★Opinion of Court of Appeal adopted by Supreme Court, 272 P. 573.

5. Partnership 🔑68(1)—Facts held to show that land in which partners had interests before formation of partnership became partnership property.

Where partners each had undivided one-third interest in land before formation of partnership and thereafter purchased remaining one-third interest, facts held to show that land became partnership property.

6. Husband and wife 🔑264—Evidence held not to show that partnership land was community property of one partner.

Evidence held not to show that partnership real estate was community property of one partner, in view of Civ. Code, § 163.

7. Husband and wife 🔑267(1)—Statute requiring wife to join in instruments conveying or incumbering community realty is inapplicable to land acquired by husband prior to year 1917 (Civ. Code, § 172a, as added by St. 1917, p. 829).

Civ. Code, § 172a, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, providing that husband has management and control of community real property, but that wife must join with him in executing instruments leasing it for longer period than one year, or selling, conveying, or incumbering it, is inapplicable to land acquired by husband prior to year 1917.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1052(5)—Excluding evidence that lands were owned by tenants in common, if error, held harmless, where court so found.

Exclusion of evidence to show that individuals owned lands as tenants in common during existence of partnership, if error, held harmless, where court found that they in fact did hold lands as tenants in common.

9. Partition 🔑63(3)—In partition suit by beneficiaries and executors under deceased partner's will, evidence held to sustain findings that lands constituted partnership assets to which surviving partner was entitled for liquidation purposes.

In suit for partition by beneficiaries and executors under will of deceased partner against surviving partner and others, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings of trial court that lands were partnership assets to which surviving partner was entitled for liquidation purposes.

10. Quieting title 🔑44(3)—In suit to quiet title by beneficiaries and executors under deceased partner's will against surviving partner and others, evidence held to sustain findings for defendants.

In suit to quiet title by beneficiaries and executors under will of deceased partner against surviving partner and others, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings of trial court in favor of defendants.

11. Partnership 🔑258(8)—In suit by beneficiaries and executors under deceased partner's will against surviving partner and others to enjoin selling or mortgaging growing crops, evidence held to sustain findings for defendants.

In suit by beneficiaries and executors under will of deceased partner against surviving partner and others to enjoin surviving partner from selling or mortgaging growing crops, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings of trial court in favor of defendants.

12. Partnership 🔑258(8)—In suit by beneficiaries and executors under deceased partner's will against surviving partner and others to cancel mortgage upon growing crops, evidence held to sustain findings for defendants.

In suit by beneficiaries and executors under will of deceased partner against surviving partner and others to cancel mortgage given by surviving partner upon growing crops, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings of trial court in favor of defendants, in view of Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 3, and § 2461.

13. Partnership 🔑244—Surviving partner had right, on death of partner, to continue in possession of partnership and to settle its business (Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 3, and § 2461; Code Civ. Proc. § 1585).

Since death of partner dissolves general partnership (Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 3), surviving partner, by express terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, and Civ. Code, § 2461, had right to continue in possession of partnership and to settle its business.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action for partition of real property and other relief by Joseph V. Perelli-Minetti and others against W. H. Lawson and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 199 Cal. 446, 249 P. 857.

Harry A. McKenzie and E. V. McKenzie, both of San Francisco, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs, who are beneficiaries under the will of A. J. Perelli-Minetti, deceased, brought this action for the partition of two tracts of land, to quiet their alleged title to an undivided half interest therein, to enjoin the defendant Lawson from selling or mortgaging the crops growing on the land, and to cancel a mortgage given by him upon such crops. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

Prior to June 9, 1921, Lawson, S. Scatena and Perelli-Minetti were the owners of the lands in suit, the legal title standing in the names of those persons, without further designation. They had operated the lands as partners, growing grapes thereon and manufacturing wine and grape juice. It is uncertain whether or not the real estate was partnership property, but the court found that, at the time stated, Lawson and Perelli-Minetti each owned an undivided one-third interest in the land, and therefore it will be assumed, for the purposes of this opinion, that the lands were not then partnership property. The court found:

"In the latter part of May, and prior to June 9, 1921, A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson entered into an agreement for the formation of a partnership concerning the above-described lands, and did form a partnership for the purpose of buying and selling said lands and other lands and the growing, cultivating, harvesting, and selling of the crops therefrom, and for such other purposes incident thereto and necessary therein as might be deemed proper by said copartners * * * [and] agreed that said partnership should be operated under the firm name and style of Lawson & Perelli, and that the profits and losses arising out of the operation of said lands should be divided equally between them. Pursuant to said partnership agreement, and for the purposes of said partnership, on or about June 9, 1921, A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson purchased from S. Scatena the remaining one-third interest of S. Scatena in the lands. * * *

"Pursuant to said partnership agreement and partnership, A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson forthwith took possession of said lands and did business thereon under the firm name and style of Lawson & Perelli, incurred obligations, offered for sale, cultivated and maintained said lands, raised crops thereon, and harvested the same therefrom, for the joint benefit of each of them, and each of them shared equally in the cost of maintenance and operation of said lands, and in the cost of operating the same, and the planting and harvesting of the crops produced on said lands, and shared equally in all profits and losses arising or accruing out of the acquisition of said lands, or the cultivating, planting, harvesting, or marketing of the crops produced on said lands.

"Pursuant to said partnership agreement, and pursuant to said partnership, and on the 9th day of June, 1921, partnership books were opened and kept under the name of Lawson & Perelli. Said lands * * * were carried on said books as assets of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli. For the years 1921, 1922, and 1923 written income tax reports were returned to the United States government on partnership form, signed 'Lawson & Perelli, by A. J. Perelli-Minetti,' listing said lands as an asset of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli, and, among other things, indicating the amount of profits and losses concerning said partnership of Lawson & Perelli arising from the operation of said lands.

"From the time of said agreement of partnership until the death of A. J. Perelli-Minetti on or about December 12, 1924, A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson did business as partners, and pursuant to said partnership agreement, under the firm name and style of Lawson & Perelli, and cultivated said lands in the manner provided in said agreement of partnership.

"Upon the death of A. J. Perelli-Minetti on or about December 12, 1924, W. H. Lawson, as surviving partner of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli, took control of, and at all times thereafter remained in control of, and now is in control and possession and entitled to the possession of said lands and the crops growing thereon and the appurtenances and the whole thereof.

"A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson during said partnership executed on behalf of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli a mortgage upon the lands described in parcel 1, Exhibit A, to the California Joint-Stock Land Bank, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California, as security for a promissory note in the sum of $35,000. Said mortgage is an outstanding obligation of the partnership of Lawson & Perelli.

"During said partnership A. J. Perelli-Minetti and W. H. Lawson, in behalf of said partnership of Lawson & Perelli, made and executed a mortgage to S. Scatena on the lands described in parcel 2, Exhibit A, as security for the payment of the sum of $41,000. Said mortgage is an outstanding obligation of said partnership.

"Said mortgages were carried on the partnership books of Lawson & Perelli as a liability against said partnership. For the years 1921, 1922, and 1923, written income tax reports were filed with the United States government on partnership forms. Said income tax reports were signed 'Lawson & Perelli, by A. J. Perelli-Minetti,' and said mortgages were listed on said reports as a liability against said partnership.

"W. H. Lawson, as surviving partner of said partnership of Lawson & Perelli, has, since the death of said A. J. Perelli-Minetti, at all times been and now is in the exclusive and entire control of said lands hereinbefore described, and the crops grown thereon, and all of the assets of said partnership. Said W. H. Lawson claims no interest in the assets of said partnership other than an interest as surviving partner of said partnership of Lawson & Perelli, and, as such surviving partner, the right to liquidate the affairs thereof.

"On or about the 11th day of April, 1925, W. H. Lawson, as surviving partner of Lawson & Perelli, and pursuant to his duties as such, made a chattel mortgage on growing crops on the lands described in Exhibit A to the Pacific Fruit Exchange, a corporation, duly authorized and existing under the laws of the state of California, as security for a sum of money not to exceed $15,000 advanced to said W. H. Lawson as surviving partner. Said W. H. Lawson borrowed said money in pursuance of his duties as said surviving partner and may be used only in liquidating the affairs of said partnership, and said mortgage was made, and the proceeds thereof may be used and are intended by him to be used only pursuant to his duties as such surviving partner.

"Upon the death of A. J. Perelli-Minetti, and immediately thereafter and ever since, W. H. Lawson, as such surviving partner, took possession and has maintained possession of the assets of said partnership, and has proceeded to liquidate the affairs of the same, paying bills of said partnership, collecting income accruing to said partnership, and caring for the lands, crops, and appurtenances thereto. Said W. H. Lawson has been diligent and faithful in the performance of said duty as surviving partner and in the liquidation of the affairs of said partnership.

"The assets of said partnership consist of the lands described in Exhibit A and the growing crops and personal property located on said lands, wine, machinery, trays, cooperage, and miscellaneous incidental property connected therewith.

"It is necessary for W. H. Lawson, as surviving partner of said partnership of Lawson & Perelli, to have exclusive control and possession of all of the assets of said partnership for the purpose of liquidating the affairs of said partnership.

"At the time of the death of said A. J. Perelli-Minetti on or about the 12th day of December, 1924, there were outstanding obligations existing against said partnership and bills receivable uncollected by said partnership. There are now outstanding obligations existing against said partnership and accounts receivable still uncollected. No accounting has ever been had as against any parties concerned or interested in said partnership. The affairs of said partnership are not yet wound up or liquidated."

In appellant's opening brief it is said:

> "There is only one primary issue in the case: Were the two ranches held as partnership land, or were the two owners tenants in common thereof? * * * Even if the land be deemed partnership property, still unless partnership creditors' rights intervened the land would descend to the heirs or be subject to testamentary disposition. * * * Therefore, we contend two propositions, that we are tenants in common; and if we are not tenants in common, there is no reason for any administration or handling of partnership affairs by the partner."

[1-4] The partnership agreement was not in writing. "A partnership in lands may be formed by an agreement in parol. Such parol agreement is valid and may be enforced between the parties." Musick Cons. Oil Co. v. Chandler, 158 Cal. 7, 12, 109 P. 613, 614; Koyer v. Willmon, 150 Cal. 785, 787, 90 P. 135; Scott v. Junquist, 179 Cal. 7, 9, 175 P. 412. The relations between the partners were confidential and each was a trustee for the other in all partnership transactions. Koyer v. Willmon, supra. "If property owned by one of the partners before the organization of the firm has been used for partnership purposes, it must be determined from the partnership agreement and the conduct of the parties whether it has become a part of the firm property or remains the property of the one partner. Thus a lease of premises occupied by the firm business, procured by one partner before formation of the partnership, may become firm property without formal assignment, if it is so understood and the partners regard it as such." Rowley's Modern Law of Partnership, § 277. "It is not necessary to show that the partnership property was purchased with partnership funds. Land standing in the name of an individual partner may have been contributed by him as his portion to the firm assets. The true method of determining, as between the partners themselves, whether land standing in the name of the individuals is or is not to be treated as partnership property is to ascertain from their conduct and course of dealing the understanding and intention of the partners themselves, which, when ascertained, should unquestionably control." Johnson v. Hogan, 158 Mich. 635, 123 N. W. 891, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 889. In McNab v. Mills, 199 Cal. 231, 248 P. 657, while they were the owners of a tract of land as tenants in common, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into an oral agreement of partnership, one of the terms of which was that the land "was to become the capital of the partnership and was to become partnership property." The land was thereafter operated by the partners as partnership property in accordance with the terms of the oral agreement. The court said:

> "While no written agreement expressing the terms and conditions of the partnership alleged to exist * * * was entered into, we are satisfied from a careful reading of the evidence that the actions, transactions, conduct, and understanding of the parties amply support the finding of the trial court that they entered into a partnership, which continued to exist. * * * In the language of the trial court: ' * * * Even though the ranch property in question may have originally come to the parties in the character of tenants in common, this character was destroyed by the parties having farmed and operated it upon joint account and as partnership property and by their acts thereby made it partnership assets.' "

[5] Appellants discuss the subject of trusts at considerable length, but the facts found by the court bring the case so clearly within the principles of law announced in the foregoing decisions that it is deemed unnecessary to pursue the subject further.

[6] Appellants contend that the interest of Perelli-Minetti in the land was community property, and that in such a case "no partnership lien can be created in land unless a wife joins in the conveyance." At the time of the organization of the partnership, section 172a of the Civil Code, enacted in the year 1917 (St. 1917, p. 829), provided:

> "The husband has the management and control of the community real property but the wife must join with him in executing any instrument by which such community real property or any interest therein is leased for a longer period than one year, or is sold, conveyed or incumbered."

[7] It need not be determined whether that section is applicable in partnership matters. The evidence does not show that the property in question was community property. Mrs. Perelli-Minetti testified that she was married 22 years ago; that at the time of their marriage Mr. Perelli-Minetti had no property; and that thereafter he acquired no property "by virtue of some one dying, any wills bequesting anything of that kind." Property acquired by gift after marriage is separate property. Civ. Code, § 163. The evidence does not show when the money with which Perelli-Minetti purchased the property was acquired. If acquired prior to the year 1917, section 172a is not applicable. Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 218 P. 22; Staton v. Buster (Cal. App.) 249 P. 878.

[8] It is contended that the court erred in excluding evidence tending to prove that Scatena, Lawson, and Perelli-Minetti owned the lands in question as tenants in common during the existence of their partnership. In their closing brief appellants say that the court found "each of the individuals [Scatena, Lawson and Perelli-Minetti] owned a one-third interest in both ranches as tenants in common." This last statement is correct. Since the issue was found in appellants' favor, the exclusion of evidence tending to prove that issue was of no possible effect against them.

[9-12] Appellants specify many particulars in which they contend that "the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision and judgment." It is unnecessary to follow these specifications in detail. The tracts of land referred to in the findings were known as the Geyserville ranch and the Santa Rosa ranch. There was a winery on the Geyserville ranch. Lawson testified:

> "We agreed like this—If we buy, * * * we will then go into a partnership * * * and make wine for ourselves, or grape juice, in the Geyersville ranch. * * * We agreed to take over * * * the Santa Rosa ranch, work it on up into condition and sell it in the next year at all the profit we could get out of it. * * * We would buy the Santa Rosa ranch, * * * Perelli-Minetti and I, and sell it. We would hold on to the Geyserville ranch, where the grape juice plant was, and manufacture grape juice, and our business would be under the name of Lawson and Perelli, * * * as partners. * * * We went to Mr. Norton's office, and drew up a contract, taking over all of the property of Scatena, Lawson, and Perelli, except the wine, and we went from then on, we were under the name of Lawson & Perelli, the firm name of Lawson & Perelli, and partners."

The lands were thereafter carried as partnership property on the firm's books, entered as such in the income tax statements, and treated by the partners as partnership property in all respects as stated in the findings. The partners maintained joint bank accounts. Up to April 26, 1923, moneys deposited therein were made payable "to either, or the survivor." After that time both their signatures were required. It was stipulated that:

> "All of the checks prior to that time * * * were in the name of Lawson and Perelli-Minetti, were signed * * * by either Mr. Lawson or Mr. Perelli-Minetti, the great vast majority of them all being signed by Mr. Perelli-Minetti."

It was also stipulated that:

> "Subsequent to July, 1923, * * * it was agreed between them that all bills, as far as possible, should be paid, one half by each, and that all the receipts coming in should be divided at the time, one half going to Mr. Lawson and the other half going to Mr. Perelli, and that as far as they could consistently, they followed that out up until the time of the death of Mr. Perelli."

Other than as appears from this stipulation, the business of the partnership was conducted in the same manner after July, 1923, as before that time. Nothing was done to dissolve the partnership, and there was no accounting between the partners. Most of the objections to the sufficiency of the evidence are covered by what has already been said, and the others are deemed to be without merit. The material findings are amply supported by the evidence.

[13] A general partnership is dissolved by the death of a partner. Civ. Code, § 2450, subd. 3. Lawson, as the surviving partner, had "the right to continue in possession of the partnership, and to settle its business." Code Civ. Proc. § 1585. "A partner authorized to act in liquidation may collect, compromise, or release any debts due to the partnership, pay or compromise any claims against it, and dispose of the partnership property." Civ. Code, § 2461; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 168 Cal. 120, 138, 142 P. 83. "The surviving partner must settle the affairs of the partnership without delay." Code Civ. Proc. § 1585. Since more than three years have elapsed since the death of Perelli-Minetti, it is probable that the affairs of the partnership in question here have been settled, but, if they have not, then the plaintiffs may compel a settlement in an appropriate proceeding for that purpose.

The judgment is affirmed.

89 Cal. App. 107

COLLINS v. SARGENT et al. (Civ. 4700.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 8, 1928.

1. Pleading 🔑277—Events subsequent to time of commencement of action should be introduced by "supplemental complaint" (Code Civ. Proc. § 464).

Generally, rights of parties are to be determined as they were at the commencement of the action, unless subsequent events affect matters in issue, and subsequent matters should be presented by supplemental pleading and not by an amendment to the complaint; office of "supplemental complaint" being to notify court and opposite party of matters occurring after action has been commenced, under Code Civ. Proc. § 464.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Supplemental Complaint.]

2. Pleading 🔑277—Right to equitable relief depends on facts existing at close of litigation, and supplemental complaint is not required in equity (Code Civ. Proc. § 464).

While right to judgment in actions at law depends on facts existing at commencement of action, relief administered in equity is such as the nature of the case and facts existing at the close of the litigation demand; and supplemental complaints, under Code Civ. Proc. § 464, are not required in equitable actions to bring before the court facts and circumstances which bear on facts in issue occurring since filing of original complaint, since such pleading would be surplusage and equity does not require a useless thing.

3. Damages 🔑225—Proof of actual damages may extend to facts occurring between commencement of action and date of trial without supplemental complaint (Civ. Code, § 3283).

Proof of actual damages may extend to all facts which occur and grow out of injury after commencement of the action and up to the day of the trial, under Civ. Code, § 3283, and no supplemental complaint is necessary in order that evidence may be received showing such damages.

4. Action 🔑65—Issues and relief in injunction suit are determined on basis of situation existing at time of trial.

In action for injunction, the issues are to be determined on basis of the situation as it exists at the time of the trial, not at time of bringing the action, and relief is administered as exigencies of the case demand at the close of the trial.

5. Nuisance 🔑32—Proof of defendants' continued use of explosives adjacent to plaintiff's residence and of resulting injury occurring after commencement of action held admissible, in injunction suit, without supplemental complaint (Civ. Code, § 3283; Code Civ. Proc. § 464).

In suit to enjoin use of explosives in gravel pit near or adjacent to plaintiff's residence, evidence of acts of defendants in use of explosives, and of result of those acts occurring after complaint and amended complaint were filed, where merely cumulative and corroborative of allegations of amended complaint, held admissible, under Civ. Code, § 3283, though no supplemental complaint was filed under Code Civ. Proc. § 464.

6. Nuisance 🔑35—Defendants who continued use of explosives near plaintiff's residence after filing of complaint could not complain that they were enjoined from use thereof.

Where defendants, using explosives in operating gravel pit, did not heed the warning given in plaintiff's pleadings in injunction suit, but continued use of explosives and caused increased damage to plaintiff's residence and greater danger and menace to life, they were in no position to complain because they were enjoined from using explosives.

7. Nuisance 🔑16—Right to maintain private nuisance accrues only by uninterrupted use under claim of right with consent of property owner injured.

No easement or prescriptive right to maintain a private nuisance may be obtained unless nuisance continues uninterruptedly for 5 years under claim of right, and the property owner injured has knowledge of such use and consents to it, though consent may be presumed from open, notorious, and adverse use.

8. Nuisance 🔑12—Limitation in favor of maintenance of private nuisance does not run against adjoining property owner until he has been actually injured.

Statute of limitations in favor of one maintaining private nuisance does not commence to run against adjoining property owner until actual injury has been occasioned to adjoining property.

9. Nuisance 🔑15—Defendants had no prescriptive right to continue blasting operations, as against nearby resident, where owner of adjacent lands had not consented and injury had not extended over 5-year period.

Defendants' use of explosives for over 20-year period in operating gravel pit held not to give them prescriptive right to continue their use, as against person having residence, in vicinity, where there was no showing that owner of lands adjacent to pit knew of use of explosives, or ever consented thereto, and where injury was first suffered within period of less than 5 years.

10. Nuisance 🔑33—Finding that injuries to plaintiff's residence and menace to safety due to blasting in gravel pit were caused by activities of defendants held proper under evidence in injunction suit.

Finding that injuries to plaintiff's residence and danger to him and his family were due to blasting operations by defendants leasing pit, and not to activities of third party operating at greater distance, held sustained by evidence and admissions in defendants' pleadings relative to operating pit.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1058(2)—Action of court in sustaining objection was not error, where ruling was immediately reversed and witness permitted to testify fully.

Where court had first sustained objection to question and immediately after reversed his ruling and permitted witness to testify fully, error could not be predicated on court's original ruling.

12. Nuisance 🔑33—Terms of lease to third party held immaterial in action against lessees of gravel pit to enjoin blasting operations.

In action to enjoin blasting in gravel pit adjacent to plaintiff's residence, refusal to permit testimony as to terms of lease of pit to third party, except as showing that rights of defendants as lessees were subject to those of such third party, held not error, where terms of third party's lease were not in issue.

13. Nuisance 🔑33—Where plaintiff whose house was damaged by blasting sought injunction without damages, defendants' evidence offered to show that cracks in house were result of settling of insecure foundation, was inadmissible.

Where plaintiff sought merely injunction against continued operation of gravel pit by use of explosives, and did not seek damages, refusal to permit defendants to show that plaintiff's house, claimed to have been damaged, was built on filled ground, and that cracks were result of settling of its insecure foundation, held not error.

14. Trial ⚷397(3)—Findings need not cover matters admitted in pleadings.

It is not necessary for trial court to make findings of fact on matters admitted in the pleadings.

15. Nuisance ⚷25(1)—Alleged disclaimer by one sued to enjoin continued blasting operations in gravel pit held no defense, where answer subsequently filed alleged his possession and control of pit.

In action to enjoin continued blasting operations in gravel pit adjacent to plaintiff's residence, alleged filing of disclaimer by one of defendants held not to prevent judgment against him, where answer to amended complaint was subsequently filed, joined in by all defendants, in which he was alleged to have been in possession and control of gravel pit, and where nuisance continued after alleged disclaimer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action by C. R. Collins against George H. Sargent, Guy E. Bailey, H. G. Bailey, and H. G. Cauldwell and C. F. Horton, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Whittier Gravel Company, for an injunction. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walters & Mauk, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Dorland & Sewell and H. F. Sewell, all of Whittier, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. This is an action for injunction to restrain defendants (appellants) from using explosives and blasting in a gravel pit adjacent to plaintiff's home. The record does not show that any temporary restraining order was issued. On the trial plaintiff was given judgment perpetually restraining defendants from using explosives in or about the gravel pit, and defendants appeal.

The issues were joined by plaintiff's amended complaint, and defendants' answer thereto filed April 20, 1923. As affirmative matters of defense defendants allege: That since September 28, 1922, defendant Bailey held the gravel pit under a contract of purchase, and had possession and control of it ever since; that about that date he leased the pit to defendant Cauldwell, and that, ever since, defendants Cauldwell and Horton have operated the pit, and still are operating it and removing gravel therefrom; that for more than 20 years last past the gravel pit has been continuously operated and powder exploded in it; that the dwelling houses now in the vicinity were erected within the last 3 years and with the knowledge on the part of the owners and builders of the location and operation of the gravel pit; that plaintiff's lot was an old arroyo filled with cans and rubbish; that his house is on filled ground; and that whatever damage has been suffered to the house was the result of the settling of its insecure foundations and not because of any blasting or explosions by defendants. Defendants Bailey and Sargent filed so-called disclaimers.

There was little dispute in the testimony in relation to the principal matters at issue. The allegations of the amended complaint are supported by very substantial proof. In fact, the testimony given by defendants Cauldwell and Bailey admits almost daily use of explosives within 300 feet of plaintiff's home, as alleged by plaintiff, except for a period between the fore part of July and the latter part of October, 1923, but they deny any detriment or damage resulting to plaintiff, his home, or his family, and deny that the persons or lives of plaintiff's family have been or are endangered.

The testimony also shows that the territory in the vicinity was open land until the year 1920, when it was rather closely built up and occupied for residential purposes; that the gravel pit had been operated to some extent since 1892; that plaintiff bought his lot and built his house in 1920, and that the gravel pit complained of was not then being operated; that defendant Bailey bought the gravel pit in September, 1922, and had control of it until August 21, 1923, when he sold it; that defendant Cauldwell leased the pit from him, and that a Mr. Keene had the right to operate in the pit and did operate in that part of the pit more distant from plaintiff's home and used explosives; that the explosions caused by defendant Cauldwell, and by defendants Cauldwell and Horton, as copartners, before the action was commenced, occurred nearly every day and sometimes three or more in a day; that the blasts jerked and shook plaintiff's house, made the windows rattle, and cracks appeared in the house; and that in the fall of 1922 a severe blast occurred, which threw gravel and rocks, varying in size from very small to the size of an egg, into plaintiff's yard, where his children were playing, one of which rocks was embedded in a floor on plaintiff's premises.

The testimony also shows that, after this action was commenced, the explosions caused by defendants Cauldwell and Horton continued as before; that rock was thrown on plaintiff's property in the latter part of May and the fore part of June, 1923, and that two very severe explosions occurred, one on June 21, 1923, and another a short time thereafter, each of which threw gravel and rocks upon plaintiff's property and other home properties in the vicinity, one breaking the glass in the bathroom of plaintiff's house, throwing gravel and rocks into the bathroom, breaking a hole in the wall of the house the size of two fists, and loosening beams of his pergola, knocking one beam to the ground; that heavy explosions were of common occurrence; and that defendants Cauldwell and Horton, with an intermission in the summer of 1923, continued the explosions up to the time of trial.

The admissions in the answer and the testimony satisfactorily show that the right of plaintiff to the quiet enjoyment of his home was invaded by defendants Bailey, Cauldwell, and Horton, and that the use of explosives in the gravel pit by defendants Cauldwell and Horton were with the knowledge and consent of defendant Bailey, very seriously endangered the lives of plaintiff's children at his home, and resulted in injury to his house, and that those defendants threatened to and did continue the acts complained of.

As one ground of their appeal, defendants complain that the trial court erred in admitting, over their objections, testimony in relation to explosions and the results of explosions occurring after the complaint and the amended complaint were filed, no supplemental complaint having been filed.

Section 464, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

> "The plaintiff and defendant, respectively, may be allowed, on motion, to make a supplemental complaint or answer, alleging facts material to the case occurring after the former complaint or answer."

[1] The office of a supplemental complaint is to bring to the notice of the court and the opposite party matters which occurred after the commencement of the action and which do or may affect the rights asserted and the rule asked in the action originally instituted. Conlin v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 40 Cal. App. 733, 182 P. 67; California, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 742, 91 P. 593. Generally, the rights are to be determined as they were at the commencement of an action, unless some event happens subsequently which affects the matters in issue, such as a change of the title to the property involved in the litigation after the action was commenced, and the court cannot consider such subsequent matter unless it is presented by a supplemental pleading. Metropolis, etc., Sav. Bank v. Barnet, 165 Cal. 449, 453, 132 P. 833. Such facts, which change the liabilities of the defendants and the character of the relief sought, cannot be presented by an amendment to the complaint. Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308, 311, 312.

[2] The general rule, to which there are exceptions, is that in actions at law the right to judgment depends upon the facts as they exist at the commencement of the action, but such is not the rule in quity. The relief administered in equity is such as the nature of the case, and the facts as they exist at the close of the litigation, demand; and supplemental complaints are not required in actions in equity in order to bring before the court those facts and circumstances occurring since the filing of the original complaint, which bear as evidence upon the facts in issue in the original cause. It would be surplusage if they were set up in a supplemental pleading, and equity does not require a useless thing. Pennsylvania Co. v. Bond, 99 Ill. App. 535, 544, affirmed 202 Ill. 95, 66 N. E. 941.

[3] In actions at law for damages, the rule is definitely established that proof of actual damages may entend to all facts which occur and grow out of the injury after the commencement of the action and up to the day of the trial, and supplemental complaint is not necessary to permit evidence thereof to be received. Section 3283 of the Civil Code provides that:

> "Damages may be awarded, in a judicial proceeding, for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, or certain to result in the future."

Therefore our courts have uniformly held that no supplemental complaint is necessary in order that evidence may be received showing damages resulting after the complaint was filed, germane to the issue of damage. Berry v. Bank of Bakersfield, 177 Cal. 206, 210, 211, 170 P. 415, and cases therein cited; Saylor v. Taylor, 42 Cal. App. 474, 477, 183 P. 843. The same principles are announced in actions for injunction and damages. See Robinson v. Smith, 7 N. Y. S. 38, 42;[1] Barrick v. Schifferdecker, 48 Hun, 355, 1 N. Y. S. 21; Cauthen v. Lancaster Cotton Oil Mills, 96 S. C. 342, 80 S. E. 615, 616, and cases therein cited.

In an action for injunction, where the defendant, by his own acts committed subsequently to the commencement of the action, entitled plaintiff to different or additional relief, related, however, to the subject of the action, it was held proper to allow plaintiff to plead those acts by supplemental complaint. Jacob v. Lorenz, 98 Cal. 332, 33 P. 119.

In an action for injunctive relief and as an incident thereto for damages suffered, defendant voluntarily abated the nuisance complained of subsequently to the commencement of the action. The court held that the action is still for injunction, although the writ is not necessary and is denied, and that the judgment may go for damages and costs. McCarthy v. Gaston Ridge Mill, etc., Co., 144 Cal. 542, 547, 78 P. 7. In that action defendant pleaded by supplemental answer that he had voluntarily abated the nuisance.

[4] In an action for injunction the issues are to be determined on the basis of the situation as it exists at the time of the trial, not at the time of bringing the action (City of Justice Story, in Jenkins v. Eldredge, 3 Story, 299, 13 Fed. Cas. 508, 509, No. 7,267, said:

> "New evidence, upon which a supplemental bill should be allowed to be filed, should not be of a mere cumulative or corroborative nature. * * * New oral evidence, merely corroborative or cumulative, is not a sufficient foundation for a supplemental bill."

To the same effect see Ledwith v. Jacksonville, 32 Fla. 1, 13 So. 454, 458, and Barriclo v. Trenton Life, etc., Co., 13 N. J. Eq. 154.

In the action of Hayden v. Albee, 20 Minn. 159, 163 (Gil. 143), for injunction to restrain the maintenance of a dam which caused plaintiff's land to be flooded, plaintiff was permitted to show, without supplemental complaint, that the dam was raised after the action was commenced, and the court held that "this was entirely proper with reference to the prayer for the abatement of the dam, for the purpose of showing that the nuisance complained of still continued to exist to plaintiff's prejudice."

In the action of Gavigan v. Atlantic Refining Co., 186 Pa. 604, 40 A. 834, for damages, it appeared that the defendant permitted noxious odors from gasoline and oils to go from its tanks and carbon oil to percolate through the ground to plaintiff's property. The court held that evidence of matters transpiring after the suit was brought was proper, not as ground of recovery, but to show the character of the nuisance, which was precisely the same as it was before the action was brought.

It was held in the case of Waterman v. Buck, 63 Vt. 544, 22 A. 15, for injunction and damages, that, by reason of the continuous depositing of sawdust in a river to the injury of plaintiff's meadow, plaintiff might show the continued depositing of the sawdust after the action was commenced, without filing a supplemental bill, as the whole matter was covered by the original bill, and that the scope of the preventive measures under the bill included the subsequent continuance of the nuisance. See, also, Balkum v. Harper's Adm'r, 50 Ala. 372.

[5] The proof of the acts of defendants in using explosives in the gravel pit and of the results of those acts, occurring after the complaint and amended complaint were filed, was merely cumulative and corroborative of the allegations of the amended complaint. Therefore the trial court committed no error in admitting the testimony showing those subsequent acts and their results.

[6-9] Defendants assert that, because the gravel pit had been operated and explosives used therein since 1892, a prescriptive right was created authorizing them to continue using the explosives. The proof showed that, prior to the operations in the gravel pit by defendants in 1922, explosives had been used in operating it, but there was no showing that before defendants commenced their operations the use of explosives caused gravel or rock to be thrown upon the adjacent lands. Those lands were subdivided and laid out into residence lots in 1919, and residences, including plaintiff's residence, were built in 1920 and were thereafter occupied. It appears that beginning in 1922 the use of explosives by defendants was and continued to be a menace to plaintiff and his family and property both before and after this action was commenced. Defendants did not heed the complaints and warning given them in plaintiff's pleadings herein, but, disregarding them, defendants continued their use of explosives and caused the greater damage to plaintiff's property and the greater menace to the persons and lives of plaintiff's family some months after this action was commenced. They had ample opportunity to show whether they could make proper use of the explosives and were found wanting; therefore they are in no position to complain, because they were enjoined from using explosives in the gravel pit.

No easement or prescriptive right to maintain a private nuisance may be obtained unless the use continues uninterruptedly for 5 years under a claim of right and the owner has knowledge of such use and consents to it. Such consent, however, need not be express, but may be presumed by reason of open, notorious, and adverse use. Grigsby v. Clear Lake Water Co., 40 Cal. 396, 406; Galbreath v. Hopkins, 159 Cal. 297, 304, 113 P. 174; Silva v. Hawn, 10 Cal. App. 544, 551, 102 P. 952. The statute of limitations in favor of the use does not commence to run until actual injury has been occasioned to the adjoining proprietor. Galbreath v. Hopkins, page 304, supra (113 P. 174).

This division of the District Court of Appeal recently announced in the case of Williams v. Blue Bird Laundry Co. (Cal. App.) 259 P. 484, petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court denied, that:

> "It has repeatedly been held that in suits for injunction by a private person to enjoin an offense amounting to a public nuisance, no lapse of time will justify the special injury;" and that "while laches or the statute of limitations may in proper cases be pleaded in bar of the original act which created the conditions sought to be enjoined, neither one is a ground of defense to a continuing nuisance, since the character of such offense gives rise to successive rights of action."

These rules have direct application to the case at bar.

There is no evidence which tends to support defendants' contention that a prescriptive right was created to use explosives. The evidence fails to show that the owner of the adjacent lands upon which plaintiff's home is situated knew of the use of the explosives prior to 1920 or that the owner ever consented to such use. No prescriptive or adverse right to use explosives in the gravel pit was shown.

[10] Defendants contend that the testimony shows that one Keene, who also had a lease on the pit, operated there during the time when the explosions occurred of which plaintiff complains, and, inferentially, that he and not defendants may have caused the explosions.

Mr. Keene testified for defendants that during that time he had a verbal lease on the pit authorizing him to operate anywhere in it; that he then operated in the front part of the pit which was more distant from plaintiff's home, and Mr. Cauldwell in the back part, closer to plaintiff's home, and that Mr. Cauldwell was operating there then; that he (Keene) did not operate in the back part during that time; that the two parts were separated by an embankment; that he fired about four shots in the back part in June or July, 1923; and that sometimes the blasts threw gravel and rock all over the pit and no man could tell what the blasts would do.

Defendant Cauldwell testified that he operated in the portion of the pit nearer plaintiff's home from some time in September, 1922, to the time of trial, except that he did not operate there between the fore part of June and some time in October, 1923, but later in his examination he said he shot there in July, 1923. This testimony by Keene and Cauldwell apparently is an attempt to becloud the issue as to the responsibility of defendants for the two heavy explosions which occurred, one on June 21, 1923, and the other a short time thereafter.

In their answer to the amended complaint defendants allege that ever since September 28, 1922, defendants Cauldwell and Horton "have been and now are operating said gravel pit and removing gravel therefrom." They did not allege that Keene had a lease on the gravel pit or any right to operate in it or that he did operate in the pit. In the light of the evidence narrated in the beginning of this opinion the admissions of the defendants, and the character of the testimony of Keene and Cauldwell above recited, it appears that the responsibility for the explosions complained of is upon the defendants, who are the appellants herein. Therefore their contention that the court should have found that Keene or some one else, not the defendants, caused the explosions complained of, has no satisfactory support, and the findings of the trial court in relation to the operations by those defendants are sustained by the evidence.

[11, 12] Defendants contend that the court erred in sustaining plaintiff's objections to offered testimony of Keene and defendant Bailey in relation to the operations by Keene in the gravel pit and in relation to the terms of the lease to Keene. When Keene was first interrogated in relation to the extent of his operations subsequent to August, 1922, the court sustained an objection to the question, but immediately afterwards reversed his ruling and permitted him to testify fully in the matter. His testimony in substance is as above recited.

Upon plaintiff's objections the court refused to permit Keene and Bailey to testify as to the terms of the lease to Keene, except to the effect that the right of defendants Cauldwell and Horton to take out gravel was subject to the rights of Keene under his lease. The ground stated by the court for the refusal was that Keene was not a party to the case, and the terms of his lease were not in issue and were immaterial. This ruling was correct.

[13] Defendants complain that the court erred in refusing to permit them to show that plaintiff's house was built on filled ground and that the cracks which damaged the house were the result of settling of its insecure foundation. The trial court ruled correctly in that regard. If plaintiff had sought redress in damages, defendants' position might have been well taken, but the only relief prayed for by plaintiff is a judgment restraining defendants' unlawful acts. Plaintiff was entitled to injunctive relief without evidence showing the appearance of the cracks, and the trial court so found.

[14] Defendants complain that certain of the other findings of facts are not supported by the evidence. Those findings, in effect, cover and find the facts to which they relate as alleged and admitted by the pleadings and as shown by the evidence, recitals of the substance of which evidence are hereinbefore set out. Each of those findings has substantial support either by the admissions in the pleadings or by the proof or by both. In fact, matters admitted in the pleadings need not have been found upon. Therefore it is unnecessary for us to recite those findings and the facts supporting them.

[15] Defendant Bailey contends that no judgment should have been entered against him herein for the reason that he filed a disclaimer. His alleged disclaimer was filed before the answer to the amended complaint was filed. In that answer, which was joined in by all the defendants, it is alleged that ever since September 28, 1922, he was and "is now in the possession of and control of" the gravel pit, and the nuisance continued after he filed his alleged disclaimer.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARLOW v. FEDER. (Civ. 4890.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 24, 1928.

1. Injunction 🔑59(1)—Equity will grant restraining decree where complaint alleges and court finds that breach of contract results in injury, redress of which requires several actions (Code Civ. Proc. § 526, subd. 6).

Equity will afford relief by restraining decree where complaint alleges and court finds that, as result of breach of contract, plaintiff has suffered substantial injury in number of different ways, redress of which would require several actions, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 526, subd. 6.

2. Patents 🔑182—Restraining decree held warranted where complaint alleged and court found that defendant's breach of contract would result in irreparable injury.

In action for injunction and for damages for breach of contract for development of an invention, where complaint alleged that defendant failed to conform to requirements of contract and proceeded to use and dispose of apparatus and ideas received from plaintiff for own use, and allegations were found to be true, supported by ample testimony, held, that there was an irreparable injury, warranting grant of restraining decree.

3. Injunction 🔑14—Injunction may be granted where irreparable damage is threatened, irrespective of defendant's insolvency.

Where effect of act complained of is or may be to largely impair or destroy subject-matter by taking from it something which cannot be replaced, thereby causing irreparable damage, it may be enjoined, irrespective of ability of defendant to respond in damages.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1048(5)—Error in permitting cross-examination of defendant on immaterial matter held not prejudicial, in view of answer.

In action for injunction and for damages for breach of contract to develop an invention, error in failing to sustain objection to question asked defendant on cross-examination about conversation as to whether or not plaintiff would accept installment payment on $10,000, mentioned in contract, for development of invention held not prejudicial, where answer shed no light on any issue in case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by John Harlow against Milton Feder for an injunction and for damages. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. E. Kirk, of Burbank, and Wally A. Kirk, of San Fernando, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This cause relates to certain alleged violations of a contract which we here recite in full:

"Agreement.

"Made and entered this 7th day of November, 1922, by and between John Harlow, of Ocean Park, county of Los Angeles, state of California, hereinafter called the 'first party,' and Milton Feder, of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, hereinafter called the 'second party,' witnesseth:

"Whereas the first party is the inventor of improvements in apparatus for making moving portraits, for which he has applied for United States letters patent, Ser. 424,404, filed November 16, 1920; and

"Whereas, both parties are desirous of exploiting said invention and placing the same on the market:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the mutual covenants hereinafter expressed, they agree as follows:

"The second party agrees to secure a location in Los Angeles, Cal., and engage the first party at a salary of $200 per month, for a term of 3 months, and furthermore agrees to have manufactured apparatus containing said invention within the next 6 months to a number of not less than 25.

"The first party agrees to serve as demonstrator and instructor to purchasers and prospective purchasers how to operate said machines.

"The second party agrees to pay to the first party 10 per cent. of the retail selling price of said machines up to the amount of $10,000, and as soon as the $10,000 are paid to the first party, the first party agrees to execute a legal assignment conveying the entire right, title, and interest in and to said invention, and the patent to be obtained therefor, to the second party, provided, however, that the said $10,000 be paid to the first party within 6 months as hereinafter provided.

"The first party also agrees to furnish to the second party all blueprints, models, drawings, etc., that may be helpful in the manufacture of said machines and also to furnish said location with all his equipment now in his Ocean Park studio.

"It is distinctly understood that the second party has the option to revoke this contract at any time, provided, however, that he pay to the first party a salary of $200 per month for 3 months and at the time of the cancellation of this contract he turn over to the first party any and all machines, and parts thereof, that may be in the process of manufacture at the time of the cancellation of this contract, and the first party is to have these machines, and parts thereof, so turned over, without cost.

"In case the second party pays to the first party the $10,000 above referred to, he shall have the option to engage the services of the first party for the term of another year at $300 per month, and the first party agrees to act as demonstrator as above set forth for said term, and furthermore, the first party agrees in the event that the $10,000 is paid as above set forth, he will not engage in making portraits or pictures, or engage in similar work and demonstrating similar apparatus, throughout the United States and its territories, for the space of 10 years from the date hereof.

"It is understood by the parties hereto that the first party's salary of $200 per month shall not start until said location is secured, but not later than January 1, 1923, and the 6 months within which the $10,000 are to be paid, are to be computed from the date at which the salary starts.

"The first party further agrees to execute all necessary papers, documents, and assignments for foreign patents that the second party may desire to apply for, and assign them to the second party, the second party agreeing to pay all the costs therefor, and the second party agrees to pay to the first party $1,000 in addition to the amount mentioned above, when the last foreign patent is issued.

"Signed at Los Angeles, Cal., this 7th day of November, 1922. John Harlow.

The trial court caused an interlocutory and a final judgment to be entered which restrains and enjoins defendant, appellant herein, his agents, employees, partners, or servants from acting under the name of the defendant or in the name of the Animated Photofilm System—a name assumed by defendant and his associates—and from making, using, and operating certain apparatus, machines, and parts thereof, and from selling or otherwise disposing of the same; orders an accounting and decree that appellant holds all funds shown by such accounting as trustee in behalf of respondent; allows damages in the sum of $600 occasioned by reason of the alleged breach of the contract; decrees that plaintiff have and recover of and from the defendant the sum of $300 per month, or $10 per day for each day defendant remains in possession of the machines and apparatus described in the complaint; determined the value of three machines alleged to have been delivered to J. H. Hunt under the terms of a contract between appellant and Hunt as of the value of $200 each; fixes the reasonable value of the territorial rights sold by defendant to Hunt in the sum of $5,000, and damages in the sum of $1,020; orders the return of certain personal property; and requires appellant to deliver to respondent all sums received from certain contracts entered into between defendant and third parties, amounting to a total sum of $550, that respondent have and recover of and from appellant the sum of $2,122.50 received by appellant as trustee for respondent from the sales of machines, etc., and that appellant deliver to respondent said personal property or in lieu thereof to have and recover of and from appellant the sum of $1,835.30 and costs.

[1, 2] Appellant attacks the judgment, first, upon the ground that the respondent, plaintiff below, "has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law: First, an action for money had and received; second, an action for damages, and third, in an action for claim and delivery." But the complaint alleges and the court finds that as a result of appellant's breach of the contract respondent has suffered substantial injury in a number of different ways, the redress of which would require several actions. This alone is justification for the issuance of the restraining decree. Subdivision 6, § 526, Code Civ. Proc. The complaint in effect alleges that appellant failed to conform to the requirements of the contract, but this notwithstanding, he was proceeding to use and dispose of the apparatus and the ideas received from respondent as his own. The findings are that this allegation is true, and there is ample testimony supporting such findings. Considering the nature of the apparatus and ideas in question, it is apparent, and so elementary that no authorities need be cited, that there was an irreparable injury. The action is more than an action in damages based upon a contract. It is to prevent further wrongful use of property and information which was the subject of a contract and might well be far greater than accrued damages.

[3] Appellant seeks a reversal on the further ground that insolvency of appellant is not pleaded nor proved. We quote from the case of Kellogg v. King, 114 Cal. 385, 46 P. 168, 55 Am. St. Rep. 74:

> "It is well settled that the remedy by injunction may be invoked to restrain acts or threatened acts of trespass in any instance where such acts are or may be an irreparable damage to the particular species of property involved. And in such case the question of the solvency or insolvency of the wrongdoer is an immaterial factor. It is the nature of the injury, and not the incapacity of the party to respond in damages, which determines the right. Where the effect of the act complained of is or may be to largely impair or destroy the substance of the estate, by taking from it something which cannot be replaced, it may be enjoined, irrespective of the ability of the defendant to respond in damages."

Appellant contends that the injunction is sought and granted, as he puts it in his brief, "upon the question of an inventor being entitled to an injunction before he has received a patent upon his product"; but we think a reading of the contract with the injunctive relief prayed for in the complaint and granted by the trial court justifies respondent's statement in his brief that:

> "Respondent's injunction is asked to prevent defendant from unlawfully exploiting the rights he secured from plaintiff [respondent] under the contract, and has nothing to do with infringement."

We do not agree with appellant in his claim that the allegations of the complaint show exact figures and do not support a prayer for accounting. While there are not extensive accounts involved, the complaint does allege unliquidated financial transactions and, taken in consideration with the cause of action as a whole, justify the prayer for this relief.

A motion for nonsuit was made by appellant in the trial court and was denied. Appellant assigns this ruling as error. The foregoing effectively answers this claim as being without merit.

Appellant complains of Exhibit No. 17, but this exhibit was introduced with consent of counsel for appellant and we cannot speculate upon the use made of it by the court, if any.

[4] Appellant was asked, on cross-examination, about a conversation as to whether or not plaintiff would accept installment payments on the $10,000 mentioned in the contract. Counsel for appellant objected on the ground that the question was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. We are inclined to agree that the objection should have been sustained on the ground of immateriality, but the answer as given, sheds no light on any issue in the case and could not have prejudiced any one.

As to appellant's exception No. 34, while the objection to appellant's counsel's question was sustained, the witness proceeded to and did answer elaborately.

Exceptions 29, 30, 31, and 33: The questions related mainly to what the contract was between the parties. The contract was in writing, and the court properly sustained the objections made.

There are numerous claims on behalf of appellant as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. Suffice it to say that there is competent evidence tending to support each and every finding made.

Appellant assigns several rulings of the trial court as error. We have examined them all and find no error.

Judgment affirmed.

CRAIG v. SAN FERNANDO FURNITURE CO. et al. (Civ. 5644.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 9, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑102, 103—No right of appeal lies from orders granting motion to strike from complaint or orders sustaining demurrers thereto.

No right of appeal lies from orders granting motion to strike from amended complaint and orders sustaining defendant's demurrer thereto.

2. Corporations 🔑514(2)—Allegation in complaint of corporate existence is not essential to jurisdiction over person of defendant or subject-matter.

Designation of "a corporation" after name of defendant or allegation in complaint declaring the corporate existence of named defendant is not necessary to jurisdiction of court over defendant or subject-matter of action.

3. Associations 🔑1—Law recognizes group conducting business under common name as legal entity, whether they form a corporation or conduct business under common name without incorporation.

Where group of people conduct business under common name, law recognizes that group in its entity as a legal entity, and, whether they form a corporation or whether they conduct business under common name without incorporation, legal entity still exists and is designated by the common name adopted or used.

4. Parties 🔑95(5)—Changing designation of defendant after period of limitations from that of corporation to copartnership held not to change entity of copartnership.

Where complaint in personal injury action originally designated defendant as furniture company, a corporation, changing the designation of defendant furniture company after period of limitations had run from that of a corporation to that of a copartnership was not a change in entity so that a new legal entity was brought into action.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑124—Adding names of individual partners originally sued as an entity held to bring in new defendants against whom limitations had run.

Where complaint in personal injury action originally designated defendant as furniture company, a corporation, while changing designation of defendant furniture company to that of a copartnership did not change defendant's entity as a copartnership, adding names of the individual members of the copartnership was attempt to bring in new defendants after limitations had run and action could not be maintained against them as individuals.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Mary J. Craig against the San Fernando Furniture Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

Bordwell, Mathews & Wadsworth, Ray W. Bruce, and John H. Mathews, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bailie, Turner & Lake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. [1] The plaintiff appeals from a judgment of dismissal of the action made after an order of court sustaining defendants' demurrer to the amended complaint. The notice of appeal also includes the order of court granting defendants' motion to strike from the amended complaint and the order of court sustaining defendants' demurrer to the amended complaint. As there is no right of appeal from the orders indicated, we will consider alone the appeal from the judgment.

This is one of five separate actions which were filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county as a result of an automobile accident occurring in the county of Los Angeles on July 7, 1925. Each of the five persons riding in one of the automobiles involved in the collision, and who were injured, filed a separate suit wherein the driver, one Ira E. Stewart, and the San Fernando Furniture Company, alleged to be his employer, were named as defendants.

The attorneys for the plaintiff in this case appear also as attorneys for the plaintiffs in each of the other four cases, while the attorneys representing the defendants in the court below and on this appeal likewise appeared as attorneys for the defendants in the other cases in the court below and on the appeals to this court. Judgments of dismissal were entered after similar rulings on demurrer were made by the same trial judge in all of the cases, and appeals were taken from such judgments and involve the identical questions which are under consideration in the instant case. By stipulation of all of the parties in the five actions, the determination of the appeal in the instant case shall be determinative of the appeals in the other four cases.

Within one year after the happening of the accident, namely, on June 18, 1926, the complaint in this action was filed in the superior court. In the title of the original complaint, the defendants were designated as "San Fernando Furniture Company, a Corporation, and Ira E. Stewart." In the first paragraph of the original complaint the pleader alleged that the San Fernando Furniture Company was and is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, and that at all times, mentioned in the complaint the defendant Ira E. Stewart was an employee of the San Fernando Furniture Company.

On December 17, 1926, prior to the filing of any pleadings by the defendants, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint and served a copy of the same on Bailie, Turner & Lake, attorneys at law, who receipted for the same in the following form:

> "Received copy of the within first amended complaint the 17th day of December, 1926. Bailie, Turner & Lake, Attorneys for Defendants."

The title in the amended complaint reads as follows:

> "Mary J. Craig, Plaintiff, v. San Fernando Furniture Company, Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen, Copartners Doing Business under the Firm Name and Style of San Fernando Furniture Company, and Ira E. Stewart, Defendants."

The first paragraph of the amended complaint was changed to read as follows:

> "That at all times mentioned herein the defendant San Fernando Furniture Company was and now is a copartnership; that Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen are the names of the persons comprising said copartnership, and that said Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen now are and at all times mentioned herein were associated together in the retail furniture business in the city of Los Angeles, Cal., transacting such business under the firm name and style of San Fernando Furniture Company; that said associates Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen are sued herein under said firm name and style of San Fernando Furniture Company pursuant to section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California.
> "That at all times mentioned herein the defendant Ira E. Stewart was the employee of said San Fernando Furniture Company, a copartnership, and of Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen, doing business under the firm name of San Fernando Furniture Company, and that said Ira E. Stewart at all times mentioned herein was acting as a driver of the automobile truck belonging to said San Fernando Furniture Company and to said Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen, doing business under said common name."

On December 27, 1926, attorneys Bailie, Turner & Lake, designating themselves as "Attorneys for defendant San Fernando Furniture Company," filed a notice of motion to dismiss the action; also a notice of motion to strike out certain portions of the amended complaint; and also a general and special demurrer to the amended complaint. The same firm of attorneys filed similar motions to dismiss and to strike; also a general and special demurrer on behalf of the defendants Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen. In due course the demurrer and motions came on for hearing, counsel appearing for the respective parties as hereinbefore designated. The motion to dismiss was granted, also the motion to strike; and the demurrer was sustained. There seems to be but one question involved in this appeal; namely, Did the plaintiff in amending her complaint in fact change the parties defendant?

It is conceded by counsel for appellant that inasmuch as the statute of limitations had run prior to the filing of the amended complaint, she would not have had the legal right as against the demurrer to bring in new legal entities in her amended complaint and proceed to trial on the merits as against such new entities. If, therefore, when in the amended complaint, the characterization of the defendant "San Fernando Furniture Company" was changed from that of "a corporation," as designated in the original complaint, to that of "a copartnership," as designated in the amended complaint, a new legal entity was brought in, then it would be conceded that the rulings of the lower court were correct. And furthermore, if in adding to the named defendants the names of Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen, designated as "copartners and doing business under the firm name of San Fernando Furniture Company," the pleader brought new legal entities in as defendants, the rulings of the lower court were correct. Appellant, however, urges first, that changing the designation of defendant San Fernando Furniture Company from that of a corporation to a copartnership did not serve to change in any respect the legal entity of defendant, and, second, that inasmuch as under the provisions of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where persons associated together in business conduct such business under a common name, such group may be sued under such common name, the amended complaint, in adding the names Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen, did not bring in any new defendants, but simply enlarged, by being more specific, the designation of the defendant originally named, to wit, the San Fernando Furniture Company.

[2, 3] It is well settled, at least in California, that the designation "a corporation" after the name of the defendant, or an allegation in the complaint declaring the corporate existence of the named defendant, is not necessary to the jurisdiction of the court over the defendant or over the subject-matter of the action. Crouch v. H. L. Miller & Co., 169 Cal. 341, 146 P. 880; Los Angeles Railway Co. v. Davis, 146 Cal. 179, 79 P. 865, 106 Am. St. Rep. 20. The determination of the question does not turn necessarily upon the name given to the intended defendant, but rather upon its identity in fact. Where a group of people are conducting a business under a common name, the law recognizes that group in its entity as a legal entity, and whether the group of persons see fit to avail themselves of the provisions of the law and form a corporation, or whether they see fit to conduct that business under a common name without incorporating, the legal entity still exists and is designated by the common name adopted or used. Hence appellant urges that from the outset she was pursuing for the purpose of satisfying her claim of damages, a certain concern doing business under the fictitious name of the San Fernando Furniture Company, and when for the purposes of perchance aiding in furnishing the proof necessary to support her claim, or to enable her more certainly to satisfy her judgment if she obtained one, she changes the designation of the entity she is pursuing, there is no real change in the party defendant.

[4] We are satisfied that appellant's contention must be sustained on the point that, in changing the designation of the San Fernando Furniture Company from that of a corporation to that of a copartnership, there was no change in the defendant entity "San Fernando Furniture Company." Respondents urge that because the original complaint designated the San Fernando Furniture Company as a corporation, and in the verification the allegation as to the corporate character of the defendant is asserted to be true, the court must assume for the purposes of considering this question that there actually did exist at the time the suit was filed a corporation by the name of the "San Fernando Furniture Company," and by reason of the amended complaint, likewise alleging the existence of a copartnership doing business under the same name there were two separate entities in existence, and that it must be presumed that the plaintiff in her original complaint undertook to make as defendant a very different entity from that which was made defendant in her amended complaint. We cannot agree with respondents in their contention on this point. It clearly appears from a reading of the original and amended complaints that the plaintiff at all times was urging her claim of damages against a business concern operating under the name of the San Fernando Furniture Company and which had in its employ, as a truck driver, one Ira E. Stewart.

While there is some conflict in the conclusion arrived at in the different states where this question has been under consideration, the California authorities unquestionably support appellant's contention. A line of demarcation is drawn in the California decisions between a situation where the error is clearly one of misnomer and one where the plaintiff has erroneously pursued a defendant to find out later that his claim in law was against an entirely different person or concern. The case of Altpeter v. Postal Telegraph Cable Co., 26 Cal. App. 705, 148 P. 241, cited by respondent, is illustrative of the latter class of cases.

In the case of Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., 180 Cal. 730, 183 P. 153, the original complaint named the defendant as the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation. Five years after the accident out of which the action arose, the pleader discovered that the defendant against whom he had his cause of action was really a corporation by the name of "Southern Pacific Company." Two separate corporations existed, one incorporated under the laws of California, and the other incorporated under the laws of Kentucky. From the outset, the plaintiff was pursuing the concern that operated the train with which he collided, and when he discovered that he had designated the defendant by a misnomer and the court granted him permission to amend so as to correctly state the name of the defendant he urged his claim against, there was in fact no new defendant brought in.

The same question was involved in the case of Walsh v. Decoto, 49 Cal. App. 740, 194 P. 298. In the original complaint, the Blue Taxicab Corporation was named as the defendant and was described in the caption of the complaint as a corporation, and in the body of the complaint appeared the usual allegation that the defendant was a corporation. Two years after the accident, out of which the action arose, and after an answer had been filed on behalf of the Blue Taxicab Corporation as defendant, the plaintiff discovered that he was in error in designating the concern against whom he was asserting his claim as a corporation. In fact, it appears that the Blue Taxicab corporation was not a corporation, but was merely a fictitious name under which one Ezra W. Decoto conducted his business. The court permitted the plaintiff to amend his complaint, so that the defendant was designated as "Ezra W. Decoto, doing business under the name and style of Blue Taxicab Corporation." The Court of Appeal sustained the lower court in permitting the amendment. In that case, the change or departure was much more marked than in the instant case. The theory that it is the entity named as defendant that is determinative of the question is given recognition in the opinions in Artana v. San Jose Scavenger Co., 181 Cal. 627, 185 P. 850, and in John Bollman Co. v. S. Bachman & Co., 16 Cal. App. 590, 117 P. 690, 122 P. 835.

Respondents in their briefs have cited numerous authorities and have quoted freely from cases which they urge support their contention. Space will not permit of a detailed consideration of these cases. In most of them it clearly appears that the plaintiff had mistaken the person or concern against whom he had his cause of action, as was the case in Altpeter v. Postal Telegraph Cable Co., supra. As to those cases which involve a state of facts similar to those in the instant case, where the courts hold to a different rule, we are satisfied that the better reason supports the California cases cited.

[5] Coming now to the question as to whether or not new and additional defendants were named in the amended complaint by the adding of the names, "Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen, as copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of San Fernando Furniture Company," a somewhat different situation arises. There seems some logic in appellant's contention that, having sued the group of men in their common name under which they did business, there were in fact no new defendants added in her amended complaint when she set forth specifically the names of the individuals constituting the group, and in support of this contention appellant particularly urges a consideration of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

> "When two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, whether it comprises the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates; and the judgment in the action shall bind the joint property of all the associates, and the individual property of the party or parties served with process, in the same manner as if all had been named defendants and had been sued upon their joint liability."

However, the theory of appellant was given full consideration by the Court of Appeal in the case of John Bollman Co. v. S. Bachman & Co., 16 Cal. App. 589, 117 P. 690, 122 P. 835. While it is true that case arose prior to the adoption of section 388, Code of Civil Procedure, in its present form, the consideration of the principle involved would seem to lead to the same conclusion if the case had arisen subsequent to the amendment of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 704). There is considerable authority to support the proposition that where a firm is doing business under a common name, whether it be a partnership or other association of persons, the group relation as designated by the common name constitutes a separate legal entity from that of the individuals who form the group. This view is supported in the case of Billings v. Finn, 55 Cal. App. 134, 202 P. 938, where the court, in discussing the nature of a judgment rendered in a case wherein the defendants were sued in their individual names, but characterized as "copartners and doing business under" a firm name, says:

> "In such a case the action is against the persons or individuals named and not against the business, although such names are followed by the description 'partners doing business under' a designated firm name; and conversely, where the declaration or complaint is in terms against the firm, the addition of the averment that such firm consists of certain named persons does not render such persons parties individually, but the action is against the firm, such additional averments being considered mere descriptio personæ."

In the case of Artana v. San Jose Scavenger Co., 181 Cal. 627, 185 P. 850, the court gave support to the same view. There the action was brought against the "San Jose Scavenger Company" as defendant. One Peter Devincenzi appeared and filed a demurrer designating himself as the defendant and as sued under the name of "San Jose Scavenger Company." The demurrer appeared to be on behalf of himself as an individual. In discussing the questions arising on appeal from the judgment, Chief Justice Angellotti makes this statement:

> "It did not purport to be the demurrer of any party to the action, for the only party defendant was the San Jose Scavenger Company, a partnership, which, for the purposes of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 388) is regarded as a legal entity distinct from its members. Although, by virtue of the amendment of the section in 1907, the judgment in an action so brought binds not only the joint property of the associates, but also the individual property of the party or parties served with process, it is still true that the action contemplated by the section is one against the associates as such to enforce a claim existing against the association, and is not an action against the individual members of the association; that is, unless they are, as individuals, made parties thereto. The association, whether it be a copartnership or other association of individuals transacting business under a common name, is, for the purposes of the section, a legal entity distinct from its members, and it is this legal entity which is in this action the sole party defendant."

The trend of authority seems to support this view, although there are cases, particularly from other jurisdictions, that would justify a contrary line of reason.

We are therefore led to the conclusion that the adding of the names Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen in the amended complaint was an attempt to bring in new defendants, and, inasmuch as the statute of limitations had run, plaintiff could not maintain an action against them as individuals. Hence the judgment of dismissal as against the defendants Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen, and the orders of the court in sustaining the demurrer and granting the motion to strike, of said individual defendants, were properly made.

For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment of dismissal as against the defendant San Fernando Furniture Company be and the same is reversed and set aside; that the judgment of dismissal as against the defendants Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen is affirmed.

It is further ordered that the appeals from the order of court sustaining defendants' demurrers and from the order of court granting the motions of defendants to strike from the amended complaint be dismissed.

Craig, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. San Fernando Furniture Co. et al., Defendants and Respondents, being Civil No. 5644 (Cal. App.) 264 P. 784, it is hereby ordered that the judgment of dismissal as against defendant San Fernando Furniture Company be and it is reversed and set aside, and that the judgment of dismissal of the action as against defendants Alex Cohen, Louis Cohen, and Morris Cohen be and it is affirmed.

It is further ordered that the appeals from the order of court sustaining defendants' demurrers and from the order of court granting the motions of the defendants to strike from the amended complaint be dismissed.

WOODRUFF v. GANN et al. (Civ. 5105.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 20, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 19, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑95(2)—Vendor's acceptance of payment from defaulting vendee is waiver of default, suspending right of forfeiture.

Where time is made of essence of contract to purchase real property, and vendee is in default, acceptance by vendor of a payment with knowledge of the facts will operate as a waiver of the default and suspend the right of forfeiture.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101—Vendor's statement that defaulting vendee would lose part payment unless balance was paid within day or two held to revive vendor's right to forfeiture.

Where vendor notified vendee that he must pay $500 or $600 in two months, and make monthly payments in order to avoid foreclosure, and after end of two months' time accepted part payment, with statement that vendee would lose the payment "unless the balance was paid within the next day or two," definite and specific notice was given vendee that terms of contract must be complied with, sufficient to revive vendor's right of forfeiture claimed to have been waived by acquiescence in vendee's default.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑169—Vendor may demand that vendee pay him all arrearages under purchase contract.

Vendor has right to demand of vendee payment of all sums due under contract in which vendee is in arrears.

4. Appeal and error 🔑842(1)—What constitutes reasonable time which vendor must allow vendee for performance of contract is question for trial court in specific performance suit.

In suit for specific performance, question of what constitutes a reasonable time which vendor must allow vendee for performance of contract is one for determination of trial court.

5. Specific performance 🔑121(11)—Finding that vendor's conduct was fair, and that reasonable time to perform was allowed defaulting vendee, was justified under evidence, where vendee seeking specific performance was warned eight days before forfeiture.

Where vendor gave notice to vendee, seeking specific performance, that arrearages in purchase price must be paid up in two months, and, after expiration of the two months' period, gave vendee warning on accepting part payment that balance must be paid within a day or two, finding of trial court that reasonable time for payment was allowed before service of notice of forfeiture eight days after time when part payment was made was justified under evidence, and under such circumstances conduct of vendor was not subject to attack as inequitable.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨170—Defaulting vendee cannot put vendor in default by mere tender.

Vendee who is himself in default cannot by mere tender put vendor in default.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨170—Tender made by vendee seeking specific performance 30 days after demand for payment, and 3 weeks after service of notice of forfeiture, held ineffectual.

Where notice of forfeiture was served by vendor after reasonable time for performance had been given vendee, vendee's tender of performance made more than 30 days after demand for payment, and 3 weeks after service of notice of forfeiture, was ineffectual, and vendee could not have specific performance on strength of tender so made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by F. E. Woodruff against B. A. Gann and others, in which the defendant B. A. Gann filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and said defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Giffin, of Long Beach, for appellant.

E. E. Noon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff seeks to quiet title to a certain tract of land by complaint in the usual form. One of several defendants, named B. A. Gann, appellant herein, filed an answer and cross-complaint in which he set forth that plaintiff had agreed by contract in writing to sell to him the land in dispute and accept the purchase price in installments. He prayed for specific performance of the agreement to convey. The contract was executed on August 19, 1921. The total purchase price was stated as $5,656.45, of which $15 was paid in cash and the balance to be paid in monthly payments of $50 on the 19th day of each succeeding month, said payments to include interest. The contract contained this provision:

> "It is further agreed that time is of the essence of this contract, and, in event of a failure to comply with the terms and provisions hereof by the said buyer, the seller shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and at the option of said seller the buyer shall forfeit all rights thereto and to all payments theretofore paid hereunder, and all interest of the buyer in and to said lands by reason of this agreement shall thereupon cease and terminate, and no tender or offer of performance by the seller shall be necessary or prerequisite to his right to exercise any privilege or option hereby declared, and that such right may be exercised upon default of the buyer without such or any tender or offer of performance."

It is admitted that appellant was far in arrears in his payments on April 2, 1924. On that date he made a payment of $50 to plaintiff, who then told him that the balance in arrears must be paid "in a day or two." On April 10, 1924, respondent served notice of forfeiture upon appellant, who now contends that his defaults were waived by the acceptance of the payment on April 2d. To properly pass upon this contention it is necessary to examine the evidence in some detail. During the entire time between August 19, 1921, the date of the contract, and April 10, 1924, the date of the notice of forfeiture, appellant had not paid a sufficient amount to pay interest on the principal sum due. The few payments he had made had been at irregular intervals. On January 17, 1923, a payment of $20 was made and thereafter nothing was paid until January, 1924. Respondent plainly told appellant in a conversation held on January 1, 1924, that the payments must be made or the contract foreclosed. Concerning this conversation Mr. Woodruff testified:

> "I told him I was going away, taking a trip to Florida, and when I came back if this money was paid in, this five or six hundred, and these monthly payments had been made, it would be all right; if not, I was going to foreclose the contract.
> "Q. Did you tell him when you were coming back from Florida? A. Along about the 1st of March."

The witness further testified:

> "I said, 'Now, Billy, if you will pay this five or six hundred dollars, and you will transfer this lease (appellant had leased the property tc a third party), the payment of the lease to our bank, and this money is paid in here, and we can credit you with $50 on each—the bank's note and my contract—why all right;' but I told him that we absolutely could not carry him any longer, that he had run—that he had promised us along in the spring when he borrowed the $1,200 from the bank, he came in and asked for that money that he could pay up the Commercial Bank a note he owed them, and he says, 'I can't take that lease out of the Commercial Bank until I pay them up, but if you will loan me $1,200 I will get that lease and bring it down here and all the payments will be made here;' now that was along in the spring of 1923, and, as I say, he never brought the lease in, never paid us a dollar."

The cashier of the bank referred to as "plaintiff's bank," had admonished appellant on several occasions prior to January, 1924, to keep up his payments. Respondent went to Florida, returning about March 1st. On January 30, 1924, appellant paid on the contract the sum of $500, of which $200 was ap-

On April 2, 1924, appellant paid the sum of $50 to apply on the contract, but at that time respondent notified him that he was in arrears something over $800, and that "the balance must be paid in a day or two." Mr. Woodruff testified:

> "I then told him I would not carry him longer; that he must pay up at once or I would cancel his contract; he said how much would it require to bring his payments to date, up to date; I looked at his account and found it was over $800 in arrears; he said he wanted to give me the $100 check (one-half of which to be applied on this transaction); I again told him he would lose it unless the balance was paid within the next day or two; he said he would get busy and pay the balance right away; I told him that if he cared to have it I would pay him back all the money he had paid in on the contract, that I had no desire to keep the money he had paid in, but if he wanted to keep the property he must make the delinquent payments in the next day or two."

[1-3] It is argued by appellant that, in the case of a contract where time is made of the essence and a vendee is in default, the acceptance by the vendor of a payment with knowledge of the facts will operate as a waiver of the default and will suspend the right of forfeiture. This is undoubtedly the general rule. Appellant goes further and contends that before the vendor can revive the right of forfeiture a definite and specific notice of his intention so to do must be given to the vendee. He cites as authority the cases of Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 P. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126, and Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 285, 128 P. 751, in both of which cases language giving some support to his contention can be found. Both of these cases were, however, referred to and construed in the later case of Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 678, at page 688, 198 P. 398, 402, where it is said:

> "These cases do not hold that such stipulation for forfeiture may not be restored and enforced by the vendor in any other manner than by giving a definite and specific notice of the intent to do so."

[4, 5] The rule is there laid down that it may be inferred from the conduct of the vendor and vendee in their dealings with each other that both parties understood that the conditions regarding forfeiture were to be treated as restored and that the vendee understood that he was in default. The same position was taken by the court in Adams & McKee Land Co. v. Dugan, 68 Cal. App. 226, 228 P. 681. Although it seems from the two decisions last mentioned that it is not always necessary to make the notice of restoration "definite and specific," it can be well said that in the case before us Mr. Woodruff did in fact give definite and specific notice to Mr. Gann that the terms of the contract must be complied with. On January 1, 1924, Mr. Gann was told that he would have to pay $500 or $600 by the return of Mr. Woodruff on March 1st and also make the monthly payments, otherwise the contract would be foreclosed. The sum of $500 was in fact paid on January 30th, but the monthly payments were not made. The payment of April 2d must be considered in the light of the conversation held at that time as well as that of January 1st. At the time the payment was accepted on April 2d appellant was informed of the amount of his arrears and was told that he would lose the payment he was then making "unless the balance was paid within the next day or two," to which appellant replied that he would "pay the balance right away." Mr. Woodruff went so far at that time as to offer to return to Mr. Gann all the money he had paid on the contract. He had the right to demand the payment of all sums in which the vendee was in arrears. Weatherbee v. Sinn, 73 Cal. App. 98, 238 P. 134. It cannot be contended that the conduct of Mr. Woodruff was not fair and equitable in the premises. It is well settled that the question of what is a reasonable time which the vendor must allow for performance is one for the determination of the trial court. Hoppin v. Munsey, supra; Adams & McKee Land Co. v. Dugan, supra; Weatherbee v. Sinn, supra. It cannot be said that the trial court was not justified in holding that the time allowed in the case before us was reasonable.

[6, 7] Appellant further contends that his prayer for specific performance should be granted, since he made tender of the total amount due after April 10, 1924. Since notice of forfeiture was served on April 10th, after reasonable time for performance had been given, the appellant was not in position to make a tender. A vendee who is himself in default cannot by a mere tender put the vendor in default. See Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, where it is said:

> "It would be to the last degree unjust and inequitable to allow a vendee, after his default under such a contract, to put the vendor in default by a mere tender. The practical effect of such a rule would be that a vendee without risk could speculate indefinitely in the land of the unfortunate vendor."

Moreover, the record discloses that no tender was made by appellant until May 3, 1924, more than 30 days after the conversation of April 2d. In view of all the circumstances, the trial court was justified in holding that a tender made more than 30 days after the demand of April 2d came too late.

Complaint is made that the trial court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the cross-complaint. The record before us does not show that a demurrer was filed by the party appealing. On the other hand, the record does show that findings were made by the trial court on the issues presented by the cross-complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

LUMAS FILM CORPORATION v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 5868.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 21, 1928.

1. Prohibition ⚷28—Finding on substantial evidence that corporation was within jurisdiction held conclusive on appeal on application for prohibition (Code Civ. Proc. § 411, subd. 2).

Finding of trial court, on substantial evidence, that corporation was doing business in state, and hence that it was within jurisdiction of court, and that service of summons, under Code Civ. Proc. § 411, subd. 2, was valid, held conclusive on Court of Appeal on application for writ of prohibition.

2. Prohibition ⚷3(2)—Prohibition held not to lie, where disputed jurisdiction was based on finding resolving contested fact issue whether corporation was doing business in state; there being adequate remedy by appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 411, subd. 2, and § 1103).

Writ of prohibition held not to lie, where disputed jurisdiction over foreign corporation was based on finding resolving contested issue of fact as to whether corporation was doing business in state, and hence whether service of summons, under Code Civ. Proc. § 411, subd. 2, was valid; there being plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal, so that case fell within section 1103.

Application by the Lumas Film Corporation for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles, Charles S. Burnell, Judge, to restrain further proceedings in a certain action. Demurrer to petition sustained, and alternative writ discharged.

Mitchell, Silberberg & Davis, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, C. B. Penn and Melvin T. Dunlavy, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. [1] The facts in this matter appear to be that the petitioner herein is a foreign corporation; that in an action brought against it in this state an alleged service of summons was made in accordance with the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that thereupon the defendant made a motion to quash the service of summons, which resulted in the denial of said motion. Thereafter petitioner presented to this court its petition for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the lower court, restraining it from taking further proceedings in the action. An alternative writ was issued. On the principal ground that the petition does not state facts sufficient to entitle petitioner to the writ for which it prays, respondent has demurred to the petition.

In the lower court, the motion to quash service of summons was heard on affidavits introduced by the respective parties appearing before the court. The gist of the question presented to such court was whether jurisdiction of the person of the defendant had been acquired. On the part of the moving party, the facts as set forth in the affidavits upon which it relied tended to establish that the corporation was not "doing business" in this state at the time it was served with the summons in the action, nor was the person upon whom the alleged service was had the or any officer denominated in the statute as the proper person upon whom to serve such process. On the other hand, by affidavits introduced in its behalf, the respondent to such motion presented facts which showed to the contrary of the conclusions sought to be established by the moving party in the matter before the court. It thus becomes evident that, in deciding the ultimate question of jurisdiction, the lower court was basing its conclusion upon its implied finding of facts, to wit, that at the time the action was commenced the defendant was "doing business" in this state, and that the service of process was properly had upon a person designated by the statute. In such circumstances it is also manifest that the granting by this court of the peremptory writ of prohibition necessarily would involve on its part an examination of the evidence adduced in the lower court solely with a view to a determination by this court of the correctness of the conclusion as to matters of fact reached by the lower court on evidence properly before it. No direct authority for such procedure has been produced by petitioner; nor is this court aware of the existence of any authority which would indicate that such a course would be in accordance with settled procedure or correct in principle. On the other hand, the law is thoroughly settled that, on appeal, findings of fact made by the trial court on substantial evidence in support thereof are conclusive so far as the appellate tribunals are concerned. This court is advised of no reason why a similar rule should not obtain in a proceeding of the nature of that here involved. To hold otherwise, and to reach a conclusion different in any respect from that reached by the trial court, would amount to nothing less than a new trial by this court on the facts, and a substitution of the conclusion by this court thereon for the conclusion with reference to such facts as found by the trial court.

In Beaulieu Vineyard Co. v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 242, 91 P. 1015, it is held that the writ of prohibition lies to prevent a proceeding without or in excess of jurisdiction only; that it is a preventive, and not a corrective, remedy; and that it will not lie to review the regularity of the proceedings of a court within its jurisdiction, nor to determine the sufficiency of evidence to support its findings, nor any question of mere error in the exercise of jurisdiction. To the same effect in principle is the case of Murphy v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 592, 24 P. 310, where it is ruled that, where a court has power to determine a jurisdictional fact, its determination cannot be collaterally attacked upon an application for the writ of prohibition. With the exception that the case of Dickinson v. Zubiate Mining Co., 11 Cal. App. 656, 106 P. 123, was heard on appeal, in its material facts it closely resembles the instant case. It was there held that, where, on a motion to quash the service of summons, the court acted on conflicting evidence, its conclusion could not be disturbed by the appellate court.

In the case of Mines D'Or de Quartz Mountain Société, etc., v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 101, 27 P. 532, in principle the rule is laid down that the question of whether a court has acquired jurisdiction of the person of a defendant is primarily for the determination of such court, and that its decision thereon cannot be reviewed through the medium of the writ of prohibition. The syllabus therein is as follows:

> "Where a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action, and has ordered that the summons be served upon the defendants by publication, the question as to whether it acquires jurisdiction over the defendants so served is one which the court has authority to pass upon, and a writ of prohibition will not lie to restrain the court from further proceeding in the action until the defendants should appear or be personally served with the summons, on the alleged ground that the case is not a proper one for the publication of summons."

In Lange v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. App. 1, 103 P. 908, a writ of prohibition was prayed for the purpose of restraining the execution of a judgment for contempt for the violation of an injunction. The ground upon which the writ was asked was that jurisdiction in the lower court was lacking, in that the complaint in the action was defective and because of failure of proof of the violation of the injunction. In denying the peremptory writ, in part the court said:

> "Jurisdiction is 'authority to hear and determine a cause. Since jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, it does not depend upon the regularity of the exercise of that power or upon the rightfulness of the decisions there made.' 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 1041. * * *
> "It is equally well settled that a wrong decision by a court as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support a finding cannot be questioned in this proceeding. Beaulieu Vineyard Co. v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 250 [91 P. 1015]; Wreden v. Superior Court, 55 Cal. 504."

The rule that prohibition will not lie where the determination of the question of jurisdiction of the lower court properly depends on a finding of fact by such court is aptly stated in 22 Ruling Case Law, p. 12, as follows:

> "* * * If the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the determination of the question as to jurisdiction of the person depends on contested facts which the inferior tribunal is competent to inquire into and determine, prohibition will not be granted though the court should be of the opinion that the questions of fact have been wrongly determined by the court below, and, if rightly determined, would have ousted the jurisdiction. In re Alix, 166 U. S. 136, 17 S. Ct. 522, 41 L. Ed. 948; Ex parte Oklahoma, 220 U. S. 191, 31 S. Ct. 426, 55 L. Ed. 431; Finley v. Moose, 74 Ark. 217, 85 S. W. 238, 109 Am. St. Rep. 79; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Rogers, 52 W. Va. 450, 44 S. E. 300, 62 L. R. A. 178."

The following statement of the law occurs in 21 California Jurisprudence, p. 580:

> "The writ is never employed as a means of correcting errors of inferior tribunals, even though objection thereto is based upon jurisdictional grounds."

In the case of County of Sutter v. Superior Court, 188 Cal. 292, 296, 204 P. 849, 851, it is said:

> "If an order made as an incident in the progress of a case involves the question of jurisdiction, prohibition cannot be invoked to annul the order or stop proceedings under it. 'If that were so, then in every ordinary civil action, whenever a defendant chose to raise a point of jurisdiction, either of the person or of the subject-matter, he could by prohibition stop the ordinary progress of the action toward a judgment until this court had passed upon the intermediate question; and thus this tribunal would, in innumerable cases, be converted from an appellate to a nisi prius court.' Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 103 [27 P. 50]."

[2] Section 1103 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, in effect, that the writ of prohibition may properly issue in those cases only where the aggrieved party has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.

In the case of Mines D'Or de Quartz Mountain Société, etc., v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 101, 27 P. 532, supra, it appears that the trial court made an order in an action directing that the summons therein be served on the defendants by publication thereof. Thereafter the defendants appeared specially, and moved to vacate such order on the ground that the action was "in personam," and therefore not one in which summons by publication was authorized. The motion was denied. The defendants again entered a special appearance in the action, and moved for an order staying all proceedings therein until such time as they should enter their general appearance. Such motion also having been denied, the defendants petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of prohibition commanding the superior court to desist from further proceeding in the action until petitioners should either enter a general appearance therein, or were personally served with summons in the action. In denying the writ, the Supreme Court declared that it was neither necessary nor proper for it to determine whether the action in the superior court was one in which summons might be legally served by publication, and added the following:

> "* * * That court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and whether it has obtained jurisdiction over the persons of petitioners is a question which (it) must determine for itself before entering judgment in the action, and which it has the same authority to pass upon as any other question of law or fact which may arise during its progress; and if, in the decision, error shall be committed to the prejudice of petitioners, the law affords them a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by an appeal from any judgment which may be entered against them. Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 101 [27 P. 49], and cases cited."

In the case of Germain Seed, etc., Co. v. Justice's Court, 41 Cal. App. 397, 182 P. 784, it is held, in effect, that the right of appeal given by the law on the denial of a motion to quash the service of summons affords a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, and consequently that prohibition will not lie; citing Burge v. Justice's Court, 11 Cal. App. 213, 104 P. 581; Simpson v. Police Court, 160 Cal. 530, 117 P. 553; Hamberger v. Police Court, 12 Cal. App. 153, 106 P. 894, 107 P. 614. To the same effect is McDonald v. Agnew, 122 Cal. 448, 55 P. 125.

From all the authorities hereinbefore cited, it follows that the demurrer to the petition should be sustained, and that the alternative writ issued herein should be discharged. So ordered.

CLINCH et al. v. SHAFER. (Civ. 5093.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 24, 1928.

Appeal and error ⚷1170(3)—Judgment for brokers' commission in procuring loan should be affirmed, notwithstanding deficiencies in complaint, where evidence showed plaintiffs entitled to recover (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Judgment in brokers' action for commission for procuring loan for defendant under express written contract therefor should, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, be affirmed, notwithstanding defects in complaint which did not allege that services were performed at defendant's request or were performed or rendered for defendant, where defendant was not misled, and did not demur, and trial court found for plaintiffs on all issues, and evidence, without contradiction, showed loan was secured for defendant, and reversal would be followed by amendment to complaint and eventually same result.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by Mostyn C. H. Clinch and another, copartners doing business under the firm name of Clinch & Thurtle, against H. N. Shafer. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas L. Clay, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jones, Wilson & Stephenson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WOOD, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in plaintiffs' favor for the sum of $1,410. The action is based upon the following proposal in writing made by defendant to plaintiffs under date of January 15, 1924:

> "In consideration of your efforts to obtain a loan for me enabling me to construct a store and apartment building at the northwest corner of Moneta and Forty-Third street, Los Angeles, I agree to and will make this loan, if agreeable to your princip*les*, upon the following basis:
> "The building to be constructed by the Vaughn Construction Company or such other contractor of your nomination as may be acceptable to me and to be built in accordance with plans and specifications heretofore submitted to you by Mr. H. F. Withey, architect.
> "The maximum cost of the building completed, in accordance with said specifications, not to be in excess of $47,000. The contractor having the privilege of using foundations already in but not to have the right of using certain brick and lumber now stored on this property unless by separate arrangements for purchase of same from me.
> "The aforesaid loan of $47,000 shall bear interest at the rate of, not to exceed 8 per cent. per annum payable quarterly and will be in the form of a first mortgage of from 40 to 50 per cent. of the value of the completed property which shall mature in some three to five years. Balance of the loan to be in the form of a trust deed payable monthly or annually and to be retired within three years from date.
> "I am willing to assign and use the major portion of the income from this property for the purpose of paying interest on the loan and for the reduction of princip*le* amount of same. Interest on this loan is to be computed from the date or dates these funds are advanced.
> "The $47,000 to include any commission which may be required to be paid to you or any one else for services in the securing of the said loan.
> "If these terms are in general acceptable to your princip*les*, I will immediately furnish you with a copy of my last financial statement; also submit for your consideration the certificate of title to said property, and will co-operate with you and your principles in every reasonable way, especially as to details, to facilitate a prompt conclusion of this loan and the erection of the proposed building.

"This proposal is subject to the acceptance of your principles within five (5) days from date."

Upon the receipt of this proposal plaintiffs promptly arranged with the National Bond & Mortgage Company to make a loan to defendant in accordance with the terms thereof. On January 17, 1924, plaintiffs informed defendant that the loan had been obtained. Defendant on the same day furnished plaintiffs a copy of his last financial statement. This was approved by the party making the loan, who was then ready, able, and willing to proceed. On January 18, 1924, plaintiffs, after notifying defendant of these facts, demanded the certificate of title covering the property on which the loan was to be made, but the certificate was not forthcoming. A demand for the certificate was made three times during the following week, but it was not delivered either to plaintiffs or to the National Bond & Mortgage Company. Finally, on January 28, 1924, plaintiffs demanded of defendant that he proceed with the loan or pay their commission. Defendant refused saying he had decided not to build. It was shown by the evidence that the commission sued for was reasonable for this kind of a loan.

At the commencement of the trial defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In some particulars the complaint is undoubtedly defective. It is alleged in the first count that plaintiffs notified defendant that a loan had been secured from the National Bond & Mortgage Company, but there is no specific allegation that the loan was actually secured. Again, plaintiffs allege that defendant agreed to pay them "any commission required by said plaintiffs for their services in the securing of the said loan." This is followed by certain allegations concerning the making of the loan and by the statement "that plaintiffs are entitled to a compensation in the sum of three per cent.," etc. There is no allegation that the sum of $1,410 is reasonable compensation for the services rendered or that plaintiffs have been damaged in any sum by the refusal of the defendant to perform his part of the agreement. Just criticism is also directed to the second count, in which it is alleged that defendant "has become indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $1,410 for services performed by said plaintiffs in connection with the securing of a loan for said defendant." There is no allegation that the services were performed at the instance and request of defendant; nor is there an allegation that the services were performed or rendered for the defendant. One or the other of these allegations should have been made.

Notwithstanding the deficiencies of the complaint above pointed out, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed under the salutary provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, wherein it is provided that:

> "No judgment shall be set aside * * * in any case * * * for any error, as to any matter of pleading * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

The findings of the trial court are in favor of the plaintiffs on all of the issues presented and are amply sustained by the evidence. The evidence shows without contradiction that the loan was in fact secured, the services were rendered for the defendant, and the amount of the judgment was reasonable compensation. Defendant did not file a demurrer, but chose to stand upon his objection to the evidence made on the day of the trial. The complaint was sufficient to fully inform him of the issues he would be called upon to meet. He was not misled or prejudiced in any way. The facts were simple and his defense was fully presented to the court. A reversal of the judgment now would be followed by a simple amendment to the complaint, a long delay, and inevitably the same final result. The section of the Constitution above referred to has often been applied by reviewing courts with great propriety to criminal actions. It can be applied with equal propriety to civil actions when, as in the case before us, there has been no miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEVINSON v. SILVERMAN. (Civ. 6181.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 24, 1928.

1. Sales 🔑371—Seller, not having tendered rubles with intent to pass title, was not entitled to recover contract price as damages for buyer's breach (Civ. Code, § 3310).

Where seller had never tendered rubles to buyer with intent to pass title, he was not entitled, under Civ. Code, § 3310, to recover contract price as damages for buyer's breach.

2. Sales 🔑202(1)—Where contract provides for payment on delivery, tender implies fulfillment of such condition before title passes.

Where a sales contract provides that payment is to be made on delivery, a tender implies that fulfillment of such concurrent condition must be complied with before title passes from seller to buyer.

3. Sales 🔑199—Generally, question of when title passes is one of intention.

Generally, the question of when title to goods sold passes is one of intention between parties.

4. Sales 🔑384(1)—Remedy of seller demanding payment for rubles as condition to delivery held under statute fixing damages where title remains in seller (Civ. Code, § 3311).

Where allegations in complaint for balance of purchase price of rubles showed that seller at all times demanded purchase price as condition to delivery, since defendant's defective denial could not be construed as an admission that rubles were tendered in other manner than to pass title on payment, trial court erred in applying measure of damages provided by Civ. Code, § 3310, as for buyer's breach of agreement after title has vested in him, but seller's remedy was controlled by section 3311 establishing measure of damages where title to goods remains in seller.

5. Sales 🔑153—As respects damages for buyer's breach, seller's deposit of rubles in court did not change character of conditional tender, but merely preserved tender alleged (Civ. Code, §§ 3310, 3311).

In suit for balance of purchase price of rubles, where complaint showed that seller at all times demanded purchase price as condition to delivery, fact that rubles were deposited in court at beginning of suit did not change character of tender from conditional tender under which title did not pass, governed, as respects damages, by Civ. Code, § 3311, to tender with intent to pass title, governed by section 3310, since such deposit served only to keep good the character of tender alleged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by M. Levinson against Herman Silverman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

James, Pace, Smith & Younkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover the balance of the purchase price of certain Russian rubles which the plaintiff's assignor sold to the defendant. The complaint alleged the entering into of a written agreement between the defendant and the plaintiff's assignor on the 14th day of February, 1918, wherein the plaintiff's assignor agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to purchase 40,000 Russian rubles at the sum of 15 cents per ruble, payable in installments of $100 or more until the entire amount of the $6,000 was paid, the agreement providing that payment should not cover a period in excess of two years; that the defendant then and there paid a deposit of $250 on account of the purchase price, said sum to apply on the last installment; that plaintiff's assignor had delivered 4,000 rubles under the contract between the dates of February and June, 1918, and received therefor the sum of $600. It is then charged that defendant thereafter refused to accept and pay for the remaining 36,000 rubles at the rate stipulated, less the deposit of $250; that plaintiff's assignor had upon various occasions offered and tendered to defendant the 36,000 rubles and demanded the balance of the purchase price less the deposit, but defendant failed and refused to pay for the same. Plaintiff further alleged that his assignor had kept and performed all the conditions incumbent upon him to be performed. He also alleged tender by a deposit of the rubles with the clerk of the court. Defendant denied that plaintiff's assignor had kept or performed all the conditions or provisions of the contract incumbent upon him to be performed. By a second defense misrepresentation and undue influence on the part of plaintiff's assignor were alleged. By a third and fourth defense lack of consideration and an accord and satisfaction were pleaded. Under the second, third, and fourth defenses testimony was introduced to show that plaintiff's assignor, one A. L. Greenberg, claimed to be a friend of defendant's and had induced him to purchase the rubles.

It also appeared that Greenberg had made statements to defendant that the rubles were better than United States Liberty bonds which defendant was desirous of purchasing. There was evidence to the effect that about the time the contract was entered into defendant was weak mentally and shortly thereafter was committed to the Southern California state hospital as an insane person; that upon his release, the following year, the parties had entered into a written agreement, for a consideration, whereby Greenberg had released defendant from all claims of every kind and character. The trial court, however, found against defendant on his affirmative defenses. It also found that plaintiff's assignor, Greenberg, had tendered and offered the 36,000 rubles with the intent to pass title, but that defendant had failed and refused to accept or pay for the same. Judgment followed in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $6,768.92. Motion for a new trial was made and denied. This is an appeal from the judgment. No claim is made upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings upon defendant's affirmative defenses, but it is claimed that the findings of a tender with intent to pass title of the rubles finds no support in the evidence.

[1] Under plaintiff's pleading and the proof adduced in support thereof it is clear that the judgment fixing the damage rests on the theory that there was a tender of the rubles to defendant with the intent to pass title, for which reason plaintiff was entitled to recover the full contract price. If the title to the rubles has passed under the tender the trial court adopted the proper measure of damage, for our Civil Code provides that, upon the breach of an agreement to pay for personal property sold, the detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is vested in him, is deemed to be the contract price. Section 3310.

Here, however, as appellant claims, there is absolutely no evidence to show that a tender was made with intent to pass title. We have read the entire record carefully and we fail to find evidence of a tender of any kind, much less one made with intent to pass title. It is perfectly apparent from a reading of the record relating to the question of "tender" that the attorney for the plaintiff was of the opinion that his act in depositing the rubles with the clerk of the court at the time of the filing of the complaint constituted a tender with intent to pass title. Greenberg's testimony relating to the tender is as follows:

> "Q. Did you ever ask him (defendant) to take delivery of them? A. Yes, sir.
> "Mr. Wackerbarth: No question is made about the tendering of the rubles, is there Mr. Gerecht?
> "Mr. Gerecht: I wish you would bring it up, because I don't know.
> "Mr. Wackerbarth: I mean tendering of the rubles to the clerk of the court?
> "Mr. Gerecht: It is in the pleadings.
> "Mr. Wackerbarth: I deposited them myself.
> "Q. Mr. Greenberg: Have you any knowledge as to whether or not the rubles, 36,000 rubles, were deposited with the clerk of the court? A. Yes, sir."

The record then shows that the rubles were deposited with the clerk at the time of the filing of the complaint. Further on Greenberg testified that he told defendant he wanted his money, but that he did not tender him the rubles, but made a claim for some $12,000. Conceding that plaintiff was at all times demanding that defendant perform his contract by paying for the rubles as his pleading alleges, he not having tendered them with intent to pass title, he was not entitled to the measure of damage set forth in section 3310 of the Code.

[2, 3] Every tender does not transfer title; and where, as here, the contract provides that payment is to be made upon delivery, the tender implies that the fulfillment of this concurrent condition must be complied with before title will pass from the seller to the buyer. As a general rule the question of when title to goods sold passes is one of intention between the parties. Had plaintiff tendered the property and demanded payment as a condition to delivery his remedy would be controlled by section 3311 of the Civil Code, which establishes the measure of damages where title to goods sold remain in the seller. That section provides that, upon the breach of an agreement to buy personal property, the detriment caused by a breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for such property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be (1) if the property has been resold pursuant to section 3049, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer under the contract, over the net proceeds of the resale; or (2) if the property has not been resold in the manner prescribed by section 3049, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller, together with the excess, if any, of the expenses properly incurred, in carrying the property to market, over those which would have been incurred for the carriage thereof, if the buyer had accepted it. The principle here involved is elementary. It is fully considered and discussed in Gopcevic v. California Packing Corp., 64 Cal. App. 140, 220 P. 1078.

[4] Respondent makes the claim that, even conceding that no tender was made with intent to pass title, defendant is in no position to raise the question as his pleadings admit, by reason of a defective denial, that such a tender was made. We do not so construe them. Plaintiff pleaded his tender in the following language:

> "That the said A. L. Greenberg has upon various and divers occasions offered and tendered to defendant the remaining 36,000 rubles and demanded of and from said defendant the balance of the purchase price therefor, less the deposit of $250 paid on account of such purchase price, but the defendant has failed and neglected and refused to pay the same or any part thereof."

[5] These allegations show that plaintiff was at all times demanding the purchase price as a condition to delivery. Assuming the denial to be imperfect, it cannot be construed as an admission that the rubles were tendered in any other manner than to pass title upon payment, for there is no allegation of an unconditional tender or of any tender other than with intent to pass title upon payment, and, as above indicated, the evidence shows that plaintiff's assignor was at all times demanding payment, but it does not show that any tender was made either with or without the intent to pass title. Under such circumstances, and even conceding that the frequent demands for the purchase price might be construed as a conditional tender, still, the title to the property being at all times in the vendor, plaintiff's remedy was controlled by section 3311 of the Civil Code and the trial court committed error in applying the measure of damage as set forth in section 3310 of the same Code. Nor does the fact that the rubles were deposited in court alter or change the situation. The act may have served the purpose of keeping good the character of tender alleged, but it could accomplish no other purpose. A proper tender should have been made before suit, and here, as above pointed out, there was no tender, and Greenberg himself so testified. Even conceding that the testimony of Greenberg that he had conversations with defendant regarding the taking of delivery of additional rubles and the defendant's failure to do so could be construed into an offer of delivery, they could not be construed as an offer to pass title to the property to the defendant, for plaintiff was, as his pleading and the evidence shows, at all times demanding payment as a condition to such delivery. This being so, the trial court committed error in applying section 3310 in the admeasurement of damage.

The judgment is reversed.

While employer who closes out his business is liable in damages to one employed for a specific term, still, an immaterial change leaving employer in a way as real owner gives rise to no cause of action.

2. Master and servant ⚷80(9)—Evidence held to sustain finding that if employer transferred business to sons, expressman made new employment contract, precluding recovery under old one.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action for money under contract of employment by Charles Armstrong against Max Cherry, doing business as the Cherry Motor Express Company, and others. From a judgment denying recovery as to a portion of the sum claimed, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Sharp, of Oakland, for appellant.

Glickman & Glickman, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover under a contract of employment. The complaint sets forth: That on the 1st day of August, 1925, plaintiff and defendant Max Cherry entered into a written agreement under terms of which Cherry was to employ plaintiff to perform services as an expressman for a period of one year after the date of the agreement at a wage of $30 per week. That in pursuance of the terms thereof plaintiff entered into the employment of defendant and continued in such service for sixteen weeks from the 1st day of August, 1925, to the 1st day of December following and there was paid to plaintiff for such services the sum of $480. That on the 1st day of December, 1925, defendant disposed of his express business, it being alleged the sale and transfer thereof was made with the intent to evade, deceive and defraud plaintiff of the moneys due him under his contract of employment and that by reason thereof, the sum of $1,080 for the remaining 36 weeks referred to in the contract became due, and in consequence of the disposal of the business by defendant, plaintiff could no longer continue his services as such expressman for the defendant. Judgment was prayed for in the sum of $1,080. Defendant denied all of the allegations of the complaint. Trial was had, and it appeared in evidence that after the contract sued on was entered into, defendant became ill and he turned the business over to his sons.

Plaintiff testified that he had no knowledge of the change in the ownership at the time it took place, and when he ascertained the fact some time later, he made demand upon defendant Max Cherry for the balance due under the unexpired contract period, claiming that because of the transfer his contract was breached and he thereby became entitled to such balance. Other portions of his testimony, however, show that he continued in his employment after he had knowledge of the change of ownership. Just how long he continued in his employment does not appear, but there is evidence to show that his wages had been increased in the hope that he would perform his work in a more satisfactory manner and that he had enjoyed the benefit of the increase for over a month. He had several accidents and had injured and lost property intrusted to his care, and when questioned concerning the same refused to give any satisfactory explanation. He also refused to obey orders. One of the sons of defendant testified that a week or two after his father became ill he took over the management of the business and that he had considerable trouble with plaintiff concerning the manner in which he performed his work, and in the hope of improving this condition he raised his wage upon plaintiff's promise to do better. The hoped-for improvement did not materialize, and the relation was terminated. Plaintiff then obtained other employment and subsequently purchased two trucks and went into business for himself. There was no proof of ability and willingness of plaintiff to continue in his employment, nor was there any attempt to show what sums he may or could have earned by the exercise of reasonable exertion in mitigation of damages, and no such question is here presented or argued by counsel for either party.

The theory upon which the case was defended and determined was that plaintiff, after knowledge of the change in the business, voluntarily continued his employment with the sons at an increased wage and that not having performed his duties in a satisfactory manner the sons were entitled to discharge him and terminate the employment. The trial court found that plaintiff had voluntarily continued in the service of the sons under a new contract of employment, and at the time of his discharge there was due him the sum of $21.20, and judgment was rendered for said amount. Appellant contends that the finding is not supported by the evidence. It is conceded that had plaintiff known of the fact of the sale of the business, from the father to the sons, and with full knowledge of that fact on his part and of all the circumstances he made a new contract with the sons regarding his employment, there would have been an abandonment of the old contract and a new one substituted in its place. He also concedes that under such circumstances he could be discharged for cause, but he claims that no new agreement was ever made. Assuming that there was technically an actual transfer of the business under the evidence narrated, it is perfectly apparent that there was no distinct transfer to a stranger resulting in an entire change of the business. The conditions under which appellant worked were just the same after as before the new arrangement. It would seem that such an immaterial change would give no cause of action for breach of contract.

[1, 2] It is a rule universally recognized, that while a master may not close out his business without becoming liable in damages to an employee under a contract of employment for a specific term, still, an immaterial change gives no cause of action for damages where there is otherwise no change in the manner of conducting the business and the employer continues in a way to be the real owner. 39 Corpus Juris, 76. See, also, Levy v. Friedlander, 24 La. Ann. 439. However this may be, and it is no part of this opinion, there is no evidence in the record to show, as alleged by plaintiff, that the business was transferred or disposed of with the intent to evade, deceive or defraud him. On the contrary, it shows that the sons had done everything to induce plaintiff to continue in his employment, and that they gave him an increased wage in the hope that he would properly perform his duties. A reading of the entire evidence also shows that plaintiff was familiar with the inability of Max Cherry to further continue the management of the business on account of sickness, and his sons were substituted in his place, and that he willingly continued in his employment under the new arrangement, and accepted the sons as his employers in the place of the father. This being so, the evidence fully supports the finding of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

H. F. FITES CO. v. HARRIS MFG. CO.
(Civ. 4988.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 24, 1928.

1. Master and servant ⚿4—Acts, statements, and letters held not to work an implied employment to sell harvesters on commission.

Acts and statements of field agent of defendant, manufacturer of harvesters, and letters from defendant's sales department to plaintiff, who for the previous year had a contract for purchase of harvesters from defendant, with exclusive right to sell them in certain territory, held not to work an implied employment of plaintiff to sell on commission for the following year.

2. Work and labor ⚿28(2)—Evidence held to support contention of rendering services in taking around in automobile to prospective customers, defendant's field agent, at his request, entitling plaintiff to reasonable compensation.

Contention of plaintiff that, through its president, it rendered services to and for the benefit of defendant, manufacturer of harvester, at the request of its field agent, in taking such agent around in an automobile to prospective customers, for purpose of soliciting orders and rendering field inspection, for which plaintiff is entitled to a reasonable compensation from defendant, held supported by the evidence.

3. Work and labor ⚷29(1)—Compensation for plaintiff's president taking field agent of defendant harvester company around in automobile to prospective customers held to be reasonable value of use of machine and of time and services of president.

The proper measure for determining the value of services of plaintiff's president in taking around in an automobile to prospective customers the field agent of defendant harvester manufacturing company held not to be the discount which a purchaser for resale would get, though plaintiff had the previous year a contract for purchase and sale, nor the commission of a farm implement dealer, but the reasonable value of the use of the automobile when in the service of defendant's agent, and the reasonable value of the time and services given and rendered by plaintiff's president in aiding defendant's agent in securing prospective purchasers.

4. Trial ⚷398—Findings of same services being rendered under express contract and quantum meruit held inconsistent.

Findings of services being rendered under an express contract for certain commission, and of the same services being rendered under a quantum meruit, held inconsistent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the H. F. Fites Company against the Harris Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Parkinson & Parkinson, of Stockton, for appellant.

M. C. Atchison, of Calexico, and J. W. Hocker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This appeal comes to us from a judgment rendered by the superior court, in and for the county of Imperial, in an action wherein the plaintiff and respondent brought suit to recover a judgment against defendant and appellant. The complaint contains two counts. The first alleges that a contract of employment was entered into during the month of February, 1922, whereby the defendant employed the plaintiff to act as its agent, salesman, and representative in the county of Imperial to find purchasers for combined harvesters manufactured by the defendant corporation, and as compensation for such services agreed to pay plaintiff 15 per cent. commission on all combined harvesters manufactured by the defendant and sold to persons procured by the plaintiff; that, pursuant to said contract of employment, plaintiff secured purchasers for four harvesters, for which the defendant received the sum of $11,750; and that the sum of $1,762.50 was still owing to the plaintiff from the defendant as commissions on said sales.

The second count sounds in quantum meruit, and alleges that, at the special instance and request of the defendant, the plaintiff performed services for the defendant in the sale of its harvesters, and that the reasonable value of said services is and was the sum of $1,762.50. This count is based upon the same claim forming the foundation for count 1.

The court found as true the allegations contained in both counts of the complaint, but judgment was entered for only $1,762.50. From the judgment entered upon these findings the defendant appeals, making its principal point that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment.

It appears from the record that in February, 1922, plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement, by the terms of which plaintiff purchased from defendant certain harvesters at specified prices, the harvesters to be delivered from time to time as requested by plaintiff during the season which, under the contract, ended on September 30, 1922. By the terms of the contract, plaintiff agreed to pay 5 per cent. of the purchase prices for the harvesters at the time of the execution of the agreement, 20 per cent. upon delivery of each machine as ordered, and the balance upon extended payments to be evidenced by interest-bearing notes executed by the plaintiff. It was further provided that during the season the plaintiff would have the sole right in Imperial county to sell the harvesters manufactured by the defendant company; also that, in the event any farmer purchased a harvester from the plaintiff, and was unable to pay cash for the same, the notes of such farmer given to plaintiff were to be delivered as collateral to the notes given by the plaintiff for the balance of the purchase price of the harvester owing to the defendant company from the plaintiff, or the defendant would accept such notes of the farmer purchaser on account of the plaintiff's obligation to the defendant when such notes were guaranteed by the plaintiff. The contract further provided that, upon the final payment by plaintiff for each harvester, defendant would allow plaintiff certain discounts from the prices listed in the contract. These discounts ranged from 5 to 15 per cent. depending in part upon the time of payment, and also in part upon whether the defendant or plaintiff rendered certain setting up service and field inspection for the harvester after purchase by the farmer. The contract contained an explicit provision that it was to terminate on September 30, 1922.

For several years previous to 1922, similar contracts had been entered into annually by the plaintiff and the defendant, but, subsequent to February, 1922, no such written contract was executed by the parties. It may be important to note at this point that the contract of 1922, as all previous contracts, was executed on behalf of the defendant company by either its president, vice president or general manager, and that these contracts all contained a specific provision that no contract would be binding upon the defendant corporation unless it was executed by its president, vice president, or general manager.

On January 4, 1923, one E. W. Fowler, who was then, and for several years prior thereto had been, a field agent in the employ of the defendant company, called at the place of business of plaintiff in Calexico, and discussed with Howard P. Fites, the president of the plaintiff corporation, the prospects for sales of the Harris harvesters in Imperial Valley for the coming grain season. Fites was well acquainted with Fowler, having known him for several years as the field inspector for the defendant company. There is a marked conflict in the record between the testimony of Fowler and Fites as to what occurred in their conference on January 4th, but it does appear without conflict that Fowler had with him at that time a letter written directly to the defendant company at Stockton, Cal., by one W. I. Green, a rancher in Imperial Valley, who was the owner of a Harris harvester, and who in his letter expressed a desire to purchase a smaller harvester from the defendant company. Fites testified that at the time Fowler called he knew that Green was considering the purchase of a harvester, but had not up to that time interviewed him personally about it. Fowler expressed a desire to interview Green, and together with Fites on January 5th drove out to see Green. At that time Green expressed a desire to secure a smaller harvester, but definitely stated that he could not and would not sign up an order, except upon condition that his larger machine was disposed of. Fowler and Fites talked over the possible prospects for the sale of Green's old machine, but did not secure a buyer. During the ten days following the visit to Green, Fowler and Fites visited a number of farmers in Imperial Valley in an endeavor to interest them in Harris harvesters, but without any tangible results. On January 15th Fowler alone again visited Green, and induced Green to sign a written order for a new harvester, upon Fowler's agreement that this order would not be effective until he (Fowler) had found a purchaser for Green's old harvester. This order was made out in duplicate on a form of contract which evidently had previously been used by the plaintiff company in selling the Harris harvester, and named the plaintiff company as seller and Green as buyer. No mention is made of the defendant company in the order, nor is the defendant company obligated in any way by the terms of the order. Under the provisions of the order when accepted by the plaintiff, the plaintiff company agreed to sell and deliver to Green a harvester, and Green in turn agreed to pay the plaintiff company for the harvester. After securing the execution of this order in duplicate by Green, Fowler took both copies to plaintiff company. Fites was somewhat in doubt as to whether to accept the order, as he had some question as to the financial responsibility of Green. In any event, the order never was accepted by plaintiff company. On the following morning, Fowler returned to the place of business of plaintiff, and secured the Green order, giving as a reason therefor that he desired to change some of its terms. A day or two later Fowler advised Fites he had decided to recommend the firm of Dossey & Gurisch, of Brawley, as the dealers for the Harris harvester in the valley for the year 1923, and from that time Fites engaged in no activities on behalf of the sale of Harris harvesters.

It is important to note at this point that on January 4th, when Fowler first arrived in the valley, he discussed with Fites the matter of Fites Company securing a new contract from the defendant company similar to the 1922 contract. Fites in that conversation stated that he had the matter under consideration, but that he felt he would be more likely to secure such a contract if with the application for the same he would be able to send in an order for the purchase of a harvester, and, in view of the fact that Green was a prospective purchaser, he thought it a wiser policy to attempt to make a sale to Green and send in this order with his request for a new contract.

During the ten or eleven days that Fowler was in the valley interviewing prospective purchasers, the matter of a new contract was frequently the subject of discussion between Fowler and Fites, but Fites on each occasion expressed the view that he stood a better chance of securing such a contract if he could send in an order with the contract. When the Green order was finally signed, inasmuch as it was conditioned upon the sale by Fowler of Green's old harvester, it did not serve the purpose which Fites had in mind as helpful to secure a new contract. Fites admitted on the stand that he understood that it would be necessary for him to get a new contract for 1923 if he continued to sell the Harris harvester in Imperial county; that he well knew that such a contract could only be executed by one of the officers of the defendant company at Stockton; and that Fowler had no authority to execute such a contract.

It further appears that, in conversations with prospects, Fowler on several occasions stated that Fites was or would be the agent for the Harris harvester in Imperial county, and, as an inducement to prospective purchasers, Fowler stated that Fites would carry in stock extra parts of the Harris harvester.

Subsequent to January 16th, Dossey & Gurisch executed a contract with the defendant company similar in form to that which the plaintiff had for the year of 1922, and proceeded to make the four sales of harvesters, the commission for which is the foundation of the plaintiff's action. One of the four sales was made to Green under a new order obtained directly by Dossey & Gurisch from Green. This order, like the one obtained from Fowler, was conditioned upon Dossey & Gurisch finding a purchaser for Green's old harvester, and not until Dossey & Gurisch had accomplished a sale of the old harvester did Green consummate the purchase. The only possible connection that the plaintiff can urge in relation to any of these four sales is that Fowler had previously secured a written order from Green which was conditioned upon the sale of the old harvester, and that Fites, together with Fowler, had previously interviewed the other three purchasers.

In addition to the matters hereinbefore set forth, which respondent urges tend to support its theory of an implied contract, there are two letters written by L. F. Kidd, of the sales department of the defendant corporation. One was dated January 8, 1923, directed to the plaintiff company, and referred to a typewritten price list for the year 1923. The closing paragraph of this letter reads as follows:

> "Mr. Fowler reports some good prospects in your territory and we sincerely hope he will be of assistance to you in closing these sales before he leaves the valley."

The other letter was also from the sales department of the defendant, dated January 18, 1923, and closes with the following language:

> "From the reports reaching us from Mr. Fowler there is a good prospect for several sales in your territory and we are hoping that sales will be realized from these prospects."

[1] Giving full effect to all these circumstances, we do not believe they constitute such a contract of employment as is alleged in count 1 of plaintiff's complaint. There was no written contract for 1923, nor do we construe the circumstances as sufficient to support an implied contract. Respondent in its brief bases its right to recover upon the legal effect of Fowler's actions and statements and the two letters from the sales department of defendant corporation, but whether it is respondent's theory that these matters operated to effect a renewal of the 1922 contract or a new oral agreement of employment we cannot determine. The complaint alleged the contract of employment was made in February, 1922, while the findings declare "that it is true that on or about the 4th day of January, 1923, the defendant employed plaintiff," etc. The answer to the first theory is that the contract of 1922 is one of purchase and sale of harvesters, and not one of employment. Respondent does not contend that it complied with the provisions of the 1922 contract. Nor in the light of the evidence as to Fites' knowledge of the methods employed by defendant in selling its harvesters and Fowler's limited authority of which Fites was fully cognizant, can it be successfully urged that plaintiff was employed, on January 4, 1923, to act as defendant's agent to sell its harvesters for a compensation of 15 per cent. of the purchase price. Fites testified that he knew this contract of 1922 had expired, and that he was anticipating securing a new contract from the company; that the only kind of a contract he expected to get was one similar to the 1922 contract. There is nowhere in the record the slightest suggestion that Fites ever had been employed by defendant on a commission basis, or that he expected to be employed as an agent on a commission basis; furthermore, it clearly appears that he knew that Fowler had no authority to bind the defendant company on a new contract. Undoubtedly Fites and Fowler, as well as Kidd of the sales department of the defendant company, expected that Fites would get a new contract for 1923, and upon that expectation Fites unquestionably gave his time and furnished his automobile in an endeavor to interest prospective purchasers in the Harris harvester, but at no point does it appear that Fites was misled by any one connected with the defendant company into the belief that he already had a contract, or that he was to be employed as an agent, to sell for the defendant company its products on a 15 per cent. basis. The only contract in Fites' contemplation for 1923 was one similar to the 1922 agreement, which, as we have heretofore stated, is clearly an agreement of purchase and sale.

[2, 3] As to the second count, which is based on a quantum meruit, the evidence supports respondent's contention that through its president, Mr. Fites, it rendered services to and for the benefit of the defendant, and at the request of defendant's agent Fowler, for which he is entitled to a reasonable compensation from the defendant. Fowler was unquestionably the representative of defendant company for the purpose of soliciting orders and rendering field inspection. In the performance of these duties it was necessary for Fowler to have the use of an automobile, and it might be reasonably inferred that he had the authority to secure such aid as was furnished him by Fites in interviewing prospective purchasers. Then, too, the two letters from the sales department of the defendant clearly indicate that the defendant company knew Fowler was working with Fites, and really was encouraging Fites to expend efforts with Fowler in securing prospective purchasers. The difficulty, however, arises from the basis urged by respondent and evidently adopted by the court in fixing the reasonable value of the services rendered by Fites. The only evidence offered on this question is the contract of 1922, which apparently respondent interprets as providing for a commission of 15 per cent. on all sales, and the testimony of Fites that farm implement dealers usually were allowed 15 per cent. on all sales made by them when they represented manufacturers. But neither of these methods provided competent or proper evidence of the reasonable value of services rendered by Fites on behalf of his company.

Respondent evidently assumes that the 15 per cent. discount allowed in the contract is the proper measure to determine the value of Fites' services. But this clearly is erroneous, for Fites did not render the services provided in the contract for which the 15 per cent. discount was to be allowed.

Nor does the testimony as to the prevailing commission allowed on sales made by dealers meet the requirements of the case, for the plaintiff made no sales. As we have already pointed out, the transaction that could most nearly constitute a sale was the Green order, and the conditions imposed by Green were never met by the plaintiff company. The true rule would be the reasonable value of the use of plaintiff's automobile when in the service of Fowler, and the reasonable value of the time and services given and rendered by Fites as president of the plaintiff company in aiding Fowler in securing prospective purchasers.

[4] While not important to our conclusion, it may be pointed out that there is a marked inconsistency in the findings of the court in this, that the plaintiff could not recover on a contract as alleged in count 1 and also on a quantum meruit as alleged in count 2. If the services claimed were rendered under the contract, there could be no quantum meruit basis of action, and, on the other hand, if the services were rendered under the quantum meruit, there could be no basis of recovery on contract. The findings declare the existence of both contract and quantum meruit right of actions.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed.

EVA v. SMITH. (Civ. 6031.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 18, 1928.

1. Libel and slander 🔑10(2)—Newspaper article over mayor's signature, criticizing plaintiff's qualifications for office only, held not libelous.

Publication in newspaper to voters of city, over signature of defendant as mayor of city, as to mayor's associates on council seeking reelection, that he had kindest personal regards for them, but good of city compelled him to state that two incumbents should not be returned, and that he favored keeping city council free from suspicion of unfairness in city's contracts, held not libelous; incumbents not being charged with dishonest conduct as to public contracts.

2. Libel and slander 🔑48(3)—Candidate for public office invites public criticism as to fitness and qualifications, and it is proper subject of comment.

An individual who seeks or accepts public office invites and challenges public criticism so far as affects his qualifications, and it is proper subject of comment.

3. Libel and slander 🔑48(3)—One may communicate to constituency any matter respecting a candidate material to the election.

Since candidate for office invites public criticism as to his qualifications, one may communicate bona fide to constituency any matter respecting him material to the election.

4. Libel and slander 🔑48(2, 3)—One may not wrongfully impute dishonesty to candidate for office or who accepts public office.

Though individual seeking or accepting public office challenges public criticism as to his qualifications no one may wrongfully impute dishonesty to him.

5. Libel and slander 🔑48(2)—Conduct of public officers being open to criticism, their acts may be freely published, with fitting comment.

Since the conduct of public officers is open to public criticism, it is in interest of society that their acts may be freely published, with fitting comment.

6. Libel and slander 🔑48(2)—"Criticism" of public officer pertains only to his work as such, but does not follow him into private life.

As regards a candidate for public office, distinction between criticism and defamation is that criticism deals only with such things as invite public attention or call for public comment, and does not follow candidate into his private life or pry into his domestic concerns.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Criticism.]

7. Libel and slander 🔑48(3)—Rule permitting fair and honest criticism of candidate for public office is based on public policy.

Right to criticise a candidate for public office as to fitness and qualifications is based on public policy, since it is promotion of the public good.

8. Libel and slander 🔑48(3)—Mayor of city could assert opinion that by returning plaintiff to office city would not progress along fair and honest lines.

Mayor of city, in signed article published in newspaper as to his associates in city council who were asking for re-election, that, in event of plaintiff's return to office, it was his opinion city would not progress along fair and honest lines, due to plaintiff's want of zeal and temperament, such statement not implying plaintiff was dishonest, in view of statement that mayor held plaintiff in highest personal regard.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by William J. Eva against Frederick J. Smith. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for appellant.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, and Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action for libel. The complaint alleges, in substance:

That plaintiff was, and now is, a duly elected, qualified, and acting member of the city council of the city of San Mateo. That the legislative power of said city at all times mentioned was, and now is, vested in said city council. That he was a candidate for re-election to said city council at an election held in said city on Tuesday, April 7, 1925. That the only other incumbent member of said city council who was seeking re-election at said election was one John E. Casey. That for more than 19 years last past plaintiff has been, and now is, a resident of the city of San Mateo. That for over 11 years he was a member of its board of trustees, during 2 years of which he served as mayor thereof. That for about 7 years he was a member of the board of trustees of the grammar school district of said city. That for the past 12 years he has been, and now is, engaged in the wholesale grocery business in San Francisco as president of the H. Janssen Company. That on Saturday, the 4th day of April, 1925, some 3 days prior to the election above referred to, defendant published in the San Mateo Times and in the Daily News Leader, newspapers of daily circulation, published in San Mateo county, an article as follows:

> "To the Voters of San Mateo:
> "From time to time there have appeared statements in the San Mateo papers as to where I stand in the present political campaign that will elect three members of the council.
> "Ordinarily, I would be loath to inject myself into the campaign. The charter of the city of San Mateo was adopted through the efforts of the progressive people of this city, and they expected when they adopted this charter that it would eliminate politics that heretofore thwarted the advancement of the city. This the charter will do with the proper men and women in office.
> "As to my associates on the city council who are asking for re-election, I hold kindest personal regards, but candor, frankness, and my desire to see the city of San Mateo advance systematically and along fair and honest businesslike lines, compels me to state that these two incumbents should not be returned to city council.
> "They have neither the zeal nor the temperament to administer the business of San Mateo under the present charter, as it should be administered.
> "The best interests of San Mateo require the election to the city council of Fred E. Beer, Thomas J. Brady, and Albert J. Watson, men who are in sympathy with progressive and wholesome measures for the advancement of the city of San Mateo.
> "The present issue has been thoroughly discussed both pro and con. I am strongly in favor of keeping the city council free from any suspicion or taint of unfairness in the city's contracts. No contractor should be influenced to buy from any one particular firm.
> "Therefore, I strongly urge, for the best interests of San Mateo, the election of Candidates Fred E. Beer, Thomas J. Brady, and Albert J. Watson.
> "They will be able to render excellent service for the new charter, and the city manager form of government which it provides for the city. Sincerely, Frederick J. Smith,
> "Mayor of San Mateo."

That by the foregoing false, malicious, and defamatory language defendant contrived and wickedly and maliciously intended to injure plaintiff in his good name, fame, and occupation, and to bring him into public contempt and disgrace, and to cause it to be believed that he was guilty of dishonesty as a member of the city council in influencing city contractors to buy from one particular firm, which said facts are false and known by defendant to be so. That by reason of such publication plaintiff has been brought into public disgrace and injured in his good name in the sum of $25,000. For a separate, second, and distinct cause of action, plaintiff complains of the further statements in the publication concerning the plaintiff:

> "My desire to see the city of San Mateo advance systematically and along fair and honest businesslike lines compels me to state that these two incumbents should not be returned to the city council." "I am strongly in favor of keeping the city council free from any suspicion or taint of unfairness in the city's contracts. No contractor should be in any way influenced to buy from one particular firm."

It is alleged that the reference to the "two incumbents" referred to the plaintiff and one John E. Casey of San Mateo.

[1] A demurrer to the complaint was interposed by defendant, and the same was sustained without leave to amend. Judgment dismissing the action and awarding defendant his costs followed. From this judgment plaintiff has appealed. It is claimed that the demurrer was improperly sustained, for the reason that it is manifest that the article was published to disparage plaintiff; its plain import being to characterize him as the type of a man who should not be returned to public office. Taking the article as a whole, it seems clear to us that it amounts to no more than a criticism of plaintiff's qualifications for office and one which defendant was entitled to make. No malversation on the part of plaintiff is charged. On the contrary, the article states that for his associates, of whom plaintiff was one, defendant held the kindest personal regards, but, by reason of lack of zeal and temperament, neither incumbent should be returned to office. Nor does the article charge that plaintiff was guilty of dishonest conduct with reference to any public contracts.

[2-5] An individual who seeks or accepts public office invites and challenges public criticism so far as it may relate to his fitness and qualifications, and it is a proper subject of comment. It is therefore justifiable for one to communicate, bona fide, to the constituency any matter respecting a candidate material to the election. Having offered profert of himself for public investigation, a candidate must expect some criticism of his personal fitness. No one, of course, has the right to wrongfully impute dishonesty to him, but temperament and qualifications are mere matters of opinion of which the electors are the only judges. There should be freedom in discussing, in good faith, the mental or other qualifications of any person seeking or holding public office. The conduct of public officers being open to public criticism, it is for the interest of society that their acts may be freely published with fitting comment or strictures. This right, as stated, does not warrant aspersive attack on the motives or character of the officer.

[6] The distinction between criticism and defamation is that the former deals only with such things as invite public attention or call for public comment, and does not follow a public man into his private life or pry into his domestic concerns, but only his work. Triggs v. Sun Printing Ass'n, 179 N. Y. 144, 71 N. E. 739, 66 L. R. A. 612, 103 Am. St. Rep. 841, 1 Ann. Cas. 326; 36 Cor. Jur. 1280. The right of criticism rests upon public policy, and those who seek office should not be supersensitive or too thin-skinned concerning criticism of their qualifications. Newell on Libel and Slander (4th Ed.) p. 536. In commenting upon a published article of the character here involved, the Supreme Court of Nebraska used the following apt language:

> "It relates to the fitness for office of those who adhere to the ruling clique and their conduct in office. It imputes no crime to them. It employs no degrading or insulting epithets toward them, but in extravagant language denounces them as derelict in the duties of their office, unfit, unfaithful, etc. This we understand a political stump orator may do, and outside of ethics there is no rule against using the pulpit for a like purpose. It would be absurd to hold it libelous to say of a candidate for office that he was utterly unworthy of public confidence. To maintain that proposition all political arguments are advanced against a candidate. They are sometimes * * * rambling, * * * but the law does not undertake to punish the man who sums them up in a single sentence." Arnold v. Ingram, 151 Wis. 438, 138 N. W. 111, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 976.

And, again, it has been said that it is one of the infelicities of public life that a public officer is thus exposed to critical and often unjust comment; but these, unless they pass the bounds of what the law will tolerate, must be borne for the sake of maintaining free speech. Sillars v. Collier, 151 Mass. 50, 23 N. E. 723, 6 L. R. A. 680.

[7, 8] The purpose of the rule permitting fair and honest criticism is that it promotes the public good and hence is based upon public policy. Triggs v. Sun Printing Ass'n, supra. In thus permitting criticism the law gives a wide liberty, there being an honest regard for the truth. Within this limit public journals, speakers, and private individuals may express opinions and indulge in criticism upon the character or habits, or mental or moral qualifications of official candidates. Cooley on Torts, vol. 1, p. 443. Here, as above pointed out, no malversation in office is directly charged against plaintiff. In so far as the articles might imply that, in the opinion of defendant, plaintiff was unfitted for the office he was seeking to be returned to, no complaint can be made, for defendant had the right to express his opinion in this respect. So, also, did he have the right to assert, in the event of plaintiff's return to office, that in his opinion the city would not progress along fair and honest lines, due to his want of zeal and temperament. This statement cannot be construed to imply that plaintiff was dishonest, for the article further states that defendant had the highest personal regard, but was wanting only in the qualifications named. Nor is it charged that plaintiff had ever been interested dishonestly or otherwise in any public contract. It is a matter of public knowledge and general comment that many public officials are lacking in these very qualifications in consequence of which public affairs do not progress along fair and honest business lines. This is about all the article complained of can possibly be said to infer, and, this being so, plaintiff has no cause for complaint. We have been cited by counsel for plaintiff to several California cases as supporting his contention that the article is libelous. What was said in those cases had reference to the particular facts there involved, and no useful purpose would be accomplished by a review of them.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

SMART v. SPANGLER. (Civ. 4737.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 20, 1928.

1. Appeal and error 🔑979(2)—Trial court's order granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence is conclusive on appeal, in absence of abuse of discretion.

Granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence is within trial court's discretion, and its order will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it clearly appears that it has abused its discretion.

2. Appeal and error 🔑979(5)—Trial court's order holding that jury gave excessive damages because of passion and prejudice will not be disturbed, if question is debatable.

Trial court's order granting new trial unless defendant remits portion of verdict and holding that jury gave excessive damages because of passion and prejudice will not be disturbed, if question of its propriety be open to debate.

3. Appeal and error 🔑933(1)—On appeal from order granting new trial unless plaintiff remitted portion af verdict, every intendment is to be indulged in support of trial court's action.

On appeal every intendment is to be indulged in support of trial court's action in granting new trial unless plaintiff should remit certain portion of verdict.

4. New trial 🔑162(3)—Ordering remittitur of damages above $500 for breaking jaw of plaintiff afflicted with cleft palate held not abuse of discretion.

In action for personal injuries for breaking jaw of plaintiff afflicted with cleft palate, granting new trial unless plaintiff remitted damages above $500 held not abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by John C. Smart against George Spangler. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial, unless plaintiff remitted all damages in excess of $500, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur E. Koepsel, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, and Otto Sanaker, for respondent.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff (appellant) sued to recover $5,125 actual and $5,000 exemplary damages on account of personal injuries resulting from a blow on his mouth administered by defendant. A jury trial was had and the jury awarded plaintiff $1,625 actual and $1,000 exemplary damages.

Defendant moved for a new trial and the court made its order granting the motion, conditioned as provided in the order, as follows:

"Motion for new trial granted if plaintiff does not on or before February 19, 1924, remit all damages in excess of $500, exclusive of costs, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and also upon the ground of excessive damages appearing to having [sic] been given under the influence of passion and prejudice."

Plaintiff appeals from the order contending that he is entitled to the full amount awarded by the jury, and that the reduction in the amount made by the trial court was greater than justified by the evidence.

The following facts are fairly shown by the evidence produced by each party, considered together:

Each party was a blacksmith, and at the time the events complained of occurred each had a blacksmith shop in Whittier and they were business rivals. Plaintiff had worked for defendant in defendant's shop for about three years, ceasing the employment about a year prior to the time complained of, and plaintiff opened his shop a short time before the events occurred. Defendant complained that plaintiff interfered with his business and persisted in taking customers away from his shop, and defendant was very resentful towards plaintiff. Immediately preceding the events complained of certain horses were brought to defendant's shop to be shod and defendant's employee commenced to work on them when they were taken away to plaintiff's shop. Defendant then went to plaintiff's shop and complained that plaintiff had caused the removal of the horses from defendant's shop, which plaintiff denied. Defendant testified that plaintiff called him a liar, which plaintiff denied. Defendant then called plaintiff a vile name and struck plaintiff on the mouth with his hand or fist. During all of his life plaintiff had been and was then afflicted with a cleft palate, united in front and with only one-half to three-quarters of an inch of bone or that much of fibrous structure. The blow broke his upper jaw apart at its weak point, broke off a false tooth that had been fastened to a root of a tooth, and loosened one or more natural teeth. The injuries kept plaintiff from his work for two weeks, caused him pain and suffering, and affected his ability to eat. The probability was that the break in the jaw never would fully unite. Plaintiff was caused expense of $72 for hire of a man in his place and $10 medical charges.

The cleft palate had always caused plaintiff to enunciate his words in the manner peculiar to persons so afflicted, and, while the evidence does not directly show that defendant was aware of plaintiff's affliction, the close association of the two men during the previous years should and no doubt did inform defendant of its existence, and he should have known that plaintiff's upper jaw would be more easily broken than that of a normal person.

[1] While we might conclude from a consideration of the cold print in the briefs and transcript of the evidence, not having the witnesses before us or the opportunity to observe their demeanor on the stand or their manner of testifying, that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the awards of the jury, the province of the trial court would be infringed should we disturb its ruling.

The well-settled and familiar rules governing courts of appeal are that insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is a ground for new trial peculiarly within the province of the trial court, and its order granting a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that there was an abuse of discretion. These rules have been so often announced that citation of authorities is unnecessary.

[2, 3] The same rules apply in relation to the holding of the trial court that excessive damages were given by the jury under the influence of passion and prejudice. As announced in the leading and often cited case of Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 164, 47 P. 1019, every intendment is to be indulged upon appeal, in support of such action of the trial court, and its order will not be disturbed if the question of its propriety be open to debate.

[4] Under the evidence the action of the trial court is at least open to debate, and it does not appear that there was an abuse of discretion.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

HEDGER v. HOGLE et al. (Civ. 6175.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 21, 1928.

Principal and agent 🔑103(7)—Used automobile dealer, fraudulently obtaining ownership certificate for automobile sold him conditionally could make valid sale where car was left in salesroom (Motor Vehicle Act).

Where secondhand automobile dealer obtained certificate of ownership under Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517), for car which was sold to him conditionally by changing certificate of ownership signed by conditional seller and by false affidavit, he could nevertheless make valid sale of car where it was voluntarily left in his salesroom, where he had other cars for sale; he having been vested with such indicia of authority to sell as usually accompanies such authority.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery for automobile by Vera Walklin Hedger against H. J. Hogle and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. P. Hatch, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Waldo & Hinds, Waldo, Hinds & Lawrence, and John H. Waldo, all of Pasadena, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action of claim and delivery of an automobile. The court found that the defendants were the owners of the automobile and entitled to retain possession, and entered judgment accordingly. From this judgment plaintiff has appealed.

On November 8, 1924, appellant was the owner of the automobile in question given to her by her father, and it was then registered in her name as required by the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517). On that date appellant and her father went to the salesroom of National Motor Sales, under which name F. Koehl was conducting the business of selling used automobiles, and there delivered appellant's Packard automobile to the "National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, Proprietor," for $2,000, and $200 cash was paid on account of the purchase price, and the National Motor Sales was to sell the car and pay the balance due within ninety days. A promissory note of National Motor Sales, Frank Koehl, for $2,000 was given to plaintiff, dated November 8, 1924, due in 90 days, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, stating in the body of the note, "Value received for Packard sedan No. 168100," and indorsed, "Received by cash this day $200.00 Nov. 8, 1924, rec'd by Vera Walklin Hedger."

On the same day appellant delivered to National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, her official pink "ownership certificate" issued to her by the state motor vehicle department, and signed the same so as to permit the issuance of a new certificate to National Motor Sales as the registered owner. She also signed this certificate as the new legal owner. This signature was crossed out and an affidavit was filed with the motor vehicle department by Koehl with this certificate stating that this new legal owner signature of appellant was made by mistake. On the same day appellant made, signed, and delivered a bill of sale of her automobile to National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, "free and clear of all incumbrances except $1,800."

It is appellant's contention that the sale by her of the automobile to National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, was a conditional sale, and that the title was to remain in appellant until the purchase price was fully paid, and this contention is supported by her testimony and the testimony of her father. That such was her intention was found by the court, the court finding:

"That plaintiff delivered the said pink ownership certificate so signed to the said F. Koehl for the purpose of having a new pink ownership certificate for said automobile issued to said National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, as the new registered owner, and intending to have said certificate also show plaintiff as the new legal owner."

The evidence is without material conflict. Appellant delivered her automobile to National Motor Sales, a business establishment engaged in the sale of used automobiles, and accepted a promissory note for $2,000, and received $200 in cash, which she receipted for on the back of the note. She gave a bill of sale to National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, which bill of sale was in the usual form, but contained the statement that the automobile was "free of all incumbrances except $1,800." Appellant produced to National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, her official pink ownership certificate issued to her by the state motor vehicle department, on which she had signed her name in the place thereon provided for signature by the registered and legal owner, and she there signed the certificate on the reverse side on the first line designated as the line for the legal owner to sign in making a transfer, and wrote her address on the second line at the place there provided, and also signed her name and wrote her address on the bottom two lines at the place there designated for the new legal owner, intending to retain the legal ownership of the automobile as found by the court—"that the plaintiff delivered the said pink ownership certificate so signed to said F. Koehl for the purpose of having a new pink ownership certificate for said automobile issued to said National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, as the new registered owner, and intending to have said certificate also show plaintiff as the new legal owner." On November 12, 1924. four days later, Koehl presented the pink certificate to the motor vehicle department with appellant's name as the new legal owner crossed out and the affidavit that appellant's name was written upon the pink certificate by mistake and secured a pink certificate of ownership issued to National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, as the registered and legal owner of the automobile, and in which no mention is made of appellant. On December 11, 1924, respondent H. J. Hogle purchased the automobile from National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, upon a conditional sales contract for $620 cash and note for $1,452.48. The note and conditional sales contract were sold to respondent D. B. Rose, Inc., a corporation, for $1,180. Neither Hogle nor D. B. Rose, Inc., had any knowledge or notice at the time of the purchase of any claim in the automobile by appellant. They had seen the pink ownership certificate issued by the motor vehicle department showing National Motor Sales as the registered and legal owner, believed National Motor Sales to be the true owner, and had no reason to think otherwise; in fact, Koehl informed them that he owned the car.

It therefore appears from the evidence and findings that appellant desired to sell her automobile, and left it at the salesrooms of National Motor Sales to be sold; that, while she accepted a note for the amount stipulated as the selling price, she did not intend to part with the ownership or legal title until she received the purchase price; that in the bill of sale, which was in the usual printed form, she inserted "free and clear of incumbrances except $1,800"; that she signed the pink ownership certificate so that a new one might be issued, naming National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, as the new registered owner, but naming herself as the legal owner, and therefore the one who would have to sign the certificate transferring title in the event of a sale by Koehl; that Koehl crossed out her name and presented the certificate, accompanied by a false affidavit, to the motor vehicle department and through fraud obtained a certificate showing National Motor Sales to be the legal owner as well as the registered owner.

Appellant, in support of her contention that the sale was a conditional sale, cites us to Rodgers v. Bachman, 109 Cal. 552, 556, 42 P. 448, 449, holding, "The question is always one of intention, and whenever, upon a proper construction of the instrument, it is apparent that it was the intention of the parties thereto that the sale should be conditioned upon the payment of the price, it is the duty of the court to carry out that intention;" and also to Greene v. Carmichael, 24 Cal. App. 27, 140 P. 45, holding that conditional sales are fully recognized in this state, that one in possession under a contract of conditional sale cannot by selling or creating a lien on the property impair the rights or interests of the owner. Our attention is further directed to Walsh v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 46, 52 P. 115, 39 L. R. A. 697, in which case the agent altered a note and mortgage. There the court says:

> "It would be absurd to hold that there was upon the facts any implied or ostensible authority conferred upon him [the agent] to commit a forgery—the plain legal effect of his act—and bind the defendant thereby; * * * that, where it is through the instrumentality of a criminal act that the wrong is accomplished, it is the crime and not the negligent act which is the proximate cause of injury; and in such a case the maxim that where one of two innocent persons must suffer from the wrongful act of another, the loss must fall upon the one making the act possible, has no application."

We do not question the principle of law contended for by appellant, but here another principle is involved which is absent in the cases cited. Here appellant took her automobile to the place of business of National Motor Sales, F. Koehl, proprietor, which was a place of business where the proprietor was ordinarily engaged in selling secondhand cars, to whom it was confided to sell.

While mere possession, it is true, even by one who happens to be a dealer in the same commodity or class of goods, is not sufficient evidence of ownership or of authority to protect one who purchases from the possessor (Covill v. Hill, 4 Denio [N. Y.] 323; Linnen v. Cruger, 40 Barb. [N. Y.] 633; Pacific Acceptance Corp. v. Bank of Italy, 59 Cal. App. 76, 209 P. 1024), yet where, in addition to possession by the vendor, the owner has given such evidence of authority to sell as usually accompanies such authority according to the custom of trade or the general understanding of business men, the vendor's possession under such circumstances is evidence, not that he is the owner, but that he has received authority from the owner to sell (Wright v. Solomon, 19 Cal. 76, 79 Am. Dec. 196; Heath v. Stoddard, 91 Me. 499, 40 A. 547; Pickering v. Bush, 15 East [Eng.] 38). In Pickering v. Bush, supra, Lord Ellenborough uses this language:

> "If the principal send his commodity to a place where it is the ordinary business of the person to whom it is confided to sell, it must be intended that the commodity was sent thither for the purpose of sale. If the owner of a horse sent it to a repository of sale, can it be implied that he sent it thither for any other purpose than that of sale? Or if one send goods to an auction room, can it be supposed that he sent them thither for safe custody? Where the commodity is sent in such a way and to such a place as to exhibit an apparent purpose of sale, the principal will be bound, and the purchaser safe."

The question presented here is quite similar in fact and analogous in principle to Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, 211 P. 267, in which case the principle involved is fully discussed and the cases bearing upon the question distinguished. In that case the plaintiff drove his car to McNabb's place of business, exhibited it to McNabb, and instructed the latter to try and find a purchaser; that, if he found one, to "bring him to me and I will sign the necessary license transfer and anything else necessary for the completion of the sale." Plaintiff's car, along with a number of other secondhand machines, was on exhibition for sale in McNabb's vacant lot. McNabb sold the car to the defendant, but did not claim to be the owner and defendant knew the car was owned by plaintiff. Plaintiff never signed any statement or transfer indorsed on the certificate of registration. McNabb must have forged plaintiff's name to the transfer on the registration certificate as defendant received through the mail a certificate of transfer from the state motor vehicle department. The court in that case says:

> "The principles governing this case are well stated by the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine in Heath v. Stoddard [91 Me. 499, 40 A. 547], supra: 'A principal is not only bound by the acts of his agent, whether general or special, within the authority which he has actually given him, but he is also bound by his agent's acts within the apparent authority which the principal himself knowingly permits his agent to assume, or which he holds the agent out to the public as possessing. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 969, and cases cited. Whether or not a principal is bound by the acts of his agent, when dealing with a third person who does not know the extent of his authority, depends, not so much upon the actual authority given or intended to be given by the principal, as upon the question, What did such third person, dealing with the agent, believe, and have a right to believe, as to the agent's authority from the acts of the principal? Griggs v. Selden, 58 Vt. 561, 5 A. 504; Towle v. Leavitt, 23 N. H. 360, 55 Am. Dec. 195; Walsh v. Hartford Ins. Co., 73 N. Y. 5. For instance, if a person should send a commodity to a store or warehouse where it is the ordinary business to sell articles of the same nature, would not a jury be justified in coming to the conclusion that at least the owner had by his own act invested the person with whom the article was intrusted with an apparent authority which would protect an innocent purchaser?' * * * McNabb was more than a mere bailee; he was plaintiff's agent to find a purchaser. Whatever may have been the private arrangement between plaintiff and McNabb, whatever the latter's actual authority may have been, plaintiff, by his own voluntary act, clothed McNabb with such indicia of authority to sell the car as usually accompanies such authority according to the custom of trade and the general understanding of business men."

In the present case, conceding the sale to be a conditional sale, the automobile was left with Koehl to be sold for appellant and was voluntarily placed by her in his salesroom, where he had secondhand cars for sale, and she thereby clothed him with such indicia of authority to sell the car as usually accompanies such authority according to the custom of trade and the general understanding of business men.

In Carter v. Rowley, supra, the plaintiff did not sign the ownership certificate, but said to the proprietor of the secondhand car establishment:

> "When you find a purchaser for this car who will pay me $575 net, you bring him to me and I will sign the license transfer and anything else that is necessary for the completion of the sale of the car."

The secondhand merchant sold the car and forged the name of the owner to the ownership certificate. Here the secondhand car merchant sold the car of appellant, crossed out her name as the new legal owner, and filed a false affidavit that appellant's name as the new legal owner was written in the certificate by mistake.

On principle, the Carter Case and the present case are analogous, and, on the authority of that case, which we think states the correct rule, the judgment must be affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

CRYSTAL PETROLEUM PRODUCTS CORPORATION v. ABBOTT et al. (Civ. 6146.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 24, 1928.

Execution ⚷264—Sale of leasehold within two years before term expires, under execution issued at either secured or unsecured creditor's request, confers absolute title (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 688, 700, 700a).

Unexpired term of leasehold being subject to execution under Code Civ. Proc. § 688, sale thereof within two years before expiration of term confers absolute title on purchaser under sections 700, 700a, whether execution issued at request of secured or unsecured creditor, though holder of security may delay proceedings until day after expiration of two years, so as to deprive debtor of right of redemption.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the Crystal Petroleum Products Corporation against Thomas C. Job and another, with cross-complaint against F. J. Abbott. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff and cross-defendant appeal. Affirmed.

Claud B. Andrews and John C. Gillham, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Romaine L. Hogan, of Los Angeles, for respondent Hull.

STURTEVANT, J. The appellant F. J. Abbott was lessee of certain lots in Los Angeles county. He borrowed moneys from Thomas C. Job and assigned the lease as security for the repayment of those moneys. Thomas C. Job assigned to George B. Hull. F. J. Abbott failed to pay the moneys when due. Being in default, he sought to protect his interests by preserving his right to redeem if respondent should attempt to enforce his claim. He commenced an action against the respondent, praying for that relief. The respondent answered and also filed a cross-complaint. The cross-complaint was answered. The respondent made a motion for judgment on the pleadings. The motion was granted, and the appeal is from that judgment. If the one question of law presented by appellants is decided against them the judgment should be affirmed. That question involves section 700a, Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows:

> "Sales of personal property, and of real property, when the estate therein is less than a leasehold of two years' unexpired term, are absolute. In all other cases the property is subject to redemption, as provided in this chapter. * * *"

The appellants concede at once that the section provides that the sale of certain fractional terms are absolute. But they contend that at the time of making the sale the sheriff should inquire when the security was given and what, at that time, was the length of the unexpired term. The appellants argue that otherwise the holder of the security may delay his proceedings until one day after the two years have expired and then file a proceeding which will result in the debtor losing his right of redemption. The contingency noted may at times arise, but the Legislature in its wisdom has adopted the statute. The clear wording of the language is equivalent to the statement that all sales of personal property are absolute. The unexpired term of a leasehold is subject to execution. Code Civ. Proc. § 688. The case may arise where the execution is levied on a leasehold by an unsecured creditor. In that event it is patent that the sheriff before making out his certificate of sale would inquire what is the length of the unexpired term. That question is answered by the preceding section, section 700:

> "Upon a sale of real property, the purchaser is substituted to and acquires all the right, title, interest, and claim of the judgment debtor thereto on the date of the levy of the execution thereon, where such judgment is not a lien upon such property. * * *" (Italics ours.)

In the case before us the record discloses that the decree was rendered September 15, 1925—less than two years before the expiration of the lease. It does not disclose when, if at all, the levy was made. In any event, it would be some date subsequent. If the writ ran in favor of an unsecured creditor it is clear that under the provisions of section 700a, supra, the title of the purchaser would be absolute. When, as here, the writ ran in favor of a secured creditor, the statute contains no exception and we are forced to the conclusion that the sale would confer the same rights whether the execution issued at the request of the secured creditor as on an unsecured creditor.

The judgment is affirmed.

O'CONNELL v. O'CONNELL. (S. F. 12168.)

Supreme Court of California. March 5, 1928.

1. Divorce 🔑183—Absence of record held to prevent consideration of appeals from orders in divorce action, where papers contained in transcript were not authenticated (Code Civ. Proc. § 953).

Absence of record provided for by Code Civ. Proc. § 953, held to prevent consideration of appeals from orders in divorce action, where "transcript on appeal" contained indiscriminate lot of papers, and affidavits not authenticated as having been used in court below.

2. Appeal and error 🔑616(1)—In absence of record, documents and evidence used on hearing on application for order must be authenticated by bill of exceptions (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Unless record on appeal is prepared pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, only other method for authenticating of documents and evidence used on hearing in support of application for an order is by bill of exceptions duly authenticated.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walton J. Wood and Kirby S. Mahon, Judges.

Actions by Anna M. O'Connell against Daniel O'Connell for divorce and to set aside an interlocutory divorce decree granted defendant on his cross-complaint in the divorce action. From an adverse judgment in the equity action and from orders entered in the divorce action, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and orders affirmed.

Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. There are before us for consideration appeals in two causes, though in but one transcript. The first is a divorce action begun by the plaintiff, Anna M. O'Connell, against the defendant, Daniel O'Connell, which never ripened into a final decree. The second action is one in equity to impeach for extrinsic fraud the interlocutory decree of divorce granted on the cross-complaint in the above-entitled action for the defendant, Daniel O'Connell. For a complete and more accurate history of this litigation, and for a specification of the various appeals taken therein, reference is made to the statement of facts prepared for the court by Mr. Justice Richards when certain motions to dismiss appeals were heard. 255 P. 514.

In the proceeding last referred to, the appeal from the order denying said defendant's motion for new trial in the equity action was dismissed, and all other motions to dismiss in the matter were denied. In the divorce action we have an appeal taken on September 1, 1925, by defendant and cross-plaintiff from the order of the trial court denying his motion for a final decree of divorce. On September 22, 1925, said defendant and cross-plaintiff in said divorce action appealed from seven separate orders theretofore made therein, to wit: (1) From an order denying his motion for transfer of said action for trial before another judge; (2) from the order overruling the demurrer to the application for an injunction; (3) from an order refusing to strike out a certain affidavit which had been theretofore filed by the plaintiff in said action; (4) from an order issuing a certain special injunction restraining the defendant from doing certain acts during the pendency of the action; (5) from a preliminary injunction which had been made and entered by the court in said action; (6) from an order of said court denying the motion to dissolve said injunction; (7) from an order to show cause why the defendant should not be punished for contempt.

We have in the equity action an appeal upon the judgment roll alone from the judgment entered therein annulling the interlocutory decree entered in said divorce action. So far as the action in equity is concerned, we have before us none of the evidence or proceedings taken on said judgment, save alone said judgment roll. This we have examined carefully, and see no reason whatsoever therefrom to disturb the judgment therein, and the same is hereby affirmed.

[1, 2] We are without power to consider the other appeals above noted from various orders in the divorce action in the absence of the record provided for by section 953 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The volume called "Transcript on Appeal" contains an indiscriminate lot of papers and affidavits, not one of which is authenticated as having been used in the court below upon the hearing of any of the orders appealed from. Unless a record is prepared pursuant to section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, the only other method for the authenticating of the documents and evidence used upon a hearing in support of application for an order, is by bill of exceptions duly authenticated as provided by law. Estate of Broome, 169 Cal. 605, 147 P. 270; People v. Terrill, 131 Cal. 112, 63 P. 141; Ramsbottom v. Fitzgerald, 128 Cal. 75, 60 P. 522; Melde v. Reynolds, 120 Cal. 234, 52 P. 491; Harrison v. Cousins, 16 Cal. App. 515, 117 P. 564.

The said judgment and said orders and all other orders herein appealed from and not mentioned above, if any, are affirmed.

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1928.

1. Principal and agent 🔑123(11)—Evidence held to show person to whom plaintiff paid rent money and who absconded with it was defendant's agent to lease (Civ. Code, §§ 2316, 2317).

In action against property owners for money had and received which plaintiff had given to a third person as agent for defendants as rental money for certain property and with which agent had absconded, evidence held to show third person was defendant's agent for leasing purposes, having actual authority as defined by Civ. Code, § 2316, or ostensible authority, under section 2317, and hence loss should fall on defendants.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Morris M. Rudelson against P. B. Paules and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. P. B. Paules and Max Hartfield, appellants, were, and for some months before the earliest contract considered herein had been, the owners of the real property which furnishes the basis of the action in which judgment for respondent was rendered.

Prior to June 23, 1923, Morris M. Rudelson, respondent, was occupying as a tenant of appellants a room of the building erected on said real property in which he conducted a market. Some time prior to June 23, 1923, appellants had decided to construct a new building on said real property. Accordingly the old building was destroyed and removed from the lot to make room for said contemplated new structure. Grant McCartney was a real estate broker and promoter, doing business under the firm name of Grant McCartney Company. On June 22, 1923, appellants and Grant McCartney Company entered into a contract, of which the following are the pertinent provisions:

> "We hereby agree that if we enter into a written agreement with Mr. L. A. Smith or any of his associates, or if you furnish us with any other parties with whom we enter into an agreement for the building and financing of a building on our property at the southwest corner of Temple and Broadway, Los Angeles, to make you our exclusive agents for negotiating the original leases for said entire building. * * * In the event said building is not built or financed by Mr. L. A. Smith or his associates or any other parties furnished by you, we are to be under no obligations to carry out this contract."

Ten days thereafter, to wit, July 2, 1923, Grant McCartney Company and respondent Rudelson entered into the following contract:

> "Received of Morris Rudelson $2,000, being deposit on five-year lease at the rate of $1,000 per month, on property owned by Messrs. Hartfield & Paules, at the southwest corner of Temple and Broadway, Los Angeles, Cal., described as follows: [Here follows description of same property described in first contract.]

"It is hereby agreed that Mr. Rudelson will deposit with owners of said property $4,000 more, upon completion of building, and "It is further agreed he will receive 7 per cent. per annum on $5,000 of said deposit, including $2,000 received this date, same to be held as security for said lease.

"This agreement subject to approval of owners."

Respondent did not at any time have knowledge of the limitation placed upon the Grant McCartney Company by the contract of June 22, 1923. Being desirous of remaining at his old location, respondent, upon suggestion of appellants, visited them on June 29 for the purpose of agreeing upon terms on which he would occupy a room in said reconstructed building. Upon this last visit appellants informed respondent that they could not talk business with him as to lease terms, inasmuch as they had turned over the entire matter of leasing said rooms to their agent, Grant McCartney. Respondent was advised to take the matter up with Grant McCartney, and this advice eventuated in the lease or contract made July 2, 1923, between respondent and Grant McCartney Company. Respondent paid to Grant McCartney Company the sum of $2,000 as acknowledged in said lease and contract, and thereafter said Grant McCartney absconded with said funds. Respondent brought an action for money had and received in the court below, and recovered a judgment against appellants. The point is made by them that Grant McCartney had no authority from them to make the contract entered into by Grant McCartney Company, and respondent, and therefore, it could in no way bind them. It is true that the financing and leasing contract made by appellants and Grant McCartney Company did not upon its face authorize Grant McCartney Company to bind appellants to the terms of the contract entered into by the former with respondent, and if this was all there was to the case we would be compelled to reverse the judgment.

While the testimony of the respondent was flatly contradicted by evidence offered by appellants, it was sufficient, if credited by the court, to compel us to affirm the judgment. In addition to the testimony of the respondent as above pointed out, there are some circumstances which tend to corroborate respondent's testimony. He testified that at the time he visited appellants and they directed him to the Grant McCartney Company they telephoned to said company in advance that respondent would call upon said company and requested said company to give respondent's proposals full consideration as he was a former tenant. There was some slight corroboration of this evidence adduced by another witness. Another circumstance which gives support to respondent's contention that Grant McCartney Company was held out as the ostensible agent of appellants exists in the fact that during the period of negotiation between respondent and Grant McCartney Company there remained upon said premises a large and conspicuous sign placed there by Grant McCartney, bearing the following words:

"Exclusive Agents.
"Grant McCartney Co.
"Pico 302
"Main Office
"937–939 Merchants' Nat. Bank Bldg.
"Will Lease:
"Hotel Roof Garden
"Drug Store Restaurant
"Market Florist
"Bank Barber Shop
"Or Any Other Suitable Business."

Appellants had knowledge that said sign was upon their premises. Respondent had also observed it, and it could have had no other effect upon him than to confirm him in the belief that Grant McCartney Company was fully authorized to contract with persons who desired to become tenants of the building proposed to be constructed.

We are of the opinion that the record contains evidence sufficient to conclude appellants under either of the two following sections of the Civil Code:

"2316. Actual authority is such as a principal intentionally confers upon the agent, or intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, allows the agent to believe himself to possess.

"2317. Ostensible authority is such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess."

[1, 2] What we mean to say is that the positive testimony of the respondent, which was credited by the court, supports the theory of actual authority; also the acts of appellants, support the theory of ostensible authority conferred upon the agent, Grant McCartney Company.

Appellants contend that the findings of fact are inconsistent with themselves and contradictory, and, further, that the probative and ultimate facts are in conflict and in such cases the ultimate facts control. We think no serious conflict exists in the instant case. The term "agent" where used is interchangeable with "principal," inasmuch as the act of the agent was the act of the principal. If, however, the probative facts upon which the ultimate fact must rest lead to a conclusion repugnant to the ultimate fact, the latter must be held to be invalidated by the former. Hammond Lumber Co. v. Barth Investment Corporation (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 29; 24 Cal. Jur. 972.

The material findings are supported by the evidence, and we find no substantial reason for a reversal of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

FAUCETT v. RIVEROLL et al. (L. A. 9128.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 25, 1928.

1. Pleading ⚷72—Prayer for relief must be considered as a whole in determining extent of relief demanded.

In determining character and extent of relief demanded, prayer for relief in complaint must be considered and construed as a whole.

2. Liens ⚷22—Plaintiff, filling in lots for defendant, had right to recover debt in personal action, as well as by foreclosing lien (Code Civ. Proc. § 1197).

Where complaint alleged that work and labor in grading streets and filling in lots was performed for several defendants, plaintiff had right to recover amount of debt by personal action against one person for whom work was performed, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1197, independent of right of action to foreclose lien.

3. Judgment ⚷101(2)—Prayer for judgment for amount of debt and foreclosure of lien for filling in lots, and deficiency judgment, held to authorize default judgment against defendant for full amount of debt (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 580, 1197).

Complaint to recover balance due for grading streets and filling in lots, and to foreclose lien on land, with prayer for judgment against defendants for amount of debt, with interest and costs, and for the sale of land to satisfy lien and deficiency judgment, held to authorize entry of default judgment against one defendant for full amount of debt, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 580, 1197, since prayer for judgment was not restricted by demand for amount of deficiency.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by S. Y. Faucett against E. Riveroll, the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, and others. From a judgment entered against it, defendant Bank appeals. Affirmed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt and Arthur F. Coe, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. R. Jaffray, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Action to recover the balance due for grading streets, filling in certain lots, and removing earth from others in a tract of land in the city of Beverly Hills, in the county of Los Angeles, and to foreclose a lien upon said tract of land for said unpaid balance. The prayer of the complaint was as follows:

> "Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against defendants for the sum of $5,357.70, with interest from January 28, 1925, and costs; that said sum be declared to be a lien upon the lands heretofore mentioned; that said lands may be ordered sold to satisfy such lien, and that the proceeds may be applied to the costs of sale and upon such judgment; that a deficiency judgment may be entered against defendants for the amount of the judgment not satisfied by such sale; and for all other equitable relief in the premises."

The summons was served upon the defendant Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, and said defendant failed to answer. Thereupon its default for failure to answer was regularly entered. The action came on regularly for hearing, and the plaintiff dismissed the same as to all defendants, except the defendant Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank. Judgment was thereupon entered against said last-named defendant for said sum of $5,357.70, together with interest thereon and costs. From this judgment the said defendant has appealed.

On this appeal appellant contends that the court had no power or authority to enter the judgment which it did in this action against appellant upon its default. Appellant claims that such a judgment is not permissible or warranted by section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

> "The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint; but in any other case, the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue."

[1-3] It is defendant's position that the judgment in this action exceeds the prayer of the complaint, in that, as claimed by appellant, the prayer of the complaint only asks for a deficiency judgment against appellant, after the sale of the premises described in the complaint to satisfy the lien claimed by the plaintiff against said premises, while the judgment rendered was a personal judgment against appellant for the full amount of plaintiff's demand. We are not able to acquiesce in this construction of the prayer of the complaint. By reference to it, as it appears above, it will be noted that the plaintiff therein expressly "prays judgment against defendants for the sum of $5,357.70." While the prayer further asks that the sum be declared to be a lien upon said real property, for a sale of the premises, and a deficiency judgment against said defendants for the amount of the judgment not satisfied by such sale, this subsequent portion of the prayer cannot be taken as any limitation upon that portion of the prayer preceding it. The prayer must be considered and construed as a whole, and as so considered and construed the relief demanded therein was sufficiently broad to include a personal judgment against appellant. The complaint alleges that the work and labor mentioned therein was performed for all the defendants, including the appellant. A personal action, therefore, would lie against the appellant to recover the debt sued for, independent of his right of action to foreclose a lien therefor. Code Civ. Proc. § 1197.

Appellant has cited a number of authorities in support of its position, with none of which do we differ. They do not, however, apply to the facts in this case. It claims that the case of Olcott v. Kohlsaat, 55 Hun, 607, 8 N. Y. S. 117,[1] is exactly like the one under consideration. It is more like the present action than any other cited by it, but we think it fails in an important respect to present a state of facts like those in the present action. In the case referred to, quoting from its syllabus, which defendant relies upon to support his contention:

> "A complaint, in an action to enforce a lien on a bond held as collateral security, demanded a sale of the debtor's interest in the bond, and a deficiency judgment, but did not demand a judgment for the debt. Held, under Code Civ. Proc. N. Y § 1207, providing that where there is no answer, plaintiff can recover no other or different judgment than is demanded in the complaint, that a judgment against the debtor for the amount of the debt was unauthorized."

It will be seen in that action that there was not, as there was in the present action, any demand for a personal judgment against the defendant. This fact differentiates it from the present action, and renders it, as an authority in appellant's behalf, of no value. The relief granted by the judgment in the present action did not exceed that demanded in the prayer of the complaint.

The judgment, therefore, is valid and binding upon appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

BOURN v. KIDD et al. (L. A. 9219.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1928.

Quieting title ⊂⊃44(4)—Evidence held to support findings that plaintiff was owner in fee of property in dispute in suit to quiet title.

In suit to quiet title to real property, evidence held sufficient to support findings that plaintiff was the owner in fee of the realty acquired at sale under execution against party to whom defendant had conveyed apparently to defeat plaintiff's claim.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action to quiet title by T. J. Bourn against James K. Kidd, sometimes known as the J. K. Kidd Company, John E. Kidd and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and John E. Kidd appeals. Affirmed.

Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for appellant.

Clarke & Bowker, of Los Angeles, and Robert M. Sheridan, of Ventura, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Action to quiet title to certain real property described in the complaint. The plaintiff's title to said real property was acquired at a sale under execution under a money judgment in his favor and against the defendant James K. Kidd. The record title to said real property at the date of said execution sale stood in the name of John E. Kidd. At the trial it was the plaintiff's contention that said defendant James K. Kidd was at the date of said execution sale the owner of said real property, and that by virtue of said sale he (the said plaintiff) became the owner thereof. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff and entered judgment in his favor as prayed for. The defendant James K. Kidd, though served with summons, made no appearance in said action, and judgment was taken against him by default. The defendant John E. Kidd appeared by answer in said action and denied the allegations of the complaint. He has appealed from the judgment entered against him, and is the sole appellant.

The evidence as to the ownership of said real property at the time of said execution sale, and whether it was the property of James K. Kidd or of the appellant John E. Kidd was conflicting, and the trial court, in a brief but careful review of said evidence at the close of the trial, which is set out in full in the record, held that the weight thereof was in favor of plaintiff, and accordingly made findings in plaintiff's favor. Appellant now contends that this evidence was insufficient to support the court's findings, in that it only shows, if it proves anything, that the defendant James K. Kidd at the time of the execution sale owned an equitable interest only in said real property, while the legal title then stood in the name of John E. Kidd. Therefore appellant contends all that plaintiff acquired at said execution sale, if he acquired anything, was an equitable interest in said real property, and that an action to quiet title will not lie in favor of the holder of an equitable title as against the owner of the legal title, citing Buchner v. Malloy, 155 Cal. 253, 100 P. 687; Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 384, 108 P. 278; Burns v. Ross, 190 Cal. 269, 212 P. 17.

Conceding appellant is correct in his legal contention, we are of the opinion that he has misconceived the purport of the evidence in the case. The evidence was to the effect, not only that defendant James K. Kidd had the title to said real property taken in appellant's name, presumably for the purpose of defeating plaintiff's claim for which he had been given judgment against James K.

Kidd, but that thereafter the appellant had made a deed to said real property in favor of James K. Kidd, by virtue of which the latter became and was at the date of said execution sale the legal owner of said real property, and it was this interest which plaintiff acquired at said sale. While this deed was not produced, there was evidence that appellant had admitted that he had made such a deed and delivered it to James K. Kidd. The evidence further showed that James K. Kidd exercised exclusive control and management of the property, collecting all revenues therefrom, and paying all taxes and other expenses incurred in the care and preservation thereof, even to insuring the buildings on said real property in his own name, and upon the destruction of said buildings by fire collecting the insurance thereon and appropriating the proceeds thereof to his own use, without any objection or protest on the part of appellant and without any demand or request for any accounting of said proceeds. The evidence was sufficient to support the findings that plaintiff was the owner in fee of said real property, and that it was not true that defendant John E. Kidd was the owner thereof.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ralph H. Clock, Judge.

Suit by Flora M. Caldwell against Henry E. Weiner, executor of the estate of Henry C. Weiner, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in District Court of Appeal, 258 P. 125.

N. B. Nelson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Redwine & Redwine, and H. G. Redwine, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendant in a suit brought on a rejected claim filed against the estate of the deceased, Henry C. Weiner.

The complaint alleges:

"That on or about the month of November, 1919, at Los Angeles, Cal., the plaintiff herein and Henry C. Weiner, now deceased, entered into an agreement whereby this plaintiff was to furnish said decedent, Henry C. Weiner, with a home during his lifetime, including room, such meals as he should desire or request, to care and nurse him when he was ill or indisposed, and to take him into her home and treat him as one of her family, and as compensation therefor said decedent, Henry C. Weiner, promised and agreed to pay this plaintiff the sum of $25 per month for his room rent, and, in addition thereto, promised and agreed to pay this plaintiff the amount of a mortgage then upon her home, namely, a mortgage in the sum of $6,000, as soon as he should sell a certain piece and parcel of land then owned by him and which was located near the city of Long Beach, county of Los Angeles, state of California; that immediately upon the making of said agreement, the said decedent, Henry C. Weiner, came to plaintiff's home to live and make his home, and that he resided with plaintiff and her family continuously up to the time of his death, excepting therefrom short periods of time when he made occasional visits out of the city of Los Angeles; that during all of the said time that said decedent lived with plaintiff and her family, this plaintiff and her family provided a home for said decedent, and treated him in all respects as one of her family, furnished him with room, such meals as he requested or desired, did some of his laundry, nursed and cared for him while he was ill or indisposed, and in all things looked after his welfare and comfort at all times, to the best of her ability; that this plaintiff has fully performed all of the conditions of said contract on her part to be performed; that on or about the month of March, 1922, said decedent, Henry C. Weiner, sold the said parcel of land owned by him in or near the city of Long Beach; that said sum of $6,000, nor any part thereof, has not been paid."

The answer denies the foregoing alleged agreement, except it is alleged by defendant that:

"Henry C. Weiner did promise and agree to pay plaintiff the sum of $25 per month and no other sum or amount, for the rent of a room in plaintiff's residence, and for no other purpose."

The court found the following facts:

"That it is not true that on or about the month of November, 1919, or at any other time, at Los Angeles, Cal., or elsewhere, the plaintiff and Henry C. Weiner, now deceased, entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiff was to furnish said Henry C. Weiner with a home during his lifetime, including room, such meals as he should desire or request, to care for and nurse him when he was ill or indisposed, and to take him into her home and treat him as one of the plaintiff's family; and that it is not true that said Henry C. Weiner promised and agreed to pay the plaintiff the amount of a mortgage then upon her home in the sum of $6,000, or any other sum, as soon as he should sell a certain parcel of land owned by him and which was located near the city of Long Beach, Cal., or at any other time; that it is not true that said Henry C. Weiner ever at any time promised and agreed to pay plaintiff the said sum of $6,000, or any other sum, at any time or in any manner, except the sum of $25 a month for his room rent, and that the only promise which said deceased made to pay plaintiff any sum of money was to pay her the sum of $25 per month for his room rent, and this sum was paid by him to plaintiff, and that all the averments and allegations of paragraph No. 1 of the complaint herein are untrue; that all the allegations and denials of the answer herein are true and all the allegations of the complaint herein are untrue."

[1, 2] The appeal is based upon an argument that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision of the court. It is contended that the defendant did not submit any direct evidence to justify the findings made, but in this contention appellant overlooks the fact that the plaintiff has the burden of proof in the trial court and the burden of showing error upon appeal. The testimony as to the making of the alleged contract is very unsatisfactory and largely inferential, the strongest testimony being given by plaintiff's daughter. While, as is argued by appellant, the testimony is not inherently improbable, it is greatly weakened by the circumstance that plaintiff did not seek to enforce her claim for the nine months after the sale of the property out of which she alleges her mortgage was to be paid, during which decedent was alive, and that decedent left her home and traveled across the continent and remained there for several months before his death without an adjustment of this matter.

[3] It would seem that this case, with all the circumstances appearing in the record, comes within the rule of Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 141 P. 217, and Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 P. 147, to the effect that while it is a general rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted by the court as proof of the fact, this rule has its exceptions, and the most positive testimony may be contradicted by the circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter which satisfy the court of its falsity and the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 27, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 26, 1928.

1. Sales ⚷476—Saleswoman held entitled to possession of automobile under contract, where she had paid sum in excess of monthly installments, though not each month.

In action for conversion of automobile where saleswoman had entered into contract with employer whereby employer agreed to advance money for purchase of automobile, and saleswoman agreed to pay $35 per month, and she was permitted to make payments exceeding $35 per month, and at end of eight months, having paid in $340, employer possessed self of car, claiming that she was in default and was obligated to pay $35 per month, despite fact that more was paid in some months, held that, under contract, saleswoman was entitled to possession of automobile.

2. Sales ⚷479(6)—In possessory action for automobile, where plaintiff had lawful possession, questions of equitable title and estoppel to deny defendant's ownership held premature.

In pure possessory action by plaintiff for conversion of automobile repossessed by defendant, where plaintiff was not in default and therefore in lawful possession, question of whether defendants had equitable title, or whether plaintiff was estopped to deny that defendant was legal owner, held premature and immaterial.

3. Sales ⚷479(7)—Evidence held to justify finding that car purchased by plaintiff was new car, contrary to defendant's contention.

In action for conversion of automobile, where defendant contended that plaintiff fraudulently used money advanced by them for purchase of new automobile, and one they took was secondhand, evidence held to justify court's finding that car purchased was new.

4. Sales ⚷476—Saleswoman purchasing automobile under agreement that title remain in employer until she made payments in installments, held not under obligation to register car in employer's name.

Where saleswoman, advanced money for purchase of automobile by employer under agreement that she pay money back in monthly installments, and that title remain in employer until payments were made, did not register automobile in name of employer, and, although saleswoman was not in default, employer repossessed self of car, held, that there was no obligation on plaintiff to register car in name of defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Frances D. Webb against M. J. Brandenstein & Company and others for damages for conversion of an automobile. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ernest M. Torchia, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

C. H. Hartke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages for conversion of an automobile. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff against the defendants M. J. Brandenstein & Co., a copartnership, and M. J. Brandenstein, Edward Brandenstein, and Manford Brandenstein only for the sum of $600. These defendants appeal from the judgment.

On or about August 5, 1921, the defendants M. J. Brandenstein & Co. (herein called the company) and the plaintiff (who was then in their employ as a coffee saleswoman) entered into the following agreement:

"Agreement.

"Agreement between M. J. Brandenstein & Co., San Francisco, Cal., party of the first part, and herein called company, and Mrs. Frances D. Webb, Los Angeles, Cal., party of the second part, witnesseth:

"Whereas, said Frances D. Webb was advanced the sum of eight hundred forty-five and 74/100 dollars ($845.74) toward the purchase of a new 1921 Ford coupe, numbered 5146917;

"And whereas, said Frances D. Webb desired to purchase the above automobile from said company for the sum of eight hundred forty-five and 74/100 dollars ($845.74):

"Now, therefore, it is agreed between the parties herewith as follows:

"Said company agrees to sell to said Frances D. Webb and said Frances D. Webb agrees to purchase said automobile and accessories for the sum of eight hundred forty-five and 74/100 dollars ($845.74), payable as follows: In monthly payments of thirty-five dollars each; said sum of thirty-five dollars ($35.00) to be deducted from salary check on the end of every month, commencing with August 31, 1921, while said Frances D. Webb remains in the employ of said company, and until entirely paid up.

"In addition to said purchase price, said Frances D. Webb agrees to pay for all accessories for said automobile during its life and to pay for all insurance thereon. Upon payment in full of said purchase price and all sums of money which may be due from said Frances D. Webb to said company for insurance, etc., the title to said automobile shall vest absolutely in said Frances D. Webb, but until the payment of such sums of money as aforesaid, the title to said automobile shall remain in and be the property of said company.

"If said Frances D. Webb desires to pay the balance of said purchase price prior to the expiration of this agreement, the company hereby grants such privilege, and upon the payment in full of any balance due the company, the automobile will become the property of said Frances D. Webb.

"Executed in duplicate this fifth day of August, nineteen hundred and twenty-one.

"M. J. Brandenstein & Co.,
"By Mignacco.
"Frances D. Webb."

The whole question on this appeal is: Was the plaintiff in default under the terms of this agreement at the time defendants took the automobile? The plaintiff was discharged from the employment of the company in December, 1921, at which time she was handed a statement of her account with the company, which was introduced in evidence, as follows:

"Frances D. Webb Auto.

She retained possession of the car thereafter and used it in her own affairs until February, 1922, when, after an accident, she left it in the repair department of the Dunham Agency, where the defendant company found and took possession of it, claiming the right to do so under the terms of the contract.

Appellants contend that at this time plaintiff was in default. The trial court found that the plaintiff had been in the lawful possession of said automobile during the entire period from August 5, 1921, up to and including March 18, 1922. There is no specification that this finding is not supported by the evidence, and we might feel justified in declining to consider it except that its determination may dispose of most if not all of appellants' other contentions.

[1] Appellants argue that the proper construction of the contract is that plaintiff was obliged to pay $35 each month, regardless of whether she paid more in any one month. Respondent's contention is that she was only chargeable with $35 each month, starting August 31, 1921; that the car was taken by the appellant company March 18, 1922; and that the total amount of the payments made by her to March 18, 1922, was $340. The court examined the plaintiff about the circumstances of the months when she paid more than $35:

"The Court: Let me see that statement. 'August 9;' 'August 15, $72.50; August 31, $27.50; August 31, $35; August 31, $35;' three payments on August 31st, how did that occur? A. I had $135 coming to me in August.

"Q. And you told them to apply all of that on the machine? A. Yes.

"Q. What about the November 30th, $62.50; how did they happen to credit that, instead of $35? A. On December 1st I was discharged. I had that amount of salary coming to me, and I allowed them to apply that on the automobile account.

"Q. That is, you had $62.50 coming to you as salary? A. Yes.

"Q. And you told them to apply that? A. Yes."

There was also conflicting evidence as to whether plaintiff should be charged with certain items of insurance before she had completed the payments on the car. Plaintiff introduced a letter from appellants to respondent as follows:

"These two policies the total premium charged to you amount to $126.25 will be paid in the course of the next month, and we shall charge it to your automobile account and will be deducted from your salary check after you have cleared off the indebtedness now shown there for the purchase of this machine. We trust that our explanation of the manner in which these forms of insurance operate will be fully understood by you and that you advise us in the near future which feature of collision you wish to carry."

The court found in favor of plaintiff and respondent, and construed the contract accordingly, and we think correctly.

[2] It seems unnecessary to discuss at length other contentions of appellants. The only question presented on this appeal is the right of the plaintiff to immediate possession of the automobile at the time of the commencement of the action. The action is purely a possessory action, and if the plaintiff was not in default under the agreement, and therefore in lawful possession or entitled to possession of the automobile, the question of whether appellants had the equitable title or whether the plaintiff is estopped to deny that the company was the legal owner as urged by appellants are premature and immaterial here. 5 Cal. Jur. 5, p. 163, and cases cited.

[3] Appellants contend that there was fraud on the part of respondent in that the money to purchase the automobile was advanced by the company to plaintiff to buy a new automobile and the one they took was a secondhand one. This contention appears not to affect the question whether appellants had the right to the possession of the car; but, aside from the question of whether appellants had the right to raise this question until respondent was in default, again the evidence justifies the court's finding:

"Q. Did you purchase an automobile? A. I did.

"Q. From whom did you purchase it? A. Dunham Agency; the Ford Dunham Agency.

"The Court: You bought this car new, did you? A. Yes."

The registration certificate in evidence, dated August 4, 1921, shows: "Make—Ford.

Engine No. 5146917"—the same as in the agreement.

[4] The only other specification of error by appellants is as follows:

> "Second. That the plaintiff cannot take advantage of her own fraud in not registering the automobile in the name of M. J. Brandenstein & Co. as the legal owners."

The mere statement of this proposition is its own refutation. Aside from the fact that there is no fraud shown, as long as plaintiff was not in default, we find nothing in the contract obliging plaintiff to so register it.

[5] Finally, appellants complain that the court made no finding on the affirmative defense. This was in substance that respondent was in default in her payments when the car was taken. No additional finding on this was necessary. Adams v. Anthony, 178 Cal. 158, 172 P. 593; Los Angeles Furniture Co. v. Hansen, 46 Cal. App. 5, 188 P. 292; Rogers Lamb Co. v. All the findings and all the facts must be considered as to whether they support the judgment; it being insufficient to examine only one finding.

2. Estoppel ⚷105—Defendant was not estopped from denying his connection with partnership, in view of court's finding that he had no connection with it.

In action against defendants as individuals and as copartners doing business under a firm name, defendant in whose favor costs were adjudged as against plaintiffs was not estopped to deny his connection with the partnership, in view of court's finding that he was not engaged with other defendants in a joint venture.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. I. Short, Judge.

Action by B. W. Hulsman and another, copartners doing business under the style and firm name of the Market Company, against Louis E. Ireland and others, individually and as copartners doing business under the style and firm name of Tubells Company. Judgment for plaintiffs against certain defendants, and from the judgment for costs in favor of Rufus W. Russell, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. W. Morin, of Pasadena, for respondents.

VALENTINE, Justice pro tem. In this action judgment for $7,912.76 was rendered for plaintiffs and appellants against the defendants Ireland and Mrs. Elizabeth B. Russell, and in favor of defendant Rufus W. Russell against the plaintiffs for costs. The appeal was originally taken by plaintiffs by mistake from the whole of the judgment, but was dismissed as against the defendants Ireland and Mrs. Russell, so that the present appeal is only from the judgment for costs in favor of defendant Rufus W. Russell against the plaintiff.

The action was brought by plaintiffs against all three defendants, who are alleged to be copartners doing business under the style and firm name of Tubells Company, for goods sold to Tubells Company. The answer of defendant Rufus W. Russell, among other things, denies that he was a partner of or with defendants Louis E. Ireland and Mrs. Elizabeth B. Russell in any business whatsoever, or at all, and this is the main question attempted to be raised by appellants on this appeal.

In appellants' own words, this appeal is not on the ground that the evidence does not support the findings, but upon the ground that the facts found by the court do not sustain the judgment rendered in favor of defendant Rufus W. Russell, but do support a judgment in favor of plaintiffs as against said defendant. Therefore we must accept the findings of fact as true. The facts as found are stated later.

Appellants' opening brief contains no specifications or assignments of error, but merely a general expression of the views of appellants' counsel, ending with the somewhat naive comment:

> "We have not been able to find any authority on the subject, but believe we are correct on principle as well as in equity, and if that be so, then the judgment of the lower court eliminating Mr. Russell from the judgment obtained by plaintiffs is erroneous and the same should be reversed."

But in his closing brief appellants' counsel remarks:

> "The law applicable to the facts found is elementary and no citation of authorities is necessary."

Whatever may be our mental reactions as to whether counsel for appellants is correct on principle as well as in equity, before reversing the trial court's judgment as counsel suggests, we feel constrained to first examine into whether that judgment is sustained by the findings. The judgment after the usual recitals as to evidence, etc., is short, and we quote it in full:

---

> "Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiffs do have and recover of and from defendants Louis E. Ireland and Elizabeth B. Russell, individually and as copartners doing business under the style and firm name of Tubells Company, the sum of $7,912.76, together with their costs and disbursements incurred herein, taxed at the sum of $———.
> "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that defendant Rufus W. Russell do have and recover of plaintiffs his costs and disbursements incurred herein, taxed at $7.
> "Done in open court this 1st day of December, 1923."

The findings are long, and we deem it unnecessary under the circumstances to quote them in full, referring only to those portions which are material.

Counsel for appellants in his closing brief, under the heading "Points and Authorities," advances four propositions, which are as follows:

> "I. The facts found in finding 7 warrant a judgment in favor of plaintiffs against the defendant Rufus W. Russell.
> "II. Rufus W. Russell by his conduct in allowing the $12,000 of community property to go in, and remain in, the business known as Tubells Company, thereby engaged in a joint venture with Ireland and Elizabeth B. Russell, and, as to plaintiffs, is estopped to deny his connection with the partnership.
> "III. However innocent of intention to do wrong the conduct of Rufus W. Russell may have been, he is, nevertheless, liable to the plaintiffs.
> "IV. The authorities upon which respondent seems to rely do not touch the question presented in this appeal."

[1, 2] As to No. I, it is not sufficient to examine only one finding. All the findings and all the facts must be considered as to whether they support the judgment. No. II assumes facts directly contrary to those found. No. III also assumes facts and conclusions directly opposed to those found by the trial court. As to No. IV, counsel for appellants in his argument states:

> "The authorities cited by respondent, on his page 6, have no application on this appeal; they may be conceded as correctly stating the law as to partnership applicable to the facts involved in those cases. The case at bar, however, does not so much involve the question whether defendants were in fact partners, as it does the question whether defendant Rufus W. Russell is not estopped to deny that his money constituted one-half the capital of the concern. * * *"

Counsel appears to forget that one of his main contentions in the case at bar is that defendant Rufus W. Russell was in fact a partner of the other defendants. It is difficult to see how defendant Russell can be estopped from denying facts which the court has found were not facts.

We think it unnecessary to discuss appellants' arguments further. We have departed from the rule and have voluntarily done a great deal of work on this appeal which should have been done, and undoubtedly would have been done, by counsel if counsel for appellants had followed the rules and cited his points and authorities in his opening brief. We have done this upon the assumption that counsel was derelict in this respect because of ignorance of the rules, and not for any other reason. 2 Cal. Jur. 415 et seq.; Bell v. Germain, 12 Cal. App. 375, 107 P. 630.

Judgment affirmed.

CRAIG, Acting P. J., and THOMPSON, J. We concur in the conclusion, but are of the opinion that where the specifications of error are insufficient we should not assume the burden of the labor which rightly rests upon the shoulders of counsel.

Reading in evidence deposition of witness after insufficient foundation upon which to base discretion exercised by trial judge in admitting evidence, even assuming it to be error, held of no importance, where defendant had confessed practically all facts to which such witness testified and companion of absent witness fully corroborated his testimony.

4. Robbery 🔑9—Knocking strong box from under arm of victim and grabbing and running with it held robbery within meaning of statute (Pen. Code, § 211).

Where accused attempted twice to knock strong box from under arm of victim and succeeded in second attempt and grabbed box and ran away with it, and victim then pursued and overtook accused and held him until taken into custody, held that this was "robbery" as defined by Pen. Code, § 211.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Robbery.]

5. Robbery 🔑9—Refusal to instruct that in order to find accused guilty of robbery jury must believe that accused took box by means of force and fear caused by dangerous weapon held not error (Pen. Code, § 211).

Refusal to instruct in prosecution for robbery that before you can find accused guilty of robbery you must believe from all evidence that accused did take box by means of force and fear, and that such fear must have been real, direct, and caused by means of dangerous weapon, held not error, since Pen. Code, § 211, is silent as to method which may be employed by robber in committing crime by which he exerts force upon or produces fear in victim.

6. Criminal law 🔑829(3)—Refusal of requested instruction in prosecution for robbery held not error, where given instruction adequately protected rights of accused.

Refusal to instruct in prosecution for robbery that jury must acquit defendant if it did not believe that he took box from victim by force and fear caused by use of dangerous weapon held not error, where jury was instructed in effect that if it believed from evidence beyond reasonable doubt that by means of force and fear and against consent of victim that defendant feloniously took from such person or from his immediatee presence property the jury should find defendant guilty, since defeidant was in no wise harmed by refusal of requested instruction.

7. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Inflammatory remarks by prosecutor held not reversible error under Constitution where evidence showed guilt, since there was no miscarriage of justice (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for robbery, where district attorney in argument to jury termed accused potential murderer and arch criminal and referred to him as perjurer, held that such argument was not reversible error under Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that notwithstanding error as to matter of procedure judgment shall not be set aside unless examination of entire cause, including evidence, shows that there has been miscarriage of justice since evidence unquestionably showed guilt of defendant.

8. Criminal law 🔑720(6)—Facts portrayed by evidence, together with proper inferences, constitute sole basis for legitimate argument of prosecutor.

Facts as produced by evidence, together with proper inferences deducible therefrom, constitute sole basis for legitimate argument of prosecutor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

James Allen Clayton was convicted of robbery and of driving an automobile without consent of the owner, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Groene, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction, as well as from an order denying his motion for a new trial, as to each of six counts in an information in which he was charged with the crime of robbery and as to each of two counts therein in which he was charged with feloniously driving an automobile in the absence and without the consent of the owner.

The first point advanced by appellant is that prejudicial error was committed in that the action was not brought to trial within 60 days after the information was filed against defendant.

Subdivision 2 of section 1382 of the Penal Code provides in effect that, unless good cause to the contrary be shown, the trial court must order an action dismissed "if a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the * * * filing of the information." Briefly, the facts relating to the proceedings in the action preceding the trial were that on April 25, 1927, defendant was arraigned for plea, and at that time, on motion of defendant, was given until April 28th to plead to the information against him, which time to plead was from time to time postponed until May 9th, when defendant entered his plea of not guilty, and the trial was then set for June 20th, which date was 59 days after the information was filed. On June 20th counsel for defendant was engaged in the trial of an action in a department of the superior court other than that in which the action against defendant was pending, but nevertheless in the case against defendant appeared in open court, objected to a postponement of the trial, and announced that probably in the afternoon of that day, or on the day following, he would be ready to proceed with the trial. Defendant personally also objected to a continuance, and stated that he was willing to proceed with the trial in the absence of his attorney. It further appeared that one of the victims of one of the robberies with which defendant was charged was confined to his bed, either through illness or by reason of his observance of some religious rite in connection with the recent death of his wife, and that the trial court on that day was "already engaged in a trial," and, as stated by the trial judge, there was no "possibility of having it (defendant's case) tried to-day; we haven't any place to try it." Thereupon, the trial of the action against defendant was postponed by the court until June 27th, at which time, over the objection of defendant, and in opposition to his motion for dismissal of the action, it went to trial.

As hereinbefore set forth, the statute (subdivision 2, § 1382, Pen. Code) requires a dismissal of an action not brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information, only in the event that no good cause to the contrary be made to appear.

In the case of People v. Benc, 130 Cal. 159, 62 P. 404, it is held that where the reason for not bringing the case to trial within the 60-day period is that the trial court is engaged in the trial of another action, "good cause" is shown. To the same effect are: People v. Henry, 77 Cal. 445, 19 P. 830; People v. Camilo, 69 Cal. 540, 11 P. 128; People v. Vasalo, 120 Cal. 168, 52 P. 305; Murphy v. Superior Court, 53 Cal. App. 6, 200 P. 483.

[1] When, in addition to the fact that on the day set for the trial of the action against defendant the trial court was "already engaged in a trial," it is considered that one of the principal witnesses for the prosecution was confined to his bed, and that the attorney representing defendant was engaged in the trial of another action with no certainty of being released therefrom until the day following the date on which the trial in defendant's case had been set, it becomes clear that the condition of "good cause" required by the statute before the time of trial might be extended beyond the 60-day period was "shown," and that as a result therefrom the judge of the trial court was justified in ordering the postponement of the trial, to which objection is here made.

[2] It is further contended by appellant that error was committed by the trial court in permitting to be read in evidence at the trial the testimony given by certain witnesses at the preliminary hearing in the justice court.

Subdivision 3, of section 686 of the Penal Code, provides, in part, that:

> "In a criminal action the defendant is entitled: * * *
> "3. To produce witnesses on his behalf and to be confronted with the witnesses against him, in the presence of the court, except that where the charge has been preliminarily examined before a committing magistrate and the testimony taken down by question and answer in the presence of the defendant, * * * the deposition of such witness may be read, upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he * * * cannot, with due diligence, be found within the state. * * *"

As a foundation for the admission of the evidence in question, it was shown that one of the absent witnesses was not a permanent resident of this state, and that within four or five weeks preceding the date of the trial in the superior court he had returned to his home in the city of Detroit, Mich. It also appeared from the testimony of the absent witness, given at the preliminary examination of defendant in the justice court, that at such time he was a visitor in the city of Los Angeles; that he was engaged in the real estate business in the city of Detroit; and that "in about six weeks" he expected to return to said city. The foundation laid by the prosecution for reading the testimony given by a second witness at the preliminary examination of defendant consisted of a showing that respective inquiries at the former place of employment of the witness, as well as at the place of her residence while she was temporarily living in Los Angeles, elicited the information that the witness had returned to her home in Arizona, and that letters which came addressed to the witness in Los Angeles were regularly forwarded to her at her home address in the state of Arizona.

In such circumstances, and especially in view of the rule that the determination of whether a sufficient foundation has been laid for the purpose of admitting testimony received at a preliminary hearing of a charge against a defendant lies largely within the discretion of the trial judge, it is clear that in the instant matter, so far as such witnesses are concerned, the ruling of which complaint is made cannot be disturbed by this court. People v. Caballero, 41 Cal. App. 146, 182 P. 321; People v. Padilla (Cal. App.) 254 P. 585; People v. Lederer, 17 Cal. App. 369, 119 P. 949; People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 421, 24 P. 1006; People v. Witty, 138 Cal. 576, 72 P. 177; People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574, 77 P. 467; People v. Plyler, 126 Cal. 379, 58 P. 904.

[3] As to a third witness, whose testimony given at the preliminary examination was read to the jury, the foundation for its introduction apparently consisted merely of a statement said to have been contained in a letter received by the prosecution from the sheriff of Kern county to the effect that the witness had departed from this state. As the letter is not made a part of the record on this appeal, this court has no ready means of determining whether any basis existed for the conclusion reached by the sheriff of Kern county that the witness either had ever departed from this state or that he was not within the state at the time the trial took place. While it may be that the evidence was insufficient as a foundation upon which to base the discretion exercised by the trial judge in admitting the evidence given by the witness at the preliminary examination of defendant, in view of defendant's confession wherein he admitted practically all the facts to which such witness testified, as well as the additional circumstance that a companion of the absent witness fully coroborated his testimony, the error (assuming it to be such) becomes of no importance, as undoubtedly without such evidence no conclusion other than the guilt of the defendant as to the count covered by such evidence could have been reached by the jury.

[4] As hereinbefore stated, in each of six counts of the information defendant was charged with the commission of the crime of robbery. With reference to count 1 of the information, the evidence in substance shows that the victim of the robbery was carrying under his arm a "strong box" containing $4.13 in cash. In answer to a question propounded by the district attorney to the witness as to how the box was taken from him by defendant, the witness replied:

> "Well; it was knocked out of my arm by two attempts. The first time it did not fall; I caught it with my left hand; but the second time it fell and as soon as it fell—it was all before I could recall what happened, almost—the man grabbed it and was running away from me."

The victim then pursued, overtook, and overpowered defendant and held him until he was taken into custody. Before the trial started in the superior court defendant moved the court to dismiss the action against him so far as count 1 was concerned, on the ground that at the preliminary hearing the evidence showed that grand larceny only had been committed, and not the crime of robbery. The motion was denied, and such ruling is here assigned as error.

By section 211 of the Penal Code robbery is defined as the "felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." It will be noted that to constitute the crime of robbery the elements of "force or fear" must be present. The attention of this court is directed to no evidence which would indicate that the crime was "accomplished by means of * * * fear"—the only question being as to whether the circumstances of the commission of the offense as hereinbefore set forth amounted to a "felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person, * * * by means of force. * * *"

In the case of Montsdoca v. State, 84 Fla. 82, 93 So. 157, 27 A. L. R. 1291, it is said:

> "The degree of force used is immaterial. All the force that is required to make the offense a robbery is such force as is actually sufficient to overcome the victim's resistance [citing cases]."

In People v. Campbell, 234 Ill. 391, 84 N. E. 1035, 123 Am. St. Rep. 107, 14 Ann. Cas. 186, the evidence showed that the defendant snatched a diamond stick-pin from the shirtfront of the complaining witness. It was held that where the article was so attached to the person or to his clothing as to necessitate resistance, however slight, in such circumstances the taking constituted robbery (citing authorities).

In Stockton v. Commonwealth, 125 Ky. 268, 101 S. W. 298, the syllabus is as follows:

> "The two defendants met the prosecuting witness, when one of them asked him if he could change a $10 bill, holding out his hand, containing some silver. When the prosecuting witness held out the bill to exchange for the silver, the other defendant snatched it out of his hand, and both defendants ran away. Held, that they were guilty of robbery."

In Brown v. Commonwealth, 135 Ky. 635, 117 S. W. 281, 21 Ann. Cas. 672, a part of the syllabus is as follows:

> "Evidence that one of defendants asked prosecutor for a dime with which to buy beer, and that, on the latter's drawing some money from his pocket, the other defendant suddenly and forcibly wrenched the money from prosecutor's hand, and fled with it, authorized a conviction for robbery, and an instruction on larceny was properly refused."

In view of the foregoing authorities, it must be held in the instant matter that the crime committed by defendant constituted robbery within the meaning of the statute.

[5] Appellant predicates further error in the trial of the action against defendant in that the following instruction requested by defendant was refused by the court:

> "The court further instructs the jury that before you can find defendant guilty of robbery under count 1 of the information, you must believe from all the evidence that defendant did take the tin box from the possession of L. R. Lueck by means of force and fear; that such force and fear must have been real and direct, and that such force and fear was caused by means of some dangerous weapon, and the mere fact that some time after the commission of said offense some weapon was found concealed among the clothes of defendant, is not sufficient in law upon which to base a charge of robbery against defendant. If the jury believe from the evidence that defendant did not use force or fear in the taking of the said tin box from said L. R. Lueck, you must then find defendant guilty of larceny only and fix the degree of larceny committed."

[6] Adverting to the language contained in section 211 of the Penal Code, it will be noted that the statute is silent as to the method which may be employed by the robber in committing the crime by which he either exerts force upon or produces fear in his victim. No authority is cited by appellant for including within the proposed instruction the proposition that in committing the crime of which defendant was specifically charged it was necessary that the force applied by defendant must have been "real and direct," and that it "was caused by means of some dangerous weapon." In some circumstances, such a construction of the statute might possibly relieve a defendant from conviction of robbery in the first degree where, for example, if the "weapon" should consist of a small toy pistol made of soft rubber, or some other equally harmless material. In such case the "force" might be neither "real" nor "direct," nor might such a "weapon" necessarily be "dangerous"; nevertheless, if by its use, the victim of the robbery were put in fear, it is probable that the offense defined in the statute would be committed. But aside from such considerations, which are sufficient justification for the refusal on the part of the trial court of the proposed instruction, the jury was instructed in effect that if it believed from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that by means of force or fear and against the will and consent of the victim of the robbery, the defendant feloniously took from such person or from his immediate presence the property described in the information—then the jury should find the defendant guilty, etc. It is therefore manifest that in any event the defendant was in no wise harmed by the refusal of his requested instruction in that regard.

Misconduct by the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution of the case is also urged by appellant as a ground for reversal of the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. It appears that, over the objection of defendant, with exception reserved by him to the ruling of the court thereon, the deputy district attorney, in part, made use of the following language in his argument to the jury:

> "This defendant, here, James Clayton, is the type of criminal—a potential murderer. * * * I wonder if you have ever seen a more cool, cold-blooded type of criminal than you have in this defendant. He sat on there in a nonchalant manner and committed willful and deliberate perjury, just the same as if he was going out to order a lunch; he thinks nothing of it—from your observation of this defendant—nothing about it at all. He will go out here, as the evidence shows, with a gun; he will even invade the sanctity of a home. * * * If you don't call this what you might term an arch criminal, I don't know where we are going to find an arch criminal. * * * This is a concocted and deliberate attempt at perjury. Talk about perjury, every statement out of that man's mouth, with the exception of his name, was perjury. * * * There is the type you are dealing with; there is the type. In order to keep this community safe, we should put such men in San Quentin and keep them there forever. * * * And we have here a man who is what you might term a wholesale criminal; not only what you might term, if there is such a thing in crime as a retail criminal, but a wholesale criminal. This man certainly can be dubbed and termed a wholesale arch criminal."

[7] Following an objection by defendant to the remark made by the deputy district attorney that "this defendant, here, James Clayton, is the type of criminal—a potential murderer," the judge of the trial court ruled as follows:

> "The objection will be overruled. Of course the jury understands that what counsel say is not evidence in the case, and merely the conclusions that counsel is drawing from the evidence; that the jury is to decide the case from the evidence adduced upon the stand, and they are not to take the remarks of counsel as evidence in the case."

All other objections of defendant were overruled by the court without comment thereon or instruction to the jury.

[8] It is clear that such statements made by the deputy district attorney had no place in a well-ordered argument. They constituted nothing less than invective and were probably uttered with no intention other than that of influencing the passions of the jury against the defendant. As such they were wholly unjustifiable. It must be remembered that above everything else in criminal procedure a defendant is entitled to a fair trial. The facts as portrayed by the evidence, together with proper inferences deducible therefrom, constitute the sole basis for legitimate argument. For the deputy district attorney, personally and apparently from his own knowledge, to characterize the defendant as "a potential murderer," that "he sat there and committed willful and deliberate perjury"; that "he will go out here, as the evidence shows, with a gun," and that "this man can be dubbed and termed a wholesale arch criminal," in each case was in effect a statement by an officer of the court, not under oath, nor subject to cross-examination by the defendant, which, owing to the position occupied by the district attorney, especially in the eyes of the jury, was well calculated to exert a powerful influence against the defendant when the time came for the jury to write its verdict. To take such an unfair advantage is subject to severe criticism and condemnation. That such conduct was prejudicially erroneous and affected substantial rights of the defendant is manifest. It follows that, unless it may be said that, notwithstanding such error, no miscarriage of justice has resulted to the defendant, a new trial must be ordered. The evidence shows that as to each of the charges against defendant his identification as the perpetrator of the crime was complete and unmistakable. In addition thereto, as testified in detail by two police officers, the defendant confessed to his participation in each of the crimes charged in the information. In view of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, to the effect that, notwithstanding error as to any matter of procedure, the judgment shall not be set aside unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, it shall appear that the error of which complaint is made resulted in a miscarriage of justice, it is concluded that, inasmuch as the evidence herein unquestionably shows the guilt of defendant, so far as the error of misconduct by the deputy district attorney is concerned, the judgment and order of the trial court denying the motion for a new trial should not be disturbed.

It is ordered that as to each count of the information on which defendant was found guilty, the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial be, and they are, affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

COLEY et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6109.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 20, 1928.

Rehearing Denied March 21, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 19, 1928.

1. Receivers ⚷146—Court has power after termination of receivership action to dispose of property in receiver's possession.

As general rule, upon termination of an action wherein receiver has been appointed, court has continuing power to make disposition of property which has come into receiver's possession by virtue of his appointment.

2. Receivers ⚷146—On termination of unlawful detainer, return of apartment house in possession of receiver to plaintiff who had possession prior thereto was within court's jurisdiction.

Where plaintiff in action for unlawful detainer was in possession of apartment house immediately prior to and at time possession thereof was taken over by receiver under authority of court's order, and on termination of action court restored plaintiff to possession, held, that court was acting within its jurisdiction in making order for restoration.

3. Receivers ⚷146—Defendants held not prejudiced by failure to give them notice of application for restoration of premises in possession of receiver, where hearing on motion to set aside restoration was had.

Where, in action for unlawful detainer, receiver was appointed to take possession of apartment house possessed by plaintiff and on termination of action property was restored, assuming that notice was not given to defendants of application for order of restoration, held, that rights were not prejudiced by failure to give notice, where afterwards they were afforded hearing on merits of their motion to set aside order.

4. Receivers ⚷146—Vacation of order wrongfully obtained, restoring premises in receiver's possession to possession of plaintiff, held within court's inherent power.

Where court issued order restoring apartment house in possession of receiver to plaintiff in action for unlawful detainer after termination of action and ex parte order was obtained setting it aside, and on following day judge, on learning that order had been procured through false statements, vacated order, held, that vacating order was within power of court, since court has inherent power to set aside on its own motion any order which has been wrongfully obtained.

5. Certiorari ⚷5(1)—Assuming invalidity of orders issued subsequent to judgment, certiorari will not be granted where they are appealable (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 963, 1068).

Where petition for certiorari was prayed to declare as nullities two orders of court issued subsequent to termination of receivership, even assuming orders were invalid, certiorari could not be granted, for Code Civ. Proc. § 963, allows appeal to be taken from any special order made after final judgment, and section 1068 declares that writ of review may be granted when there is no appeal nor in judgment of court any plain, speedy, or adequate remedy, and orders from which appeal lies are not reviewable by certiorari.

6. Appeal and error ⚷71(4)—Orders restoring property to plaintiff in unlawful detainer on dismissal of action held appealable.

Where action was brought for unlawful detainer and receiver was appointed and action was subsequently dismissed and orders issued restoring property to possession of plaintiff, held, that orders were appealable.

Petition for certiorari by J. A. Coley and others to annul the orders of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Hon. Timothy I. Fitzpatrick, Judge, relating to the restoration of certain property affected by receivership in an action in unlawful detainer. Affirmed.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Albert Picard, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. The petitioners seek by this proceeding in certiorari to have annulled two orders dated, respectively, August 9 and August 26, 1927, made by the respondent court in an action in forcible detainer commenced by Grace Lanza against the petitioners Hogan, Craig, and others to obtain possession of an apartment house in San Francisco to which she claimed to have acquired title by purchase at trustee's sale. The orders challenged were made subsequent to a dismissal of the action by plaintiff, but before the action was tried, and relate to the restoration of the property.

It appears from the record that on July 7, 1927, a few days after the complaint in said action had been filed, the plaintiff therein, Grace Lanza, went into possession of the disputed property. As to whether her entry was made peaceably, the parties are not agreed, but that question is one with which we are not here concerned, for admittedly, on the day mentioned, she went into actual possession of said property. The next day the petitioner Hogan filed an answer to the complaint, and on July 19th made written application for the appointment of a receiver. The application, which was resisted by the said Grace Lanza, came on for hearing before Hon. H. D. Gregory and on July 22d was granted. The order made in that behalf directed the receiver to take possession of said apartment house, collect the rents, and pay the bills, etc.; and thereupon, in obedience to said last-mentioned order, the said Grace Lanza, who still held possession of the property, surrendered the same to the receiver. Thereafter, on August 9th, and while the apartment house was thus in the possession of the receiver, the said Grace Lanza dismissed the action in forcible detainer for the reason, as she asserted in an affidavit filed later, that nothing further could be accomplished thereby, that the purpose thereof was to obtain possession of said apartment house, and that since, subsequent to its commencement, she had gone into possession and thereafter continued to hold the same as against the defendants up to the time of the appointment of the receiver, the issues involved in said action had become moot. Immediately upon the dismissal of the action she obtained an order from Hon. T. I. Fitzpatrick dated August 9th, directing the receiver to restore to her forthwith the possession of said property, and to file his accounts and apply for a discharge, and the receiver complied with the terms of said order. Subsequently and on August 17th the petitioner Hogan moved to set aside Judge Fitzpatrick's order and to continue the receivership upon the ground that said order was inadvertently made. This motion was opposed by Grace Lanza, and on August 22d, after a full hearing upon the merits before Hon. Harold Louderback, during which the question of her peaceable entry into the possession of the property was made the main issue, the motion was denied. Notwithstanding that the order of August 9th was thus confirmed, an ex parte order was on August 25th obtained from Judge Fitzpatrick on behalf of the petitioner Hogan setting the same aside upon the ground, as the order recites, that the same was inadvertently made; but on the following day, August 26th, upon learning, as his answer herein alleges, that the order he had made on the day previous had been obtained through false statements made to him at that time, Judge Fitzpatrick made another order vacating the same. The effect of the order last above referred to was to continue in force the order of August 9th restoring the property to Grace Lanza; and no appeals were taken from any of the orders or proceedings hereinabove mentioned.

The contention petitioners make in the present proceeding is that Judge Fitzpatrick's order of August 9th restoring the property to the said Grace Lanza is null and void for the reason, as they claim, that the effect thereof was to adjudicate the question of title to and right of possession of said property without giving petitioners their day in court; and that consequently the order of August 26th which operated to continue in force the order of August 9th is also void.

[1] It may be stated as a general rule that, upon the termination of an action wherein a receiver has been appointed, the court has continuing power to make disposition of the property which has come into the receiver's possession by virtue of his appointment. It was so held in the case of Baughman v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. 572, 14 P. 207, cited by petitioners. The court there said:

> "Where a bill upon which the appointment of a receiver is made is afterward dismissed on demurrer, the duties of the receiver cease as between the parties to the action. And so where the defendant finally obtains judgment, the entry of judgment would seem to have the effect of terminating the receiver's functions, although plaintiff perfects his appeal to the appellate court. But the abatement of the action, or entry of final judgment, does not discharge the receiver ipso facto. Although as between the parties his functions terminate with the determination of the suit, he is still amenable to the court as its officer until he has complied with its direction as to the disposition of the funds he has received as receiver."

And continuing, the court declared:

> "And when the bill is dismissed on demurrer, it is the plain duty of the court to direct the receiver to restore the fund or property to the person from whom it was taken. High on Receivers, 833; Field v. Jones, 11 Ga. 413; [Beverley] Beverly v. Brooke, 4 Grat. [45 Va.] 220; Ireland v. Nichols [40 How. Prac. 85] supra."

[2, 3] In the present proceeding it appears without dispute that the plaintiff in said action, Grace Lanza, was in possession of said apartment house immediately prior to and at the time possession thereof was taken over by the receiver under the authority of the court's order. Therefore, upon the termination of the action in which the receiver was appointed, the court was acting entirely within the limits of its jurisdiction in making an order for the restoration of the property; and even assuming that notice to petitioners of the application for the order of restoration should have been given, their rights have not been prejudiced by a failure to give the same for the reason that afterwards they were afforded a full hearing on the merits before Judge Louderback when their motion to set aside said order was heard and determined.

The case of Hidden v. Jordan, 1 Cal. Unrep. 216, cited and relied upon by petitioners, is not in point for several reasons. There the trial court, after the entry of judgment in favor of the plaintiff and in accordance with the terms thereof (which judgment was subsequently reversed on appeal), made a separate order "directing the receiver to deliver over to the plaintiff the said premises and the rents and profits," notwithstanding that the defendant in the action, as the decision plainly points out, had been in possession for the preceding seven years. In reversing the order the Supreme Court said:

> "* * * Admitting his [defendant's] possession to have been wrongful, this is not the proper remedy, if there be a remedy, to recover possession pending the litigation as to the rights of the parties."

And it was furthermore stated that:

> Said order was dependent "upon the judgment already reversed, and the rights of the parties ought not to be embarrassed by continuing the order formally upon the record, when it is in fact substantially reversed in the reversal of the judgment itself, covering the same ground."

[4] As to the legality of the order of August 26th, it is clear, without discussing the matter, that a court has inherent power to set aside on its own motion any order which has been wrongfully obtained.

[5, 6] Aside from the question of the validity of the orders in question, however, and even though it be assumed that the same were invalid, petitioners were afforded complete remedy by appeal for the correction thereof. Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure allows an appeal to be taken from any "special order made after final judgment"; and section 1068 of said Code in effect declares that a writ of review may be granted only when "there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy." Both of the orders sought to be annulled here were special orders made after the dismissal of the action, which dismissal amounted to a final judgment (Marks v. Keenan, 140 Cal. 33, 73 P. 751); and although it is held that an appeal may not be taken from an interlocutory order directing a receiver to distribute property, an appeal does lie where an order to the same effect is made subsequent to judgment (Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 289, 53 P. 797; Hidden v. Jordan, supra; 22 Cal. Jur. 550); and if it be appealable it is well settled that certiorari is not an available remedy (Hildebrand v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 86, 159 P. 147; Stensland v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 172, 178 P. 549; Hochheimer & Co. v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. App. 206, 223 P. 564; Snyder v. Plummer, 174 Cal. 204, 162 P. 1040; Martin v. Miller, 65 Cal. App. 581, 224 P. 783).

For the reasons hereinabove stated, the orders sought to be annulled are affirmed.

COLE BROS. v. DIMMICK et ux. ★
(Civ. 6125.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 28, 1928.

Rehearing Denied March 29, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 26, 1928.

1. Brokers 🔑65(1)—As respects right to commission, broker's representation that corporation would issue owner certificate showing title free from mortgage held affirmation of fact.

In suit by broker to collect commission for land sold, though vendor and purchaser had mutually rescinded contract because of vendor's inability satisfactorily to clear title, held, that broker's representation title companies in city would issue bond whereby outstanding mortgage could be taken care of in such manner that certificate could be issued showing title to premises free and clear of mortgage was an affirmation of fact, and not a statement of opinion.

2. Brokers 🔑65(1)—In suit for commission, held, that, assuming broker's statements corporation would issue owner clear title certificate were opinion, yet they were actionable.

In real estate broker's suit for commission, where it was shown vendor had agreed to sale of land by broker on broker's statements that a corporation would make it possible, by issuance of certificate, to give title showing land free from mortgage, held, on its being shown that vendor and purchaser had rescinded contract because such certificate could not be procured, that, even assuming such statements were statements of opinion and not affirmations of fact, yet they were of that class which are, under proper circumstances, actionable.

Separate actions by Cole Bros., a copartnership consisting of F. W. Cole, F. W. Cole, Jr., and J. Byron Cole, against F. M. Dimmick and against Lucile M. Dimmick, tried together. Verdict for plaintiffs. From an order granting defendants' motion for new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Order affirmed.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles (B. R. Ware, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the husband, F. M. Dimmick, to recover commissions claimed to have been earned in negotiating a sale of real estate. For reasons best known to the plaintiffs, they commenced another action against the wife, Lucile M. Dimmick, for the same relief. Each defendant appeared and answered. The two actions, by consent, were tried together before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs. The defendants made a motion for a new trial. The motion was granted, and the plaintiffs have appealed from that order.

Prior to September 1, 1923, the defendants were the owners of a tract of land in Los Angeles. The title stood in the wife, but the land was community property. The plaintiffs were copartners and were licensed realtors transacting a real estate business. As early as the month of August in that year the plaintiffs and defendants had commenced talking about a transfer of the land to R. V. New. The latter had, at different times, discussed the possible construction of an own your own apartment building, a hotel, and other possibilities. The defendants' tract was mortgaged to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $65,000. The mortgage was held by the Misses Dent. By its terms the mortgage could be paid July 19, 1924. That fact was discussed by all of the parties, the owners, their agents, and the proposed purchaser, at various times when the materiality of that fact was under consideration. On one or more of those occasions the plaintiffs and R. V. New stated that the title insurance companies doing business in Los Angeles issued contracts even though the property was mortgaged. The exact terms of such contracts were not discussed nor examined in detail. On October 10, 1923, the defendant F. M. Dimmick gave the plaintiffs a written authorization authorizing them "to buy or sell the lot for $160,000—$60,000 cash and balance 1, 2, and 3 years at 7 per cent. interest." No transfer was made under that authorization. On October 26, 1923, another authorization was given. The term was five days. The price was stated at:

> "$160,000 on the following terms and conditions: $60,000 cash and balance on or before 1, 2, and 3 years.

It did not refer to the instrument dated October 10, 1923. It provided for a possible mortgage of $100,000 and therefore the existence of a mortgage for $65,000 did not conflict. Thereafter the plaintiffs wrote out and caused to be signed a paper as follows:

> "Phone 769-048.
> "Cole Bros., Real Estate.
> "1001 South Western Avenue.
> "Los Angeles, Cal., October 29, 1923.

Taxes, interest, and insurance to be adjusted to close of escrow.
> "If the owner does not approve this sale or cannot convey the property as herein provided, the said deposit shall be returned to the purchaser, but if the conditions of this agreement can be fulfilled by the seller and the purchaser fails to complete the purchase, the deposit shall be forfeited as liquidated damages.

> "I hereby approve and confirm the above sale October 29, 1923, and agree to pay Cole Bros. a sum equal to Los Angeles Realty Board rate of commission, 5% on $50,000, and 2½ per cent. thereafter.
> "Lucile M. Dimmick, Owner."

Later such other papers were signed that the case presents no question as to the statute of frauds. On the date last mentioned neither the plaintiffs nor R. V. New directed the attention of the defendants to the fact that the paper dated October 29, 1923, contained any words limiting the title insurance papers to any particular form, nor did the parties have any further discussions regarding the payment of the mortgage. Soon after the above instrument had been signed, R. V. New commenced to make arrangements looking toward the construction of a hotel and the issuance of bonds to obtain the funds to finance the project. It then transpired that the title companies would not issue a certificate showing "the title free and clear" until the mortgage was released; that the mortgagees would not, prior to July 19, 1924, release the mortgage; that, with the mortgage not released, the title companies would issue an insurance policy, but they insisted that the policy should recite the existence of the unpaid mortgage and the fact that the title company held the moneys to pay the mortgage on July 19, 1924. When these facts were considered in connection with the proposed bond issue it became apparent that the condition of the title would impair the salability of the bonds. Later the vendor and vendee mutually rescinded their contract. The plaintiffs refused to join in the rescission and sued for their commissions. In their answer the defendants pleaded certain denials and also pleaded certain affirmative matter. Among other things, they alleged:

"That prior to the execution of the agreement of October 29th, the said New and the plaintiffs, knowing of the existence of an unmatured mortgage upon the said premises, came to this defendant and stated that the title companies in the city of Los Angeles could and would issue a bond whereby the said mortgage could be taken care of in such manner that a certificate could be issued showing the title to the said premises free and clear of the said mortgage; that the defendant, in reliance upon the said representation and with the mutual understanding that the said certificate would be so obtained by the plaintiffs, executed the agreement of October 29, 1923, with New and the plaintiffs, and it was understood and intended and agreed by, between, and among the parties that if the said unmatured mortgage on the premises was so taken care of by the plaintiffs within the 90-day period provided for in the agreement, that the said Robert Valentine New would accept the said premises and certificate under the agreement, and make the payments to the defendant as provided for in the said agreement; and it was also understood and agreed by, between, and among the said defendant and plaintiffs and said New that if the plaintiffs were unable or failed to obtain the above-described bond and certificate of title, that the agreement of October 29th would be void, rescinded, and of no further effect between the said three parties to the agreement; that the defendant was at all times ready and willing to accept the said bond, but that the plaintiffs failed and refused to obtain the said bond.

"That the said Robert Valentine New and the plaintiffs were thereupon notified of the defendant's inability to convey free and clear of the said mortgage, whereupon, under and pursuant to the agreement of October 29th, all moneys paid into escrow by the said New and all moneys given to F. M. Dimmick were returned to the said New, and the said New executed in writing a release to the defendant, wherein the defendant was released from all further obligation and liability under the said contract and agreement of October 29th."

[1, 2] Except as we will presently mention, we do not understand the plaintiffs to contend that the defense, if true, was insufficient. However, they assert that the representations were but the expression of opinions. The unqualified statements of the class of contracts sold by certain corporations were not statements of opinions. Myers v. Lowery, 46 Cal. App. 682, 685, 189 P. 793; Edge v. Bryan, 47 Cal. App. 312, 315, 190 P. 476. But conceding that they were statements of opinions, they were of that class that, under certain circumstances, are actionable. Johnson v. Withers, 9 Cal. App. 52, 98 P. 42; Sheer v. Hoyt, 13 Cal. App. 662, 110 P. 477; Herdan v. Hanson, 182 Cal. 538, 189 P. 440.

As the plaintiffs had been the authorized agents of the vendors since October 10, that fact is of particular importance as bringing this case within the doctrine of the cases cited. Calmon v. Sarraille, 142 Cal. 638, 641, 76 P. 486; Barron Estate Co. v. Woodruff Co., 163 Cal. 561, 576, 126 P. 351, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125. On the trial much evidence was adduced on the issue so made, and there was a sharp conflict in favor of the defendants. The surrounding circumstances were decidedly in favor of the defendants. We think it is quite clear that the trial court did not err in granting a new trial.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

JELLEN v. O'BRIEN, Chief of Police.

(Civ. 6065.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 28, 1928.

1. Judgment 🔑7—Jurisdiction of subject-matter and person and power to render particular judgment are elements in every valid judgment.

There are three jurisdictional elements in every valid judgment; namely, jurisdiction of the subject-matter, jurisdiction of the person, and power or authority to render the particular judgment.

2. Judgment 🔑349, 381—Judgment may be vacated on motion or without at any time for absence of jurisdiction of subject-matter or person or power to render particular judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 1917).

For absence of either jurisdiction of subject-matter, jurisdiction of the person, or power to render the particular judgment, when properly apparent, judgment may be vacated at any time, whether before or after term or time limited by statute for motions on statutory grounds, either on motion or of court's own volition, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1917.

3. Parties 🔑11, 12—Party may sue for benefit of many, where question is of common interest, or it is impracticable to bring all parties before court (Code Civ. Proc. § 382).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 382, a party may sue for the benefit of many, where question involved is one of common or general interest to many persons, or parties are numerous, and it is impracticable to bring them all before court.

4. Injunction 🔑114(2)—Secretary of furniture dealers' association held entitled to sue for benefit of all members to enjoin enforcement of license ordinance (Code Civ. Proc. § 382).

Secretary of furniture dealers' association, all members of which claimed that ordinance requiring license to deal in secondhand merchandise was invalid and were threatened with arrest for failure to buy license fee, held entitled to sue for benefit of all to restrain police chief from enforcing such ordinance; question being one of common or general interest to many persons within Code Civ. Proc. § 382.

5. Injunction 🔑114(2)—Parties not entitled to sue jointly in law may unite in suit for injunction.

Parties may unite in a suit for injunctive relief under a state of facts which would not warrant their suing jointly in law.

6. Injunction 🔑210—Injunction against enforcement of license ordinance against members of association effected at suit of its secretary being valid on face, court could not subsequently strike all reference to association and members.

Permanent injunction against enforcement of ordinance, requiring payment of license fee to deal in secondhand merchandise, against members of furniture dealers' association, at suit of secretary thereof, being valid on its face, court could not modify it a year later by striking therefrom all reference to such association and its members, who were properly before court.

7. Parties 🔑80(5), 88(3)—Objections to misjoinder, and nonjoinder of parties and uncertainty on face of complaint are waived by failure to demur (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 433, 434).

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 433, 434, objections to misjoinder and nonjoinder of parties and uncertainty as appear on face of complaint are waived by failure to interpose demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Suit by S. Fisher Jellen and others against Daniel J. O'Brien, Chief of Police of the City and County of San Francisco. From an order amending a decree granting an injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Walter A. Dold, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought suit to obtain a permanent injunction restraining defendant, as chief of police of San Francisco, and all of his agents, servants, and employees, from enforcing against the plaintiff or any member of the San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association the provisions of an ordinance requiring every person, firm, or corporation engaged in buying or selling secondhand merchandise to secure a quarterly permit, and to pay a license of $25 per quarter.

The complaint, among other things, alleges:

> "That San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association is, and at all times herein mentioned was, a voluntary association of citizens of and residents of the city and county of San Francisco engaged in business at fixed places of business in the city and county of San Francisco as retail furniture dealers, and that the membership of such association proximates a large number of individuals, each and all of whom are affected by all of the matters and things hereinafter referred to, and each and all of them are subject to a like injury and damage as the injuries complained of by plaintiff in this action, and that the wrongs hereinafter complained of are threatened against each and all of the said San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association by the said defendant; and that, in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits upon the same subject-matter, and to procure the same identical relief, this plaintiff, as the secretary of the said San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association, has commenced this action in behalf of all of the members of the said San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association."

Then follow allegations in reference to the enactment of the ordinance in question, its threatened enforcement against each and all of the members of the San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association, including threats of arrest and imprisonment, allegations as to the invalidity of the ordinance, and its inapplicability to the members of said association, and a prayer for injunctive relief.

On October 15, 1923, the court granted the relief sought for, and in so doing found:

> "That neither the said plaintiff nor any of the members of the said San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association are, or were, at the date of the alleged demand and threats by the said defendant, engaged in any business which required either a permit from the board of police commissioners, or which demanded the payment of any license tax, fee, or money as a condition to the continued conduct thereof."

On September 3, 1925, the court made its order amending its original decree by striking therefrom all reference to the San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association, thereby making the injunction applicable to the plaintiff only.

From this order appeal was taken by "S. Fisher Jellen, as secretary and representative of the San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association, and its members, and the San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association, a voluntary association, and the members of the San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association, a voluntary association."

Appellant Jellen contends that the judgment of permanent injunction became final for all purposes many months before respondent sought to modify or amend it; that the court was without jurisdiction to modify it, and that the order appealed from is therefore invalid.

Respondent urges that the members of the association in question, other than S. Fisher Jellen, were improperly joined as parties plaintiff, and that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in granting them a permanent injunction.

[1, 2] "There are in general three jurisdictional elements in every valid judgment, namely, jurisdiction of the subject-matter, jurisdiction of the person, and the power or authority to render the particular judgment. For the absence of any one of these elements, when properly apparent, the judgment may be vacated at any time, whether before or after the term or the time limited by statute for motions on statutory grounds, either on motion or of its own volition without suggestion." Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) pp. 444, 445. See, also, Code Civ. Proc. § 1917.

It is not questioned that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, nor that it had the power to grant injunctive relief providing the parties were properly before the court.

Upon the answer to the question, "Did the court have jurisdiction of the person of the members of the San Francisco Furniture Dealers' Association other than the plaintiff?" rests the validity of the injunction.

[3] Section 382, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

> "Of the parties to the action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants; but, if the consent of any one who should have been joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant, the reason thereof being stated in the complaint; and when the question is one of a common or general interest, of many persons, or when the parties are numerous, and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of all."

A party may therefore sue for the benefit of many in one of two cases: (a) Where the question is one of a common or general interest of many persons; or (b) where the parties are numerous and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court. Carey v. Brown, 58 Cal. at page 183.

[4] Appellant urges that he has brought himself within the provisions of both classes of cases, and particularly the first class. The complaint contains no allegation to the effect that it is impracticable to bring the parties all before the court, unless the allegation that the membership of the association proximated a large number of individuals might be held to be a sufficient allegation in that regard. However, we believe that appellant comes squarely within the first class of cases. The complaint in effect alleged, and the court found, identity of interest. All the members of the association on behalf of whom plaintiff brought suit were engaged in the same line of business; all claimed the ordinance invalid; all alleged they were not liable for the payment of a license fee; none of them had ever secured a permit to conduct his business, nor had he ever paid a license therefor. If the ordinance in question was applicable to one it was applicable to all. Plaintiff and each and all of the members of the association were threatened with arrest by the same party for the identical omission —failure to pay the license tax imposed by the ordinance.

From this it clearly appears that "the question" (both of law and of fact) "is one of common or general interest of many persons."

In urging improper joinder and lack of jurisdiction over the members of the association other than plaintiff, respondent relies quite strongly on the case of Noroian v. Bennett, 179 Cal. 806, 810, 179 P. 158, 160, where it is said:

> "But there is no case which holds that parties having separate causes of action against the same person, all claiming under the same rules of law, have a common interest which justifies the joinder of all in one action to obtain the separate relief to which they may be entitled."

In this case the plaintiffs sought a judgment restraining the defendants from prosecuting pending actions and from beginning other actions against plaintiffs upon certain promissory notes made and executed by the plaintiffs separately and at different times. The suit of each rested upon a separate state of facts. In holding that the parties could not join in one suit, the court commented upon Professor Pomeroy's treatise on the subject of community of interest, in the following language:

> "In speaking of 'a community of interest' in the questions of law and fact involved, the author was referring to cases where a single fact was decisive of the claim of all the parties concerned, as where persons owning separate rights in the waters of a stream are injured by a diversion of the water higher up on the stream by another person, or where a single fraudulent conveyance operates to the injury of several separate judgment creditors in the collection of their judgments, in each of which cases a single fact is the sole subject of the inquiry; or cases where owners of separate tracts of land unite in an action to quiet title against another claiming under a single land grant adversely to all of them; or where residents of a city, owning vehicles therein, unite to enjoin the enforcement of an illegal ordinance imposing taxes on such vehicles, or a suit by several lot owners to enjoin an illegal assessment upon all their lots for the improvement of a street, in each of which cases the same question of law may determine the rights of all the parties.
> "It is clear from a consideration of the facts alleged in the complaint that the present case is not included in any of the classes to which the rule stated by Mr. Pomeroy is applicable."

[5] The cases of Foreman v. Boyle, 88 Cal. 290, 26 P. 94, and Geurkink v. City of Petaluma, 112 Cal. 306, 44 P. 570, are authority for the rule that parties may unite in a suit for injunctive relief under a state of facts which would not warrant their suing jointly in law.

[6] A consideration of the facts in the instant case, together with the foregoing announced principles of law, and what appears to be the trend of California decisions, leads us to the conclusion that the court had and exercised jurisdiction over the members of the association in whose behalf the action was brought, and that the permanent injunction was valid on its face. Being valid on its face, the court had no jurisdiction more than a year later to modify it by striking from its provisions all reference to certain parties who were properly before the court, and the order appealed from is therefore void.

[7] It is to be noted that in the case at bar issue was joined without the interposition of a demurrer. Objections as to such misjoinder, nonjoinder, and uncertainty as may appear upon the face of the complaint are therefore waived. Sections 433 and 434, Code Civ. Proc.

The order appealed from is reversed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

1 203 Cal. 482

Oliver FETTERLEY, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Helen M. RANDALL, Defendant and Respondent. (L. A. No. 9158.) Supreme Court of California. Feb. 29, 1928. Department 1. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Hugh J. Crawford, Judge, of dismissal of an action for damages. Oliver Fetterley, in pro. per. Walter J. Little, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing the action after an order made sustaining a demurrer to the fourth amended complaint without leave to amend. It appears from said complaint that plaintiff was on the 22d day of March, 1922, adjudged insane by the superior court of the county of Los Angeles and committed to the Southern California State Hospital at Patton, Cal., and that on December 19, 1923, by the same court said plaintiff was adjudged sane and restored to all his rights as a competent person; that between said two mentioned dates, that is, on August 4, 1923, the defendant procured letters of guardianship to issue to her upon the estate of plaintiff and thereby received control of his property. It is then alleged in said complaint that no notice of defendant's application to be appointed guardian of plaintiff's estate was ever served upon plaintiff, and that defendant procured her appointment as such guardian upon a false affidavit, but said complaint fails to show the contents of such affidavit, or the particulars in which it was false. A further allegation of said complaint sets forth that defendant had presented her final account as such guardian and the same had been approved by the court, and defendant discharged as guardian of plaintiff's estate. No question is made but that the defendant has paid and delivered to plaintiff all money or other property shown to belong to him by the order approving said final account. We are at a loss to understand upon what ground the plaintiff bases his claim for damages. None is set forth in his brief, and we discover none from an examination of said complaint. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE of the State of California, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. William GIBSON, Defendant and Appellant. (Cr. 1457.) District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 21, 1928. Appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, J. J. Trabucco, Judge, of conviction of violation of section 288a, Penal Code, and from an order denying motion for new trial. Harry S. Whitthorne, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried before a jury on an information charging a violation of section 288a of the Penal Code. From the judgment following the jury's verdict of guilty and from the order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant has appealed upon a typewritten record. The trial was held December 29, 1927, the judgment was pronounced December 30, 1927, and the clerk's and reporter's transcripts were filed in this court on January 12, 1928. The cause was placed upon the calendar for hearing February 14th, but the appellant did not appear to prosecute the appeal and has not filed a brief. We have examined the record, and are satisfied that the appellant was fairly tried and convicted, and that the record is free from error. Judgment and order affirmed.

HECQ v. CONNER et al. (L. A. 9267.)

Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1928.

1. Judgment ⚷390—Failure to state grounds upon which motion to vacate judgment was made held waived, where opposing party did not object but filed counter affidavit (Code Civ. Proc. § 1010).

Where notice of motion to vacate judgment failed to state grounds upon which said motion was made, and opposing party did not object, but in response appeared and filed counter affidavit, held that failure to state grounds of motion was waived, since Code Civ. Proc. § 1010, requiring notice of motion to state grounds upon which it shall be made being for benefit of party upon whom notice is served, may be waived.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑43(5)—Affidavit attached to notice of motion alleging supporting facts held sufficient information of grounds on which motion was made (Code Civ. Proc. § 1010).

Where notice of motion had attached to it an affidavit which set forth certain alleged facts in support of motion and upon which motion was based, held that affidavit was sufficient to apprise opposite party of grounds upon which motion would be made, and was sufficient notice under Code Civ. Proc. § 1010.

3. Judgment 🔑390—Contention that court erred in considering affidavit filed on motion in support of original motion to set aside judgment held without merit.

Where, after making motion to set aside judgment, second motion was made for leave to file additional affidavit in support of original motion and second motion was granted, court thereafter considering additional affidavit in passing upon merits of original motion, held that contention court's action was error was without merit.

4. Appeal and error 🔑927(2)—Appellate court must assume that court below, granting motion to set aside judgment of dismissal on allegations in affidavits, believed allegations to be true.

On appeal from grant of motion to set aside judgment of dismissal, where ground for motion was stated in affidavit, held that appellate court must assume that court below believed allegations to be true.

5. Dismissal and nonsuit 🔑43(2)—Grant of motion vacating judgment of dismissal because of alleged violation of understanding between plaintiff and defendant held not abuse of discretion.

Grant of motion to vacate judgment of dismissal because of defendant's alleged violation of understanding with plaintiff that action might lie dormant or be reset as counsel for plaintiff should decide, where defendant procured dismissal, held not abuse of discretion by trial court.

6. Appeal and error 🔑973—Appellate court will not interfere with action of trial court in granting order to vacate dismissal except in extreme cases.

Appellate court will not interfere with action of trial court in refusing or granting motion to vacate judgment of dismissal except in extreme cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

Action by Alexander Hecq against W. S. Conner and others. From an order setting aside the judgment of dismissal, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. W. Kidd and W. O. Schell, both of Los Angeles (Gerald F. H. Delamer, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Eugene I. Fisher, of Long Beach, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This appeal is from an order made after judgment; namely, an order setting aside and vacating a judgment of dismissal previously rendered in this action.

[1, 2] It is first contended by appellants that the notice of motion to vacate and set aside said judgment failed to set forth or state the grounds upon which said motion would be made, and therefore the order made granting said motion was erroneous and should be reversed by this court. The bill of exceptions upon which this appeal has been brought before this court, and which was, of course, prepared by the appellants, fails to show that appellants made any objection to said notice of motion in the court below. On the other hand, it shows that in response to said notice the appellants appeared in said court at the time and place specified therein, filed a counter affidavit to the affidavit of respondent attached to his said notice of motion and upon which this motion was based, and otherwise contested the granting of said motion. The first objection, therefore, as shown by the record herein, which appellants have made to said notice of motion, is made by them in this court. Section 1010 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring a notice of motion to state "the grounds upon which it will be made," is for the benefit of the party upon whom the notice is served. Being for his benefit, he can, of course, waive its requirement. By failing to object to the hearing of the motion at the time which it was noticed to be heard, the appellants impliedly waived this defect in the notice itself. Barron v. Deleval, 58 Cal. 95; Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 61 P. 1123; Bonfield v. Bonfield, 71 Cal. App. 705, 236 P. 162. The notice of motion, as stated, had attached to it an affidavit of the respondent, which affidavit set forth certain alleged facts in support of the motion and upon which the motion would be based. This affidavit was, in our opinion, sufficient to apprise appellants of the grounds upon which respondent's proposed motion would be made. This being the case, the notice was sufficient. Fink & Schindler Co. v. Gavros, 72 Cal. App. 688, 237 P. 1083; Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 137 P. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737; Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353.

[3] At the time the above-mentioned motion came on for hearing, the court, after considering the affidavits of the respective parties in support and in opposition thereto, ordered the matter submitted. Thereafter, and before the court had ruled upon the motion, the respondent made a second motion in said proceeding. This second motion was for leave to file an additional affidavit in support of his original motion. This second motion was granted, and the court thereafter considered said additional affidavit of respondent in passing upon the merits of the original motion. This action on the part of the trial court is now assigned as error. If we correctly understand appellants' objection in this regard, it is that, as the notice of the original motion stated that it would be made upon certain papers and affidavits then on file in said court, and as the additional affidavit, which the court permitted the respondent to file as a result of his second motion, was not on file at the time the first notice of motion was served and was not referred to in said notice of motion, it could not be considered by the court in passing upon the original motion. The only authority which appellants cite in reference to this contention is the case of Broderick v. Cochran, 18 Cal. App. 202, 122 P. 972, which they concede to be opposed to them. The contention is without merit, and we are satisfied that no authority can be found to support it.

The order appealed from was granted by the trial court after a hearing, as we have already seen, at which there were presented and considered by the court affidavits by respondent in support of his motion and counter affidavits on behalf of appellants contesting said motion. Briefly, these affidavits show that this action was instituted by the respondent against the appellants to recover damages for injuries sustained by respondent by being struck and run over by an automobile then being driven by the appellant Conner. The respondent employed an attorney living at Long Beach to prosecute the action, and this attorney in turn retained two other attorneys residing at Santa Ana, the county seat of Orange county, where the action was pending, to assist in the conduct of said action. The action was set for trial for December 17, 1925. Through some misunderstanding between the attorneys for the respondent none of them appeared in court at the time said action was called for trial, and the court, upon motion of appellants, dismissed the action. It also appears from said affidavits that there had been some discussion between respondent's attorneys, of which appellants' attorneys had been apprised, about dismissing this action and commencing another action of the same nature, for the reason that respondent's attorneys had failed to demand a jury at the time the action had been set for trial. Appellants' counsel refused to stipulate that the case might be tried by a jury, and for this reason, and because respondent desired a jury trial, his attorneys had considered the advisability of dismissing this action and instituting a second action in its place. In furtherance of this plan, respondent filed a second complaint based substantially upon the same facts as were alleged in the complaint in this action, but with this difference, that the appellant Conner was made the sole defendant in said second action. The date of the commencement of this action does not appear from any of the affidavits used on the hearing of the said motion to vacate the judgment of dismissal, but it had been commenced and was pending at the time said motion was heard. In one of said affidavits used at said hearing on behalf of respondent, in which respondent's counsel was the affiant, the following allegations were made:

> "That in conversation had by your affiant with Gerald F. H. Delamer, one of the attorneys for defendant as aforesaid, it was understood and agreed that no steps of any kind be taken with reference to said case when the same came up for trial on the 17th day of December, 1925; that the same lie dormant or be continued or go off calendar to be reset or dismissed, as your affiant should finally decide, the decision to depend upon what demurrers would be interposed to the new complaint and whether issue on the merits would finally be joined therein; that said conversations were had on the 9th day of December, 1925, and again on the 12th day of December, 1925, and again on the 14th day of December, 1925; that, in all of the said conversations, your affiant expressed an intention to dismiss the above-entitled case, but made it clear that the actual dismissal would have to depend upon two conditions—first, upon issue being joined in the new case, and, second, upon the filing of a written dismissal duly signed by your affiant—and that in no event would any steps be taken on the 17th day of December, 1925, to have the above-entitled case dismissed at the request of the said Delamer, and in the absence of your affiant; that in all of said conversations, the said Delamer expressed a willingness to grant a reasonable continuance, as requested by your affiant, for the trial of said case, even though his client refused to stipulate that a jury trial might be granted; that your affiant fully believed that said Delamer understood the position of your affiant and acquiesced in it."

[4-6] It would appear from these allegations, if they were believed by the trial court, and in support of its order vacating the judgment of dismissal we must assume that the court believed them to be true, that there was an understanding between counsel for the respective parties in this action that no steps would be taken by the attorneys for the appellants on December 17, 1925, to dismiss said action, but that the same might lie dormant or be continued or go off the calendar to be reset, or dismissed as the attorney for respondent might decide, the decision to depend upon what demurrers would be interposed to the new complaint, and whether issue on the merits would be finally joined in said second action. The granting of the motion to vacate the judgment of dismissal for the reason set forth in the portions of the affidavit above quoted cannot be held to have been an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. The trial court may well have concluded that the order of dismissal of said action had been made in the absence of respondent's attorneys and after an understanding between the attorneys representing all the parties to said action that the trial thereof might be continued to await the result of the second action.

It is only in extreme cases that an appellate court will interfere with the action of a trial court in refusing or granting an order of this character. "The law governing this class of cases is so well settled, and has been so often declared in the decisions of this court, that we may dispense with the citation of authority. An application to be relieved from a default under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the action of that court will not be set aside on appeal unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears. Any doubt that may exist should be resolved in favor of the application, to the end of securing a trial upon the merits." Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 P. 426; Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353. "The rule is equally applicable whether the motion is granted or refused, although it has been said in some cases that we listen more readily to an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default than where the motion has been granted. All presumptions will be indulged in favor of the correctness of the court's action, and the burden in all cases is upon the appellant to make it appear that its discretion was abused in making the order." Moore v. Thompson, 138 Cal. 23, 26, 70 P. 930, 932.

The appellants have advanced other reasons why the order appealed from should not be sustained by this court. We have carefully examined and considered all of such reasons, but we fail to find any merit in them. A detailed discussion of appellant's argument in support of them would, in our opinion, serve no useful purpose, and for that reason we will content ourselves with the general statement that the grounds advanced therein are not meritorious.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re OLDHAM'S ESTATE.

OLDHAM et al. v. OLDHAM et al.

(L. A. 9965.)

Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1928.

Wills ⚷130—Printed words "Los Angeles, Calif.," followed by date, written approximately on same line, held not to invalidate olographic will.

Will contained on three sheets of paper, deceased's office stationery, all in handwriting of deceased, except for the following printed matter: "Dr. John Y. Oldham, Merchants' National Bank Bldg., Los Angeles, Calif.," at head of each sheet, held valid as olographic will, where sole circumstance connecting printed words with the writing was the fact that words "Los Angeles" appearing on the first sheet were followed by the date, written approximately on the same line.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Proceedings by W. B. Oldham and another contesting the admission to probate of a document purporting to be the last will of John Y. Oldham, deceased, opposed by Grace Carr Oldham and another, proponents of the will. From an order denying the contest, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

W. M. Holland and Wingert, Nicholas & Shobert, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

William L. Kuehn and James, Pace, Smith & Younkin, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This appeal is taken from an order denying the contest of W. B. and J. F. Oldham to the admission to probate of a certain document purporting to be the last will and testament of John Y. Oldham, deceased, and admitting said document to probate as the last will of said deceased. The ground of said contest is that said document, which purports to be an olographic will, is not entirely written, dated and signed by the hand of the said John Y. Oldham. The document consists of three sheets of office stationery of the deceased. Upon each of said sheets of paper there were printed at the top thereof the name of the deceased and his address, including the name of the building and the city wherein his office was located. The printed matter on said sheets of paper was as follows:

"Dr. John Y. Oldham
"Merchants National Bank Bldg.
"Los Angeles, Calif."

It is claimed by appellants that the printed words "Los Angeles, Calif.," appearing on the first of these three sheets of paper, are a part of said will, and, not being in the handwriting of the testator, render the whole document invalid as an olographic will. Appellants rely upon Estate of Bernard, 197 Cal. 36, 239 P. 404, in support of this contention. In that case it was held that the words "Long Beach, California," upon certain hotel stationery used by the deceased in her attempt to make an olographic will rendered the instrument invalid as an olographic will. In the Bernard Case, however, the document which it was sought to probate as an olographic will bore at the top of the first page thereof the following caption: "The following 4 sheets of paper included, Long Beach, California, Oct. 12, 1918," all of which was in the handwriting of the deceased, except the words "Long Beach, California." In holding that the words "Long Beach, California," were a part of the document which the deceased intended to execute, and that by their inclusion therein said document was rendered invalid, this court said:

> "The printed words are incorporated in and doubtless were intended to be made a part of the heading of the document. The care with which the date has been placed upon the precise line with the printed words indicates that the words immediately preceding the date must have been intended to be made a part of the document as the name of the place of the execution of the document. Moreover, this construction, based upon the relative position of the words, is supported by the juxtaposition of the written word 'included' and the printed words 'Long Beach, California,' which are in a direct and immediate line thereto. It thus appears that decedent not only wished to make the date a part of the document, but to make, also, the printed portion, designating the place of the making of the document, an essential part of the document. Unless it can be said that the clause at the very top of the will, which reads, 'The following 4 sheets of paper included,' is a material part and parcel of the will, then there is nothing on the face of the document which in any wise indicates that the testator had executed a completed instrument; and if we take that clause to be a material part of the will, then we are confronted with the fact that the printed words 'Long Beach, California,' are likewise a material part and parcel of the will, and therefore it cannot be said, in keeping with the rule enunciated in the Estate of Thorn [183 Cal. 512, 192 P. 19] supra, that the will was entirely written by the hand of the testator."

It will thus be seen that in the Estate of Bernard great stress was laid upon the caption or heading of the document containing the printed words, and it was expressly held that, by the use of this heading, the deceased had made not only the date, which was absolutely necessary to the validity of the document as a testamentary disposition, but also "the printed portion, designating the place of the making of the document, an essential part of the document." In the instrument now before us, and which, it is contended, is the last will of John Y. Oldham, deceased, we find no reference whatever to the printed words appearing upon stationery used by the deceased in the preparation of said instrument. These printed words are not expressly, by direct reference, or impliedly, by inference or otherwise, made a part of the written instrument set forth on the sheets of paper upon which they appear. It is not contended by appellants that the name of Dr. Oldham, nor the name of the building in which he had his office, both of which were printed upon each of the three sheets of paper, are any part of the written document appearing thereon; neither is it claimed that the words "Los Angeles, Calif.," appearing upon the second and third sheets, are any part of the writing itself. It is claimed only that these words, appearing upon the first sheet, being followed by the date, written approximately on the same line, are thus made a part of the written document itself. In Estate of Bernard a similar situation was referred to, and was considered as a possible circumstance which, taken in connection with the fact that these printed words appeared in the caption of the instrument along with words written by the deceased, tended to show an intent on the part of the deceased to make the printed words a part of the instrument itself. This circumstance, standing alone, as it does in the present proceeding, is so slight that it would not warrant the conclusion that the deceased, by simply writing after the printed words the date of the document, thereby intended to make such printed words any part of the document itself. The printed words appearing upon the three sheets of paper upon which the deceased attempted to write his will are wholly disconnected from the writing itself, and they form no part thereof. Our attention has not been called to any authority, nor are we aware of any such, which holds that the mere presence of printed words upon a sheet of paper, used by a person for the purpose of writing thereon an olographic will, renders the will invalid when such printed matter is no part of the writing, and is wholly dissociated therefrom. It follows from the views expressed herein that the document admitted to probate was the valid will of said deceased, and the order denying appellants' contest and admitting to probate said document as the last will and testament of said deceased should be, and is hereby, affirmed.

out permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), denied all knowledge of agent taking subscriptions in excess of permit, and declared that any subscriptions in excess of permit were taken in violation of his orders, he was entitled to declaration of legal principles applicable to situation.

3. Criminal law 🔑398(2)—Summary of alleged agent's books held inadmissible against defendant, where there was no showing that books themselves were admissible (Corporate Securities Act; Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, subd. 5).

Summary of books of alleged agent held inadmissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, subd. 5, against defendant charged with conspiring to take subscriptions for corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), and with actually taking subscriptions for stock without permit, where there was no showing that agent's books were themselves admissible in evidence as genuine, true, and correct.

4. Criminal law 🔑410—Book entries by subagents held not binding on defendant, where he had no knowledge, custody, or control of books (Corporate Securities Act; Civ. Code, §§ 2349–2351).

Book entries made by subagents held not binding, under Civ. Code, §§ 2349–2351, on defendant charged with conspiring to take subscriptions for corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), and with actually taking subscriptions without permit, where defendant had no knowledge of books, and no custody or control over them.

5. Criminal law 🔑410—Agent's books and summary thereof held not admissible against defendant, as agent's acts, without proof that defendant knowingly aided or encouraged agent's acts (Corporate Securities Act; Civ. Code, §§ 2349–2351).

Books of agent and summary thereof held inadmissible, under Civ. Code, §§ 2349–2351, as acts of agent, against defendant charged with conspiring to take subscriptions for corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814) and with actually taking subscriptions without permit, where there was no proof that defendant knowingly and intentionally aided, advised, or encouraged acts of agent.

6. Criminal law 🔑62—Principal, to be held liable for agent's acts, must be shown to have knowingly aided or encouraged acts.

Principal, to be criminally liable for agent's acts, must be shown to have knowingly and intentionally aided, advised, or encouraged criminal acts committed by agent.

7. Licenses 🔑42(5)—Defendant, charged with taking stock subscriptions without permit, held entitled to instruction declaring principal's liability for agent's acts (Corporate Securities Act).

Where defendant, charged with taking subscriptions for corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), denied knowledge of contents of agent's books, and summary of such books was admitted in evidence against him, he was entitled to instruction that, before one can be convicted of crime by reason of acts of agent, a clear case must be shown, and that, unless codefendants were agents of defendants, and directly authorized to commit criminal acts, jury must acquit defendants.

8. Criminal law 🔑779—Coconspirator's books are not admissible against defendant, in absence of instruction requiring independent proof of conspiracy (Corporate Securities Act; Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 6).

Books of coconspirator are not admissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 6, against defendant charged with conspiring to take subscriptions for corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), in absence of instruction that acts and declarations of coconspirators are not binding, unless and until, independent of such declarations and acts, conspiracy has been shown beyond reasonable doubt.

9. Criminal law 🔑427(3)—While evidence of acts and declarations of coconspirators are not binding without independent proof of conspiracy, order of proof is within discretion of court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 6).

While acts and declarations of coconspirators are not binding, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 6, unless, independent of such acts and declarations, a conspiracy is shown beyond reasonable doubt, order of proof is within discretion of trial court.

10. Licenses 🔑42(5)—Corporate president, charged with taking stock subscriptions without permit, held entitled to instruction concerning corporate officer's liability for acts of other officers or agents (Corporate Securities Act).

Where president of corporation, charged with taking subscriptions for corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), denied all knowledge of entries in books of corporation, and summary compiled in part from these books was admitted in evidence against him, he was entitled to instruction to effect that officer of corporation is not criminally liable for acts of other officers or agents thereof, unless he directly authorized or consented to such acts.

11. Conspiracy 🔑48—Corporate president, charged with conspiring to take stock subscriptions without permit, held entitled to instruction on officer's liability for acts of other officers or agents (Corporate Securities Act).

Where president of corporation, who was charged with conspiring to take subscriptions for corporate stock, without permit, under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), denied all knowledge of entries in books of corporation, and summary derived in part from these books was admitted in evidence against him, he was entitled to instruction to effect that officer of corporation is not criminally liable for acts of other officers or agents thereof, unless he directly authorized or consented to such acts.

12. Criminal law ⚷424(3)—Evidence of acts and declarations of coconspirators, occurring after conspiracy terminated, without defendant's knowledge, in his absence, held inadmissible as hearsay (Corporate Securities Act).

Admission of evidence to show acts and declarations of alleged coconspirators, occurring after termination of conspiracy, without knowledge of defendant, and in his absence, held error, in prosecution for conspiring to take subscriptions for corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814); such evidence being inadmissible hearsay.

13. Criminal law ⚷673(4)—Where court admitted evidence as to acts and declarations of alleged coconspirators against defendant, it should have declared limitations on evidence and controlling principles (Corporate Securities Act).

Where court admitted evidence to show acts and declarations of alleged coconspirators against defendant, charged with conspiring to take subscriptions for corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), it should have declared limitations on evidence and legal principles controlling whole transaction.

14. Criminal law ⚷1169(7)—Errors in admitting evidence as to acts and declarations of alleged coconspirators, and failing to limit evidence or declare applicable principles, held prejudicial, where defendant probably would not have been convicted otherwise (Corporate Securities Act).

Errors in admitting evidence as to acts and declarations of alleged coconspirators against defendant, charged with conspiring to take subscriptions to corporate stock without permit under Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814), and in failing to limit such evidence or to declare principles applicable to transaction, held prejudicial, where defendant probably would not have been convicted but for such errors.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Abner Doble was convicted of conspiracy to violate the Corporate Securities Act and of actual violation thereof, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeals in 257 P. 81.

Rehearing denied: WASTE, C. J., and CURTIS, J., voting for a rehearing.

Carey Van Fleet, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Wm. F. Cleary and Emery J. Mitchell, Deputy Attys. Gen., and Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Robert E. Fitzgerald, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

PRESTON, J. Appellant was convicted of conspiracy to violate the Corporate Securities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3814, p. 1406); also on four counts charging substantive offenses in violation thereof. He has appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion for new trial.

The indictment in count 1 charges a conspiracy to violate said act by taking subscriptions in the state of California for shares of stock of the class A common capital stock of Doble Steam Motors Corporation, a Delaware corporation, without a permit so to do from the corporation commissioner of the state of California. Among other overt acts there was charged the taking of six specific subscriptions to said stock without a permit. The taking of each of said six subscriptions was made a separate count in the indictment, and it was upon four of such counts that appellant was convicted as above noted. Five defendants were charged in said indictment, to wit: Abner Doble, W. A. Doble, Harold E. Haven, F. G. Cox, and W. E. Barnard. Cox, Haven, and Barnard pleaded guilty, and testified for the people on the trial of appellant. The other defendant, W. A. Doble, was tried jointly with appellant, but was acquitted. Under the proof the offenses charged, if committed at all, were committed between July 1 and August 4, 1923. This fact should be noted, as the conspiracy indictment fixes no time for its duration and no time for its termination.

[1, 2] It is not contended that any stock certificates were actually issued at any time by said corporation during the period covered by the indictment in excess of the permit held by it. Neither is it claimed that at any time covered by said indictment bad faith was exercised in contracting for the sale of any stock in excess of such permit. Nor is it claimed that appellant did anything at any time personally to procure such excess subscriptions. The most that is or can be claimed in this connection is that appellant knew, or should have known, that such permits as the corporation had were being exceeded by the fiscal agent in charge of sales, to wit, the said F. G. Cox. Appellant strenuously denied all knowledge of the taking of any such excess subscriptions, and declared that, if any were so taken, they were in violation of his express orders forbidding such action. He was therefore entitled to a declaration from the trial court of the legal principles applicable to such a situation.

[3] Appellant was president of the corporation, but was actively engaged only in another department of the business, and had but little to do with the stock sales department. Permits to sell stock to the extent of 100,000 shares were issued to the corporation, and had not been revoked during the period covered by the indictment. Pursuant to such permits, on or about October 28, 1922, the corporation made a contract with said F. G.

Cox constituting him its fiscal agent, empowering him to take subscriptions for the sale of its stock, and requiring him to make reports and remittances at certain stated times. This contract did not authorize or contemplate a violation of the limit set by the permits. On June 19, 1923, the corporation, acting in apparent good faith, applied in writing to the corporation commissioner for an additional permit. This application was pending thereafter until August 9, 1923, upon which date the corporation, realizing that it would not be granted, withdrew it. The court properly charged the jury that there was no issue of fraud involved in the transaction; neither was there pecuniary loss suffered by others involved therein, and these elements were not to be considered in their deliberations and conclusions. The jury, in returning a verdict of conviction, recommended the defendant to the extreme mercy of the court. It will thus be seen that the charge as to this defendant was technical, and had little moral substance in it. The active persons in the plan acknowledged their responsibility by their pleas of guilty.

Said F. G. Cox kept, in connection with his contract of employment and other business as a stock broker, a combined set of books, some in Los Angeles and others in San Francisco. An expert on behalf of the prosecution was allowed access to certain books supposed to be the books of Cox, and from them, in connection with the books of the Doble corporation a summary was compiled and introduced in evidence, primarily for the purpose of showing that an excess of stock subscriptions had been taken, and fixing the approximate date of the beginning of such excess subscriptions, which date was by him declared to be June 19, 1923. This summary was admitted in evidence over the strenuous and repeated objections of appellant that the books from which it was made had not been properly authenticated, nor had they been received, nor were they admissible in evidence. The books themselves were never received in evidence, although those records from which the summary was taken were apparently accessible to the defense for inspection, and were marked as exhibits for identification. These books, if properly authenticated, would have been a proper place to resort for proof of the amount of outstanding subscriptions as a basis to be followed by proof of appellant's connection therewith, if any, and knowledge thereof, if any, but the evidence fell far short of showing proper authentication of the accuracy and reliability thereof.

No witness testified that the entries from which the summary was made were genuine, true, or correct. No witness was produced who knew, or claimed to know, whether said entries were true or correct. A witness Smith, who worked for Cox, gave part of his time to the books, and had complete charge of them under the supervision of a regular bookkeeper some months after the offenses charged, but this witness could not and did not testify as to the authenticity or accuracy of the entries prior to the time he took full charge thereof in the manner stated. Witness Penberthy testified only as to the dates between March and June 23, 1923, which said dates antedated the offenses charged. The coconspirator Barnard, sales manager, testified that he thought the books were accurately kept, but he had no first-hand knowledge of the matter. To this showing should be added the testimony of Cox himself that the books for a part of the period in question were kept under his general supervision, and were at all times acted upon by him as correct. This showing might have been sufficient for the introduction in a civil action involving Cox of the books, but the fact remains that the court did not admit them, but expressly or impliedly held the showing insufficient, and appellant strenuously and repeatedly objected to admission of a summary thereof until the books themselves were first in evidence.

It is manifestly error to admit in evidence, under section 1855, subd. 5, of the Code of Civil Procedure, a summary of books where the books themselves are not shown to be admissible in evidence. We, of course, are not intending to hold that the books in each case must be actually received in evidence to warrant the introduction of such summary so long as they are available for use of the opposing party, but their introduction in evidence is the safest rule, and it is not a technical objection to require that a showing be first made that such book entries are entitled to admission if they are actually offered. This we understand to be the effect of such cases as Shields v. Rancho Buena Ventura, 187 Cal. 569, 203 P. 114.

[4] Further, it will be seen that a more serious error was committed when it is recalled that appellant was in no wise connected with the said entries; it being expressly admitted that he had no knowledge whatsoever of the books, and had no custody or control whatsoever over them. The entries were not made by Cox, and were therefore at most the acts of subagents, and ordinarily would not be binding even in a civil action on appellant. Civ. Code, §§ 2349-2351.

[5-7] It is contended, however, that said books and the summary thereof were admissible as the acts of an agent as to the substantive offenses charged and as the acts of a coconspirator as to the offense of conspiracy. If we admit that Cox was the agent of appellant, this might allow his declarations, made within the scope of his agency, to be admitted in a civil cause, but human liberty does not rest upon so weak a foundation. A principal, in order to be held criminally liable, must be shown to have knowingly and intentionally aided, advised, or encouraged the criminal act committed by the agent. In the absence of proof to this extent, the summary of the books should not have been received as a declaration binding upon appellant, and certainly, if other evidence was deemed sufficient to warrant a finding that appellant knew of the contents of the books, the smallest consideration of the rights of appellant, in view of his denial of such knowledge, would have required the court to have given in fact or in substance appellant's requested instruction No. 62, which it refused to do. This request was as follows:

> "You are hereby instructed that, before one can be convicted of a crime by reason of the acts of his agent, a clear case must be shown. The civil doctrine that a principal is bound by the acts of his agent within the scope of the agent's authority has no application to criminal law. If a principal is liable at all criminally for the acts of another, such liability must be founded upon authorized acts. Authority to do a criminal act will not be presumed. You are instructed that six of the charges contained in the indictment are based upon alleged violations of the Corporate Securities Act without the element of conspiracy. You are therefore instructed that unless you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the codefendants F. G. Cox and W. E. Barnard were the agents of the defendants Abner Doble and W. A. Doble, Jr., in the perpetration of the acts alleged in said six charges, and were directly authorized to commit said alleged acts by the defendants Abner Doble and W. A. Doble, then you must find said defendants Abner Doble and W. A. Doble not guilty of said six charges."

In People v. Green, 22 Cal. App. 45, 50, 133 P. 334, 336, it is said:

> "Before one can be convicted of a crime by reason of the acts of his agent a clear case must be shown. The civil doctrine that a principal is bound by the acts of his agent within the scope of the agent's authority has no application to criminal law. 1 McClain on Criminal Law, § 188. While false pretenses may be made to an agent of the person defrauded, yet when made by an agent they must be directly authorized or consented to in order to hold the principal, for authority to do a criminal act, will not be presumed. 1 McClain on Criminal Law, § 683."

See, also, People v. Blackman, 127 Cal. 248, 59 P. 573; 21 R. C. L. §§ 113, 115, 116, pp. 934–936.

[8, 9] But it is asserted that these books were admissible as a declaration of Cox, a coconspirator, made during the period of the conspiracy, and in furtherance thereof. If the books were in fact the acts or declarations of Cox, and the record otherwise showed evidence warranting the finding that a conspiracy existed between the appellant and Cox, this position would be sound, provided always that the jury was told that the acts and declarations of a coconspirator were not binding, unless and until, independent of such declarations and acts, a conspiracy had been shown beyond a reasonable doubt to exist, and in no case should such declarations be received as proof of the conspiracy. Code of Civil Procedure, § 1870, subd. 6; People v. Irwin, 77 Cal. 494, 502, 20 P. 56; People v. Zimmerman, 3 Cal. App. 84, 87, 84 P. 446, is not opposed to, but is in accord with, this holding. The order of the proof is, however, in the discretion of the court. People v. Stokes, 5 Cal. App. 205, 209, 89 P. 997; People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 394, 77 P. 177; People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 408, 56 P. 44. The above was not done and the jury was thus allowed to consider ex parte acts of the agents of a person to prove a conspiracy between such person and the appellant. Therefore it was error to receive said testimony over objection and without limitation upon any hypothesis.

[10, 11] It should also be observed that said summary received in evidence was compiled, not only from the Cox books, but also from the books of the Doble corporation, and from a comparison of the two sets of books. But again appellant denied all knowledge of the entries in the books of said corporation, in so far as the same were summarized and received in evidence. The summary of the Doble corporation books was apparently admitted upon the theory that the set of books from which the entries were taken consisted of books required by law to be kept, and hence admissible for that reason. While the books were admissible for what they might show as to the excess of subscriptions over the permits, still, in view of the repeated claims of appellant that he knew nothing of their contents, he was entitled to an instruction to the effect that an officer of a corporation is not criminally liable for the acts of other officers or agents thereof, unless he directly authorized or consented to such acts. An instruction to this effect was requested by appellant in his request No. 61, and refused. "If there was evidence that the entries were made by the defendant or under his direction, or with his knowledge, they would most undoubtedly be competent and important evidence against him. They are clearly inadmissible, except as admissions or as acts done in furtherance of the crime charged against him. His knowledge and complicity in falsifying the books must first be shown. The presumption of innocence with which the law clothes the defendant is sufficient to overcome the presumption which might prevail in a civil case, that he knew because it was his duty to know. As before stated, he is not to be punished criminally for negligently performing his duty." People v. Blackman, supra, at page 253 (59 P. 574). See, also, People v. Martel, 21 Cal. App. 573, 132 P. 600.

In the case of Worden v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 204 F. 1, 9, Worden and others were jointly indicted on a charge of conspiracy to defraud the United States in the purchase of certain public lands through alleged "dummy" entrymen for the benefit of plaintiffs in error and the J. H. Worden Lumber, etc., Company, of which said Worden was president and manager. The books of account, both of Worden and of the company, played an important part on the trial; the opinion of the court being that, if the evidence afforded by them were eliminated, the proof would be insufficient to support a conviction. It was held that sufficient connection was not shown between Worden and the books of the lumber company to make the entries therein competent evidence as against him, and the judgment was reversed; the court saying:

> "It is manifest that Worden would be prejudiced by an improper treatment of the entries on the company's books as competent evidence against him. Unless the mere fact of Worden's presidency and management of the company raised a legal presumption of his acquaintance with the book entries, thus putting upon him, in defense of a charge of crime, the burden of rebutting such legal presumption, we think the books cannot, in the peculiar state of this record, be held as matter of law competent evidence against him. We have found no persuasive decision sustaining such legal presumption (in the absence of statutory requirement of correct bookkeeping), except on proof that the books were kept under the instruction, direction, or supervision of the person against whom the entries are offered, or that such person presumably had examined the books or in some way obtained actual knowledge of the entries."

In the case of McDonald v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 241 F. 793, 800, one Hendrey, the president of a Memphis bank, with plaintiffs in error and six others, was indicted for using the mails in furtherance of a scheme to defraud by organizing a company, called a bank, but in substance a holding company or chain of banks, and selling stock in and getting deposits therefor by false representations. Upon various errors alleged the verdict and sentence against Hendrey were reversed, the court, among others things, holding as follows:

> "Evidence was received as to the contents of the books of the Memphis bank of which Hendrey was president. This bank was a corporation, and the contents of the books of the corporation could not be put in evidence in a criminal prosecution against the president, without a more direct showing of his personal responsibility for the bookkeeping than we observe here. Worden v. United States (C. C. A. 6) 204 F. 1, 9, 122 C. C. A. 315."

It will thus be seen that in the trial of an offense highly technical in its nature serious prejudicial errors occurred affecting the substantial rights of appellant. Without the summary above referred to, the whole fabric of the case for the people would have been weak and unconvincing.

[12] But beyond all this a contemplation of the record in this case convinces one that in all probability appellant was convicted, not upon the pertinent evidence as to the charges laid, but upon evidence relating to a transaction commonly called in the record the "Portland transaction," which occurred subsequent to the offenses charged in the indictment, or, in other words, there was in all probability what is known as a trial upon one offense and a conviction upon another. It is noted that soon after August 9, 1923, a plan or scheme was put in operation which the prosecution asserts with much show of probability was for the purpose of absorbing the excess subscriptions then on the books of said Cox or of said corporation. The so-called Portland transaction consisted, in a word, of the opening of headquarters in Portland, Or., and the attempted perfecting of sales thereat to said Cox of large blocks of shares of the capital stock of said corporation; Cox thereafter using the stock so acquired to satisfy the subscriptions that he had upon his books in excess of the permits granted. It is asserted, and we think correctly, that the sale was what is commonly known as a "wash" sale, and in reality constituted the most serious misconduct shown by the record. This scheme or plan was carried out very largely by the defendants in this cause, who entered pleas of guilty. The connection of appellant therewith was slight, and largely shown by circumstantial evidence. However, the whole plan, regardless of the meager connection of appellant with it, was unfolded in great detail, and occupied by far the most prominent place in the trial of the case. It is said that one-third of the record is devoted to this subject, and an examination thereof shows that all of the rebuttal and surrebuttal testimony was directed to it. It had other damaging features, such as the predating of certain instruments, intended, doubtless, to create a record contrary to the true facts. Appellant denied personal connection with the scheme, and all intention on his part of using it to cover up any oversubscriptions, and contended that it was as to him a legal one for the purpose of pushing the sale of stock of the corporation in other quarters than the state of California. The treatment by the court and prosecution of the Portland transaction upon trial of the case was as though it were a part of the conspiracy charged in count 1 of the indictment, and the acts and declarations of the alleged former coconspirators, without the presence of appellant, were repeatedly and indiscriminately received in evidence. We have noted above that the conspiracy charged ended not later than August 4, 1923. The Portland plan originated subsequent to August 9, 1923, and originated after the corporation had knowledge that its application for an additional permit would be denied. It therefore cannot be said that the Portland transaction was in any sense a part of the conspiracy charged in the indictment; hence it was palpable error to receive in evidence acts and declarations of alleged former coconspirators, made, after the conspiracy charged had terminated, without the knowledge or presence of appellant. This is hearsay testimony, and its inadmissibility is so elemental in the law of conspiracy that we need not pause for citation of authority. Any material act of the appellant himself, committed after August 4, 1923, could have been received in evidence, if limited in its application to the offense previously charged, such as proving system or motive. It is also true that any act committed by appellant after August 4th, which would tend to show previous knowledge of the existence of oversubscriptions, would have been admissible against him, but such admission would have to be carefully limited by the court to its bearing upon the previous offense, and the jury told that appellant was not upon trial for the Portland transaction.

[13, 14] Appellant contended that the Portland transaction was thoroughly legal and justifiable, and to that end tendered numerous instructions which were all refused by the court, and the Portland transaction went to the jury without a word of explanation of any kind, and without a declaration of the principles of law applicable to the situation disclosed by this evidence. It is useless to add that, after admitting the evidence, the court should have declared the limitations upon it, and also the legal principles controlling the whole transaction, so that appellant, if believed by the jury, might have had the benefit thereof. It is our view, from consideration of the record, that but for the introduction of this testimony and the failure of the court to limit it or declare the principles applicable, in all probability appellant would not have been convicted. These errors were therefore prejudicial. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider further assignments of error.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MERCANTILE ACCEPTANCE CO. v. FRANK et al. (L. A. 9951.)

Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1928.

1. Contracts 🔑2—Validity of contract is determined by law of place where made.

Law of place where contract is made determines its validity, and contract valid at place where made is valid everywhere.

2. Chattel mortgages 🔑89—Chattel mortgage regularly filed in accordance with laws of another state held valid, notwithstanding failure to comply with local statute (Civ. Code, § 2957, subd. 1).

Chattel mortgage executed and filed for record in accordance with laws of Minnesota held valid and legal instrument in state of California, though it was not accompanied by affidavit required by Civ. Code, § 2957, subd. 1.

3. Chattel mortgages 🔑89—Statute for recordation of chattel mortgages applies only to domestic mortgages or mortgages on personalty within state (Civ. Code, § 2959).

Civ. Code, § 2959, providing for recordation of chattel mortgages, applies only to domestic mortgages or mortgages executed on personal property within the state.

4. Chattel mortgages 🔑89—Lien of chattel mortgage properly filed in another state held not lost by removal from state of mortgaged car without mortgagee's knowledge and sale to innocent purchaser; "larceny" (Pen. Code, § 538; Civ. Code, § 2957, subd. 1).

Lien of chattel mortgage created under Minnesota law by filing mortgage for record in that state held not lost by mortgagor's removal of mortgaged automobile without mortgagee's knowledge or consent, and sale thereof to innocent purchaser in California, notwithstanding mortgagee's failure to make affidavit of good faith required by Civ. Code, § 2957, subd. 1, since removal of mortgaged car by driving it into another state is "larceny," under Pen. Code, § 538, and rule protecting mortgagees is not objectionable as affording inadequate protection to local citizens.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Larceny.]

5. Chattel mortgages 🔑89—Mortgagor who drives mortgaged car into another state and sells it without notifying mortgagee is guilty of larceny (Pen. Code, § 538).

Mortgagor who removes mortgaged automobile from county in which it is located at date of mortgage and drives it into another state and sells it without notifying mortgagee is guilty of larceny, under Pen. Code, § 538, to same extent as if he had actually stolen the machine from its rightful owner.

6. Evidence 🔑80(1)—Law of another state, in absence of contrary showing, is presumed identical with local statutory law.

In absence of contrary showing, court must presume that law of another state upon given subject is the same as local statutory law.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Suit by the Mercantile Acceptance Company against Albert L. Frank and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Superseding opinion in Court of Appeal (256 P. 259).

Lewinson & Barnhill, of Los Angeles, C. W. Mullins, of Seattle, Wash., E. E. Morris and Frank L. Kostlan, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. G. Shelton, of Glendora, Charles L. Evans, of Los Angeles, Arthur Wright, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants after the sustaining of general demurrers to the complaint. In the complaint it is alleged that the plaintiff is the owner of a chattel mortgage upon a Studebaker automobile, to recover which the action was brought. This chattel mortgage was given by the defendant Frank to secure the balance due on the purchase price of said automobile. This defendant was not served with process and has not appeared in the action. The automobile was purchased by Frank in the city of Minneapolis, county of Hennepin, state of Minnesota, from the assignor of the plaintiff. The chattel mortgage was executed and filed for record in the state of Minnesota, as provided by the laws of said state. Thereafter, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, Frank drove the automobile to California, where he sold it to the other defendants without any actual notice or knowledge on their part of plaintiff's chattel mortgage. While the mortgage was executed in accordance with the laws of Minnesota, it was not accompanied by the affidavit required in this state by subdivision 1 of section 2957 of the Civil Code. Neither was it recorded in this state prior to the sale of the automobile by Frank to the other defendants herein.

[1] It is a well-recognized principle of law in this state, as well as other jurisdictions, that the law of the place where a contract is made determines its validity. This rule is well and succinctly stated, as follows:

> "The validity and construction of a contract are determined by the law of the place where it is made. Accordingly, it is quite generally held that a contract valid in the place where made is valid everywhere; and that a contract invalid where made is invalid everywhere; and the validity or invalidity of a contract so determined will, on principles of comity, be recognized wherever it is sought to be enforced, even though the law of the forum would have determined otherwise if applied." 5 Cal. Jur. 449.

[2] There are certain exceptions to this rule, but none of these exceptions need be mentioned here, as they do not apply to or affect any question in the present action. Therefore the chattel mortgage of plaintiff upon the Studebaker automobile in controversy, even though it was not executed with formalities nor accompanied by the affidavit of good faith, required by the statute of this state, was, nevertheless, a valid and legal instrument not only in the state where executed, but in this or any other state into which the automobile might thereafter be brought.

The question whether the lien of such a mortgage executed in another state against the incumbered property is lost on the property being brought into this state has never been the subject of any decision of this court. In the case of Motor Investment Co. v. Breslauer, 64 Cal. App. 230, 221 P. 700, the District Court of Appeal held that the lien was not lost, but still subsisted after the property had been brought within this state, but in that action the mortgagee had learned of the location of the personal property, which also happened to be an automobile, and on learning that fact recorded its mortgage in the county where the property was being kept before a subsequent incumbrancer had advanced to the owner money on said machine and had taken a chattel mortgage thereon to secure the payment of the amount advanced. The chattel mortgage in that case was executed in the state of Oregon and in accordance with its laws and was not accompanied by the affidavit of good faith required by our statute.

The precise question in the present action was before the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Shapard v. Hynes, 104 F. 449, 52 L. R. A. 675. In that case the Circuit Court held as follows:

> "There has been much discussion concerning the effect of the removal of mortgaged goods and chattels from the state where the mortgage was made and recorded, to another state. The general consensus of judicial opinion seems to be that when personal property, which at the time is situated in a given state, is there mortgaged by the owner, and the mortgage is duly executed and recorded in the mode required by the local law, so as to create a valid lien, the lien remains good and effectual, although the property is removed to another state, either with or without the consent of the mortgagee, and although the mortgage is not re-recorded in the state to which the removal is made. The mortgage lien is given effect, however, in the state to which the property is removed, solely by virtue of the doctrine of comity. Hence a state may by appropriate legislation decline to observe the rule of comity, and may require all mortgages affecting personal property which is situated therein or brought therein to be there recorded, as a condition precedent to the recognition of their validity in that state. But the statutes of a state which prescribe how mortgages on personal property shall be executed and recorded are generally, if not universally, regarded as speaking with respect to mortgages made within the state upon property there situated, and as having no reference to personalty brought within the state which is at the time incumbered with a valid lien created elsewhere. These propositions are fully sustained by the following authorities: Hornthal v. Burwell, 109 N. C. 10, 13 S. E. 721, 13 L. R. A. 740 [26 Am. St. Rep. 556]; Smith v. McLean, 24 Iowa, 322, 328, 329; Handley v. Harris, 48 Kan. 606, 29 P. 1145, 17 L. R. A. 703 [30 Am. St. Rep. 322]; Bank v. Morris, 114 Mo. 255, 21 S. W. 511, 19 L. R. A. 463 [35 Am. St. Rep. 754]; Kanaga v. Taylor, 7 Ohio St. 134 [70 Am. Dec. 62]; Langworthy v. Little, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 109; Whitney v. Heywood, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 82; [Ames] Iron Works v. Warren, 76 Ind. 512 [40 Am. Rep. 258]; Feurt v. Rowell, 62 Mo. 524, 526; Cool v. Roche, 20 Neb. 550, 556, 31 N. W. 367; Keenan v. Stimson, 32 Minn. 377, 20 N. W. 364; Offutt v. Flagg, 10 N. H. 46; Lathe v. Schoff, 60 N. H. 34; Barrows v. Turner, 50 Me. 127; Hall v. Pillow, 31 Ark. 32; Mumford v. Canty, 50 Ill. 370 [99 Am. Dec. 525]; Ballard v. Winter [39 Conn. 179]; 12 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 759; Jones, Chat. Mortg. (4th Ed.) § 260."

That this is the generally accepted rule is declared in Corpus Juris, vol. 11, p. 424, in the following language:

> "The great weight of authority is to the effect that a chattel mortgage, properly executed and recorded according to the law of the place where the mortgage is executed and the property is located, will, if valid there, be held valid even as against creditors and purchasers in good faith in another state to which the property is removed by the mortgagor, unless there is some statute in that state to the contrary, or unless the transaction contravenes the settled law of policy of the forum. In some jurisdictions this is held to be the rule without regard to the presence or absence of consent or knowledge on the part of the mortgagee as to the removal, but by the better authority it seems that, where the mortgagee has consented to the removal of the property, he will forfeit his right to a lien unless he takes such steps as are required for its protection by the statutes of the state into which the property is removed. The recognition and enforcement of a lien of a mortgage executed in a foreign state is, however, a matter resting purely in comity; hence a state may by appropriate legislation decline to observe the rule of comity, and may require all mortgages affecting personal property which is situated therein or brought therein to be there recorded, as a condition precedent to the recognition of their validity in that state, and, although the requirement that an instrument conveying or affecting movable chattels shall be recorded in the place where the property is situated may not be in strict harmony with the common-law doctrine that the disposition of movables is to be governed by the law of the domicile of the owner, it is certainly competent for a state to adopt a modification of this kind to the disposition of any property within its territorial limits."

[3] There are only four states which do not recognize this doctrine, and which refuse to uphold the right of foreign mortgagees against the claims of innocent purchasers or attaching creditors. These states are Michigan, Louisiana, Pennsylvannia, and Texas. However, a chattel mortgage is not recognized in any form in Louisiana, no matter whether made without or within said state. Delop & Co. v. Windsor & Randolph, 26 La. Ann. 185. In Pennsylvania, a chattel mortgage is not recognized unless accompanied by a delivery to the mortgagee of the mortgaged property. In some states the question is regulated by statutes. 11 Corpus Juris, p. 426. In California we have no statute providing for the recording of a chattel mortgage executed out of the state on property thereafter brought into the state. Section 2959 of the Civil Code of this state providing for the recordation of chattel mortgages has reference in our opinion only to domestic chattel mortgages or chattel mortgages executed on personal property in this state at the date of its execution. Shapard v. Hynes, supra; Motor Investment Co. v. Breslauer, supra.

[4] As we have no express statute upon the subject, and as the great weight of authority is to the effect that a valid lien by chattel mortgage is not lost by the removal of the mortgaged property into a different state than that in which the property was located when mortgaged, we are of the opinion that we should follow the rule which has met almost the unanimous approval of the highest courts of this country. In doing so we are not accepting this rule simply because it has been sanctioned by the greater number of the courts of our land, but also for the reason that it appeals to us to be more just and fair than the contrary rule. The reason of this rule has been well expressed by Mr. Justice Hart in Motor Investment Co. v. Breslauer, supra, in the following apt and concise language:

> "The rule, however, appears to be founded upon the principles of equity and natural justice. As applied to cases of the character of the one before us, it can produce no harsh or unjust results. The principle underlying it may be analogized to that upon which the owner of property stolen from him and taken or transported to another state may follow the thief into the latter state and reclaim or take possession of the pilfered goods or chattels wherever found. A state may, it is true, refuse to recognize the rule of comity in such cases, but should it do so, it would become a party to every such fraudulent transaction. It is not going too far to say and to hold that it is preferable and more desirable that an innocent purchaser or encumbrancer of personal property brought into a state under such circumstances as those characterizing the transaction with which we are here concerned should suffer loss, which possibly his own improvidence or want of diligence has brought to him, than that the state should assume and maintain an attitude towards such transaction which would necessarily stigmatize it as an accessory after the fact to the fraud inhering therein."

In the case of Bonin v. Robertson, 2 Ter. Law Rep. (Canada) 21, which was a case precisely like the present action, the court said:

> "If a thief brings property stolen in Minnesota into this country he surely cannot take advantage of our laws to enable him to turn his stolen property into cash by passing, to even an innocent purchaser, a title which he has not, and so defeat the title of the original owner. For a mortgagor, in defiance of a solemn agreement entered into by him that he will not remove property or dispose of it in fraud of the mortgage, to remove and (as far as he can) dispose of that property, may not yet in this country bring him in conflict with our criminal laws, but is he not morally just as much a thief as the more vulgar criminal who furtively deprives his neighbor of his property?"

[5,6] We might add that, according to the laws of this state, the mortgagor, Frank, in removing the automobile from the county in which it was at the date of the mortgage and driving it into another state and selling it without notifying the mortgagee, was guilty of larceny to the same extent that he would have been had he actually stolen the machine from its rightful owner. Pen. Code, § 538. Nothing being shown to the contrary, we must presume that the law of Minnesota upon this subject is the same as that of our own state. The opinion in Bonin v. Robertson, supra, continues as follows:

> "Are we then to help him to convert this property so as to complete his attempt to deprive the mortgagee of his rights by selling it to a purchaser here—innocent or otherwise? I humbly submit not. If the contention of the plaintiff here were to prevail, that once chattels come across our boundary it is only a question of speed between the mortgagee in his pursuit after the fly by night mortgagor and this usually alert individual in finding an innocent purchaser obligingly ready to purchase without too much enquiry or too many troublesome questions, the property he has brought with him in his flight."

It is claimed, however, by respondents that by the adoption of this rule adequate protection to the citizens of this state will not be afforded, and that such rule is in conflict with another well-established rule that a state will not give effect to the laws of another on the principle of comity when the effect would be injurious to the state or its citizens. 12 Corpus Juris, 1401; Hill v. Spear, 50 N. H. 253, 9 Am. Rep. 205. In passing upon the question as to whether the rule contended for by the appellant adequately protects the rights of the citizens of our own state, we must consider this rule in all of its aspects. While the adoption of such a rule places upon the citizens of this state the duty of exercising a reasonable degree of care and diligence in purchasing property recently brought into the state, it also affords protection to our own citizens and secures them against the unlawful and criminal acts of mortgagors of personal property situated in this state. There are in this state, as there are in probably every other state in this country, vast sums of money loaned upon personal property, a large part of which is secured by chattel mortgages upon automobiles. To accept the rule for which respondents contend would be to jeopardize this large investment of capital by the citizens of our state in this class of securities. It would say to them:

> "Your security is valid so long as the property remains within this state, but the moment the mortgagor drives it over the state line your security is lost, and if the property is sold to a purchaser who has no knowledge of your lien, his title thereto is superior to any right you may have in said property."

It is true, the mortgagor in removing the property from the state and selling it has committed larceny and if apprehended may be prosecuted and punished for his crime. but this does not restore to the owner his lost property. When we look at this aspect of the question, the rule contended for by the appellant seems fair and just and, we think, completely answers the objection thereto raised by the respondents that its adoption and operation would injuriously affect our own citizens. As we view the question, its result would be to the great and lasting benefit and advantage of the citizens of our own state. There may be instances in which it would work a hardship upon the citizens of this state, but, as intimated by Judge Hart, their loss in most cases is the result of their "own improvidence or want of diligence." Their loss in our opinion would be but slight compared with that which might ensue to that larger body of our citizens who in good faith have invested their capital in chattel mortgages upon various kinds of personal property, and particularly upon motor vehicles.

In Texas, as we have seen, the courts do not recognize the lien of a chattel mortgage executed upon property situated without the state, when such property is brought within that state. The rule in that state goes further and is applied to conditional sales of personal property as well as chattel mortgages. Therefore, personal property in this state, for instance, an automobile bought under a conditional sales contract and by the purchaser taken into the state of Texas, without the knowledge or consent of the owner and for the express purpose of defrauding the owner of his rights therein, becomes free of all the conditions of said contract, and said purchaser may sell the same and give an absolutely good title thereto. Referring to the law of Texas upon this subject, Mr. Joseph H. Beale, in a recent article in the Harvard Law Review, says:

> "The operation of the Texas doctrine illustrates its inconvenience. It appears to be a regular course of business for a swindler to buy a motorcar on credit in California or elsewhere, drive it into Texas, and sell or pledge it there. The original seller is helpless in the face of this practice; and Texas will doubtless continue full of willing bona fide buyers. That this result is most unfortunate from the point of view of commercial practice is clear." Vol. XL, No. 6, Harvard Law Review.

It seems to us that the safer and saner rule, and that which is most in accord with our ideas of justice and fair dealing as well as with the best business methods, both as to chattel mortgages and conditional sales contracts, is that which, as we have already seen, is approved by the great weight of authority, and which provides that the law of a state, into which chattels have been surreptitiously removed against the will and without the knowledge or consent of the owner, or person having a lien thereon, will not apply to divest the title of the absent owner in one instance or impair the rights of the lienholder thereof in the other. There may be cases in which the owner of a chattel mortgage has not acted with due diligence in following and reclaiming the property which is the subject of his mortgage, or he may be estopped on account of his acts and conduct in reference to the mortgaged chattels from recovering them after their purchase by persons having no knowledge of the mortgage lien, but the complaint in this case shows no facts which would indicate that plaintiff's rights are subject to either of these defenses. The complaint in our opinion states a cause of action, and the demurrers thereto should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed.

WOOLNER v. HAWTHORNE IMPROVEMENT CO. et al. (L. A. 9125.) ★

Supreme Court of California. March 7, 1928.
Hearing Denied in Bank April 5, 1928.

Judgment ⚷143(12)—Refusing to set aside default where plaintiff failed, when offered opportunity to answer cross-complaint, held not abuse of discretion.

Where plaintiff failed to answer cross-complaint of substituted defendant, and refused at time of hearing on motion to strike out answer of such defendant to make and file answer to cross-complaint on condition default was vacated, trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing subsequent motion to set aside default and judgment entered pursuant thereto.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by H. S. Woolner against the Hawthorne Improvement Company and others, wherein Theodosia B. Conner was substituted as defendant and filed a cross-complaint. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside a default judgment entered pursuant to the cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred W. Heath, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chas. S. Conner, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order of the trial court, made and entered upon October 28, 1925, denying the motion of the plaintiff and appellant to set aside his default and the decree rendered against him thereon by reason of his failure to answer the cross-complaint of the substituted defendant in said action. The original complaint in this action to quiet title to certain real property in the county of Los Angeles was filed on April 23, 1923. One of the original defendants in said action appears to have been E. A. Montgomery, who filed an answer therein, wherein she denied that the plaintiff was the owner of any interest in the particular lot or parcel of land involved in this appeal. Some time thereafter she transferred her right, title, and interest in said property to Theodosia B. Connor by deed dated May 5, 1925, duly recorded in the records of Los Angeles county. Thereafter, and on or about June 18, 1925, said Theodosia B. Connor, served and filed in said action an answer and cross-complaint, in the latter of which she set forth affirmatively the chain of title upon which she relied for her ownership in fee of the particular lot in question, and upon which she prayed in her cross-complaint to have her title quieted thereto. The plaintiff's counsel was served with a copy of said answer and cross-complaint on June 18, 1925, and failed to answer the same, and his default for such failure to answer was entered on June 30, 1925. Thereafter, and on July 6, 1925, the plaintiff moved to strike the answer of Theodosia B. Conner from the files, upon the ground that it had been filed after issue had been joined through the previous filing of the answer of E. A. Montgomery, and that the answer of Theodosia B. Conner had been filed without leave of court first had and obtained. The trial court, upon a hearing thereon on said date, denied said motion, and its order denying the same not having been appealed from has become final. Judgment having been rendered and entered on August 10, 1925, upon said default, and no appeal having been taken therefrom, the said judgment became final within the time required by law, subject, however, to the right of the plaintiff to obtain relief therefrom under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On or about October 27, 1925, the plaintiff served and filed a notice of motion to set aside said default and judgment, and for leave to answer said cross-complaint upon the grounds of inadvertence and excusable neglect, basing the same upon the affidavit of his attorney of record, wherein the latter undertook to set forth that said cross-complaint had been filed without leave of the court first had and obtained, and that said cross-complaint was defective and insufficient, and that said plaintiff had a good and sufficient defense thereto upon the merits, and upon the further ground that the plaintiff had been absent from the county of Los Angeles during much of the intervening time since the entry of said default and judgment. A counter affidavit was filed thereto by Charles S. Conner, attorney of record for the cross-complainant, wherein most of the averments of the affidavit of plaintiff's counsel in support of said motion were denied, and wherein also it was affirmatively set forth that at or about the time of the hearing of the plaintiff's first motion to strike out the answer of Theodosia B. Conner, the latter's counsel making said counter affidavit, made an offer in open court that, if the plaintiff would make and file his answer to the cross-complaint at once, the affiant would submit to the vacation of said default, but that the plaintiff wholly disregarded said offer, and knowingly allowed judgment to be taken on the default 35 days thereafter. Upon the hearing upon the plaintiff's motion of October 28, 1925, the plaintiff presented and offered to file his answer to said cross-complaint. The trial court denied the motion on the date of the hearing thereon.

The only question presented upon this appeal is whether the trial court, under the foregoing circumstances, abused its discretion in refusing to grant the plaintiff's long-delayed motion to set aside said default and judgment. We are unable to discover any such gross abuse of discretion as would justify this court in setting aside the order of the trial court made and entered under the circumstances above set forth.

The order is affirmed.

BARTLETT HAYWARD CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.★

(S. F. 12626.)

Supreme Court of California. March 2, 1928.

Rehearing Denied March 29, 1928.

1. Master and servant 🔑419—Workmen's compensation legislation in 1917 enlarged power of commission in its continuing jurisdiction to alter awards (Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, §§ 20 [d], 69 [a]; Const. art. 20, § 21, as amended in 1918).

Enactment in 1917, pursuant to Const. art. 20, § 21, as amended in 1918, of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20 (d), being St. 1917, p. 850, held, in view of Workmen's Compensation Act 1913, §§ 25 (d), 82 (a), (b), 86 (a), being St. 1913, pp. 293, 317, 319, and under the liberal construction provided by section 69 (a) of 1917 act (St. 1917, p. 877), to have enlarged the power of the Industrial Accident Commission as to its continuing jurisdiction to alter, amend, or rescind any order, decision, or award on good cause being shown therefor.

2. Master and servant 🔑419—Continuing jurisdiction of commission extends to right to rescind, alter, or amend orders, decisions, or awards on good cause appearing (Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 20 [d]).

Under Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 20 (d), being St. 1917, p. 850, the power of the Industrial Accident Commission as to its continuing jurisdiction is not limited to consideration of changes in physical condition of workman, but is extended to right to rescind, alter, or amend orders, decisions, or awards on good cause appearing therefor.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by John George Slate, employee, for loss of the sight of his right eye, opposed by the Bartlett Hayward Company, employer, and the Ocean Accident & Guaranty Company, Limited, insurer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission granting an award, employer and insurer petition for certiorari. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

John B. Haas and John D. Home, both of Los Angeles, and G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is a proceeding to review and annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission. On October 2, 1922, John George Slate, a boilermaker's helper, 37 years of age, suffered an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment with the petitioner, Bartlett Hayward Company, which caused the loss of his right eye. On June 1, 1923, he filed an application for compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. St. 1913, p. 279, as amended. The jurisdictional facts were stipulated and the only issue was the disability rating. At the hearing before the commission it appeared that the applicant had previously, in 1914, lost the sight of his left eye, and after the accident in 1922 the applicant was sightless. On July 12, 1923, the commission found that:

> "Said injury caused permanent disability consisting of loss of sight of right eye, with cosmetic defect due to coloboma of iris, upper half of iris being torn loose; also cosmetic defect of upper lid, margin of upper lid being sigmoid shaped. The percentage of said permanent disability is 25, entitling him to $20.83 a week for 100 weeks, amounting to $2,083,"

—and made its award accordingly. No petition for a rehearing was filed. Nothing thereafter was done by the applicant with reference to the award until after the decision of this court in the Liptak Case, which was decided on December 16, 1926. Liptak v. Industrial Accident Com., 200 Cal. 39, 251 P. 635. In that case the petitioner had previously been deprived of the sight of one eye. He then lost the sight of his remaining eye in an industrial accident and sought compensation therefor. The commission made an award, basing the same on a partial disability rating of 26¼ per cent. He contended before the commission that he was entitled to a rating of permanent total disability on the theory that the loss of his remaining eye was a total and permanent loss of vision. He sought a rehearing, which was denied. On his petition for a writ of review this court decided that upon a proper construction of subdivisions (9) and (10) of subsection 2 of section 9 of the act (St. 1917, p. 839, as amended) the petitioner was entitled to a permanent total disability rating, annulled the award, and directed the commission to proceed in accordance with such determination.

Thereafter, on March 4, 1927, the applicant herein filed with the commission his petition praying that the commission amend its findings and award to conform to the holding in the Liptak Case and allow a rating of 100 per cent. permanent disability. The commission entertained the petition, granted a hearing, and on May 14, 1927, made its order reciting that "good cause" appeared therefor and amended its former findings and award to the end that applicant should receive compensation based on 100 per cent. permanent disability. Subsequently and within the time prescribed by law the employer, Bartlett Hayward Company, and its insurance carrier, Ocean Accident & Guaranty Corporation, Limited, applied for a rehearing on the ground, among others, that the commission acted without and in excess of its jurisdiction, claiming that the findings and award of July 12, 1923, had finally adjudicated the rights of the parties and that there was not shown any new or further disability which would give the commission the power to increase the award pursuant to the continuing jurisdiction conferred on it by subdivision (d) of section 20 of the act. St. 1917, p. 850. The application for a rehearing was denied, whereupon this proceeding was brought.

If the commission had the power to reopen the case and amend its award under the foregoing facts, such power was derived from section 20 (d) of the Act of 1917, which provides:

> "(d) The commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections six to thirty-one, inclusive, of this act and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor, such power including the right to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate, within the limits prescribed by this act, any compensation awarded, upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated; provided, that no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of the injury. Any order, decision or award rescinding, altering or amending a prior order, decision or award shall have the same effect as is herein provided for original orders, decisions or awards."

The respondents take the position that the power given by the foregoing provisions of the act is a broad power which enables the commission, during the continuing jurisdiction so vested in it, to rescind, alter, or amend any order, decision, or award on good cause being shown therefor; that the phrase, "Such power including the right to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate, * * * any compensation awarded, upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated," does not have the effect of limiting the power of the commission exclusively to that specifically defined, but on the contrary operates as an extension definitely of the power of the commission to that specifically mentioned. On the other hand, petitioners contend that the portion of the section last quoted is such a limiting phrase and has been so interpreted by this court in the case of Georgia Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 289, 170 P. 625, and in cases referring to that case with approval. The Georgia Casualty Company Case, decided in January, 1918, announced the construction and meaning of section 25 (d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913. St. 1913, p. 293. Section 25 (d) of the 1913 Act provided:

> "(d) The commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections twelve to thirty-five, inclusive, of this act and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor; provided, that no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of the accident. * * *"

Section 82 of the Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 317), in subdivision (a) thereof, authorized any party aggrieved to apply to the commission for a rehearing on five separate grounds and none others, and subdivision (b) of said section provided as follows:

> "Nothing contained in this section shall, however, be construed to limit the right of the commission, at any time within two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of its award, and from time to time, after due notice and upon the application of any party interested, to review, diminish or increase, within the limits provided by this act, any compensation awarded upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either increased or diminished or terminated."

In the Georgia Casualty Company Case it was held that said sections 25 (d) and 82 (b) of the 1913 Act should be read together and when so read section 82 (b) operated as a limitation upon the more general terms of section 25 (d) and confined the subject-matter of the re-examination within the 245 weeks to new facts occurring since the original award, and not to a reconsideration of the facts upon which the former award was made. That proceeding was commenced by the filing of the petition in this court on July 17, 1916. Before the Legislature of 1917 convened, the petitioner had served its brief on counsel for the commission wherein the claim was advanced that although said section 25 (d), standing alone, would appear on its face to give the commission unlimited jurisdiction to alter or amend its awards at any time within 245 weeks from the date of the injury, yet when said section 25 (d) was read and considered in connection with said section 82 (b) it should be concluded that the Legislature intended to limit the power of the commission in so altering or amending its awards to the ground only that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either increased or diminished or terminated. It is not difficult to surmise that this attack on the power of the commission was the subject of consideration by the Legislature in 1917, and that it prompted the amendments to the statute and re-enactments therein during that session. The subject-matter of section 82 (b) of the 1913 Act relating to rehearings before the commission was incorporated and re-enacted in section 65 of the new statute. (St. 1917, p. 874). There was this significant change, however, in the amended and re-enacted statute. The grant of the continuing jurisdiction was eliminated from said section 65, and subdivision (b) thereof was made to read as follows:

> "(b) Nothing contained in this section shall, however, be construed to limit the grant of continuing jurisdiction contained in subsection (d) of section twenty of this act."

[1] Subsection (d) of section 20 was then worded as above quoted. The vital question now presented is, Did the Legislature in 1917, by the enactment of section 20 (d) of the act, intend to enlarge the continuing jurisdiction of the commission or to leave the same as it had theretofore been in force? We are persuaded that the enactments of 1917, when properly construed, had the effect of enlarging the power of the commission in its continuing jurisdiction. We approach the subject in this regard in the light of the history of the Workmen's Compensation Laws in this state, both constitutional and statutory.

At the special election held October 10, 1911, the original constitutional provision (section 21 of article 20) was adopted, in which it was provided that:

> "The Legislature may by appropriate legislation create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employees for any injury incurred by the said employees in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of either party. * * *"

This step was a distinct innovation in this state respecting liability and remedies as between employer and employee. It enabled the Legislature to deprive the trial courts of the state of jurisdiction over such disputes and to deny to the employee the right to a jury trial. Dominguez v. Pendola, 46 Cal. App. 220, 188 P. 1025. It also took from the workman many other common-law remedies. As compensation for such deprivations, it enabled the Legislature to afford him compensation regardless of his own negligence. While the new laws on this subject have administered a severe wrenching to many preconceived notions of legal wrongs and remedies, a casual observation of the tendency of such legislation and of the construction and interpretation thereof by the courts has disclosed a gradual breaking away from the technical rules of practice and procedure in the administration of such laws. Section 86 (a) of the Act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 319) definitely enjoined a liberal construction of the act upon the courts in the following language:

> "Whenever this act, or any part or section thereof, is interpreted by a court, it shall be liberally construed by such court."

This language was in general terms, and applicable to either party to a proceeding. Section 69 (a) of the Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 877) went further and provided:

> "Whenever this act, or any part or section thereof, is interpreted by a court, it shall be liberally construed by such court with the purpose of extending the benefits of the act for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment."

We also find the direct mandate of the people of the state in section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution, as amended in 1918 as follows:

> "The Legislature is hereby expressly vested with plenary power, unlimited by any provision of this Constitution, to create, and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, by appropriate legislation. * * * A complete system of workmen's compensation includes * * * full provision for otherwise securing the payment of compensation; and full provision for vesting power, authority and jurisdiction in an administrative body with all the requisite governmental functions to determine any dispute or matter arising under such legislation, to the end that the administration of such legislation shall accomplish substantial justice in all cases expeditiously, inexpensively, and without incumbrance of any character; all of which matters are expressly declared to be the social public policy of this state, binding upon all departments of the state government.
> "The Legislature * * * may fix and control the method and manner of trial of any such dispute, the rules of evidence and the manner of review of decisions rendered by the tribunal or tribunals designated by it."

By the foregoing constitutional amendment the legislation of 1917 was given the stamp of approval as the social public policy of the state in its remedial and humanitarian purposes. So when the language of section 20 (d) of the Act of 1917 is approached in the light of the foregoing considerations, the conclusion seems inevitable that it was intended thereby to enlarge and extend the continuing jurisdiction of the commission beyond that which had obtained under the Act of 1913. Indeed, the wording of the 1917 enactment, without any collateral aids of interpretation, would seem to admit of no other reasonable construction than that by so combining sections 25 (d) and 82 (b) of the 1913 Act into section 20 (d) of the statute of 1917, it was intended by the use of the phrase "including the right" to enlarge and extend the continuing jurisdiction of the commission beyond the power theretofore possessed by it merely to "review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate" any compensation awarded upon the ground that the disability had "recurred, increased, diminished or terminated" and to embrace the power to rescind, alter or amend its orders, decisions and awards within the period of 245 weeks "upon good cause appearing therefor."

The interpretation of section 20 (d) of the Act of 1917 was under consideration by the District Court of Appeal in the case of Kennedy v. Industrial Acc. Com., 50 Cal. App. 184, 195 P. 267. In that case it was contended by the petitioner that the enactment of section 20 (d) in 1917 endowed the commission with no broader powers than were conferred upon it by sections 25 (d) and 82 (b) of the Act of 1913 as construed by this court in the Georgia Casualty Company Case. Commenting on this contention, it was said by the court, speaking through Mr. Presiding Justice Finlayson:

> "The vice of counsel's argument lies in the assumption that the 'continuing jurisdiction' conferred upon the commission by the Act of 1917 is no greater or other than that which had been conferred upon it by the Act of 1913. Under the Act of 1913 'continuing jurisdiction' was given to the commission in general terms by subdivision (d) of section 25. * * * No such narrow construction can be put upon the language of subdivision (d) of section 20 of the present act whereby 'continuing jurisdiction' is conferred upon the commission. The sections of the Act of 1913 that related to the commission's continuing jurisdiction—section 25, subdivision (d), and section 82, subdivision (b)—could be harmonized only by construing the general terms of section 25 as limited by the more restrictive language of section 82. But the broad grant of continuing jurisdiction as conferred by the general terms of subdivision (d) of section 20 of the present act is not to be thus limited by the more particular reference in that section to the commission's right 'to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate' any award upon the ground 'that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated.' True, subdivision (d) of section 20 of the present act is, to a large extent, a re-embodiment, mutatis mutandis, of subdivision (d) of section 25 and subdivision (b) of section 82 of the Act of 1913, the provisions of these two sections of the Act of 1913 being embodied, with but few, but important, changes, in subdivision (d) of section 20 of the Act of 1917. But though subdivision (d) of section 20 of the Act of 1917 is largely a re-embodiment of subdivision (d) of section 25 and subdivision (b) of section 82 of the Act of 1913, still subdivision (d) of section 20 of the present act is vastly different from a mere re-enactment of the corresponding provisions of the Act of 1913. The present act, in subdivision (d) of section 20, declares, in general terms, that at any time within 245 weeks from the date of the injury the commission 'shall have continuing jurisdiction over its orders, decisions and awards * * * and may at any time, upon notice and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it, upon good cause appearing therefor.' This general grant, in itself unlimited save as to the time within which the power may be exercised, is followed by a more particular provision, namely, a particular reference to the power of the commission to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate any award 'upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished, or terminated.' But the language of this more specific or particular reference to the exercise of the commission's 'continuing jurisdiction,' so far from limiting the preceding general grant of power, implies the very opposite. The use of the word 'including,' in the phrase 'such power including the right to review,' etc., indicates that the power that the commission may exercise under its grant of continuing jurisdiction is more than the mere power to 'review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate' an award on the ground that the disability has 'recurred, increased, diminished or terminated.' 'Including' is not a word of limitation. Rather, it is a word of enlargement, and in ordinary signification implies that something else has been given beyond the general language that precedes it. Fraser v. Bentel, 161 Cal. 394, 119 P. 509, Ann. Cas. 1913b, 1062; In re Goetz, 71 App. Div. 272, 75 N. Y. S. 750. As here employed, the word 'including' is used to express the idea that the specific power to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase, or terminate an award upon the ground that the disability has recurred, increased, diminished or terminated—a particular power specifically referred to in the section of the present act—is but a part of the larger and more comprehensive power conferred by the more general language of the immediately preceding clause of the section. One of the definitions of 'include,' as given by Webster, is: To comprehend or comprise, as a genus the species, the whole a part, an argument or reason the inference; to contain; to embrace.

"For these reasons we conclude that the particular power conferred by that clause of subdivision (d) of section 20 which begins with the words 'such power, including the right to review' is but a part of, and not a limitation upon, the larger, and more general power granted by the clause which confers upon the commission 'continuing jurisdiction' or power 'to rescind, alter or amend any * * * order, decision or award made by it, good cause appearing therefor.'"

True, in denying a petition for hearing in this court, any intimation of an opinion as to the correctness of the construction placed upon the language of section 20 (d) of the Act of 1917 as to the continuing jurisdiction of the commission was reserved. The decision was fully supported on other grounds. But on further consideration we are satisfied that the construction placed upon the enactment of 1917 by the District Court of Appeal is in harmony with the spirit and intent of our Workmen's Compensation Laws as contemplated by the Constitution of the state and the attitude of the Legislature. Indeed, such construction reflects the obvious meaning of the language of the statute. To hold otherwise would be to amend the act by judicial interpretation.

[2-4] It is our conclusion, therefore, that the continuing jurisdiction of the commission as provided by section 20 (d) of the Act of 1917 is not limited to the consideration of changes in the physical condition of the workman, but is extended to the right to rescind, alter or amend the orders, decisions, or awards upon good cause appearing therefor. What constitutes "good cause" depends largely upon the circumstances of each case. The term is relative. It may be assumed that the determination of the commission as to what constitutes "good cause," while entitled to great weight, would not be conclusive. Certainly it may be said, so far as the facts in the present case are concerned, that the mistake or inadvertence of the commission in giving the injured workman, Slate, a rating of 25 per cent. permanent disability, when as matter of law on the undisputed facts he was entitled to a rating of 100 per cent. permanent disability, would constitute "good cause" for the exercise of continuing jurisdiction of the commission. In fact, the demands of justice would seem to require that the compensation be so increased under the circumstances here shown.

It is earnestly insisted by the petitioner that to extend the continuing jurisdiction of the commission to include the power to "rescind, alter or amend" any "order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor," except when a change in the physical condition of the employee is shown, is to do violence to the doctrine of res adjudicata, which it is claimed the Legislature plainly intended to ingraft upon the Workmen's Compensation Act by the provisions thereof relating to rehearings before the commission. The contention is predicated on the terms of sections 64 and 65 of the act. Section 64 in subsection (a) (St. 1917, p. 873) provides that any party or person aggrieved by any final order, decision, award, rule, or regulation of the commission may apply to the commission for a rehearing thereon. Subdivision (b) provides that:

> "No cause of action arising out of any such final order, decision or award shall accrue in any court to any person until and unless such person shall have made application for such rehearing, and such application shall have been granted or denied."

Subdivision (c) provides that:

> "Such application shall set forth specifically and in full detail the grounds upon which the applicant considers said final order, decision, award, rule or regulation is unjust or unlawful, and every issue to be considered by the commission. * * * The applicant for such hearing shall be deemed to have finally waived all objections, irregularities and illegalities concerning the matter upon which such rehearing is sought other than those set forth in the application for such rehearing."

Subdivisions (d) and (e) (St. 1917, p. 874) relate largely to procedural matters on the rehearing. Subdivision (f) provides that:

> "If after such rehearing and a consideration of all the facts, including those arising since the making of the order, decision or award involved, the commission shall be of the opinion that the original order, decision or award, or any part thereof, is in any respect unjust or unwarranted, or should be changed, the commission may abrogate, change or modify the same."

Parenthetically it may here be observed that if the argument of the petitioners with reference to the construction of the phrase in section 20 (d) of the present act, namely, "including the right to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate, * * * any compensation awarded," be applied to the phrase in subdivision (f) of section 64 of the act, namely, "including those [facts] arising since the making of the order, decision or award"—and we perceive no reason why the same argument might not properly be applied to both—it would inevitably follow that the power of the commission on rehearing would be confined to a consideration of those facts only as had arisen since the making of the original order, decision, or award, and would exclude from further consideration the facts arising prior thereto. Such a conclusion would not bear the semblance of reason, as the obvious purpose of the rehearing is to enable the commission to re-examine all the facts and circumstances occurring prior to the order, decision, or award—and not only the facts, but also the law in the premises.

Reverting to the further terms of the act governing rehearings, it is provided in subdivision (a) of section 65 that:

> "At any time within twenty days after the service of any final order or decision of the commission awarding or denying compensation, or arising out of or incidental thereto, any party or parties aggrieved thereby may apply for such rehearing upon one or more of the following grounds and upon no other grounds."

The specific allowable grounds for rehearing are next set out and are as follows:

> "(1) That the commission acted without or in excess of its powers. (2) That the order, decision, or award was procured by fraud. (3) That the evidence does not justify the findings of fact. (4) That the applicant has discovered new evidence, material to him, which he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the hearing. (5) That the findings of fact do not support the order, decision or award."

It is then provided in subdivision (b) that:

> "Nothing contained in this section shall, however, be construed to limit the grant of continuing jurisdiction contained in subsection (d) of section twenty of this act."

[5] In view of the foregoing provisions of sections 64 and 65 it is argued by the petitioners that since the employee in the present proceeding made no application for a rehearing before the commission, and by that means did not seek to correct the award and obtain the lawful rating on his total permanent disability, he not only became estopped from seeking redress in the courts, but the power of the commission to act in the premises was exhausted. It is clear from the terms of subdivision (b) of section 64 that the employee, Slate, was barred from resorting to the courts for redress by his failure to apply for a rehearing, but from that fact it would not follow that the commission was estopped from exercising its continuing jurisdiction when invoked by the employee or on the commission's own motion. We find no provision of the act which operates as an estoppel as against the commission to exercise its continuing jurisdiction within the stated time, either as to the changed condition of the injured employee or as to the other matters, law or fact, which would constitute "good cause" for the exercise thereof.

[6-8] The principles involved in the doctrine of res adjudicata are incorporated in the Code of Civil Procedure (section 1908 et seq.), but those sections of the Code are merely declaratory of the common-law rules. Ferrea v. Chabot, 63 Cal. 564, 567. Since by the Workmen's Compensation Law the injured employee has been deprived of the rules of the common law as weapons of offense to obtain redress for injuries sustained by him, it would seem to be in harmony with the spirit, purpose, and intent of such laws not to permit (except where, in the furtherance of the proper administration of the law, it should be done) common-law rules to be invoked by his adversary as weapons of defense to defeat his claim. See Brooks v. A. A. Davis & Co., 124 Okl. 140, 254 P. 68, 70. The doctrine of res adjudicata rests in estoppel. The act in question imposes an estoppel against the employee as to any recourse to the courts, unless he applies for a rehearing before the commission. But when we have in mind the question of the power of the commission, the purpose and intent of the law is to vest in the commission complete control of controversies between employer and employee, subject to the rules and regulations provided by the legislative branch. Resort to and interference by the courts may take place only in accordance with such rules and regulations. It is not to be assumed that the commission will abuse its powers. If it should do so, the Legislature in the act itself has provided adequate means for a check through the instrumentality of the courts.

There is nothing novel in vesting in a commission, such as our Industrial Accident Commission, the power to correct its mistakes both as to the law and the facts after it has once acted and in the furtherance of justice as between the parties. The United States government and all but four of the states have enacted Workmen's Compensation Laws. By act of Congress compensation for injuries to civil employees of the United States has been provided for. The commission appointed to administer the law is given power to modify prior awards by ending, increasing, or diminishing the compensation, or, if compensation has been once refused, to award compensation as the equities of each case may require. 39 U. S. Stat. at Large, 742, 749, §§ 37, 38 (5 USCA §§ 787, 788). In the states of Pennsylvania, Texas, Colorado, Kansas, and the Territory of Hawaii the commission may review its prior awards because of changed conditions, and may rescind, alter, or amend the same upon equitable grounds, such as mistake, fraud, coercion, undue influence, or gross inadequacy or excessiveness in the prior award. In the states of New York, Massachusetts, Maryland, Ohio, Oklahoma, Utah, and West Virginia the commission or administrative body may modify its prior awards within the compensation period as in its opinion may be justified. In Delaware, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri, Nebraska, South Dakota, Vermont, and Virginia the continuing jurisdiction of the commission would seem to be limited by the wording of the statute to the power to modify a prior award on account only of a change of conditions. That is, in these ten states there is no specific provision of the statute authorizing the commission to rescind, alter, or amend prior awards on equitable grounds. The court in at least one of those states, however, has construed this grant of power to include the right on the part of the commission to set aside a prior award on such grounds. Vodopich v. Trojan Min. Co., 43 S. D. 540, 180 N. W. 965. In Minnesota the commission is authorized to modify its prior awards for cause. North Dakota has substantially the same provision. In Wisconsin the single ground of "mistake" is specified. In Wyoming the continuing jurisdiction is merely to terminate the award when the employee has fully recovered.

Generally, it may be said that a survey of the Workmen's Compensation Laws in the several jurisdictions discloses that the idea of continuing jurisdiction has been put into almost universal practice. The vesting of power in the commission to change its awards on account of the changed conditions of the injured employee is a common statutory provision, and placing within the discretion of the commission the power to modify prior awards on equitable grounds is not uncommon.

The petitioners point out that in many states where continuing jurisdiction is vested in the commission to correct its mistakes or modify its awards on equitable grounds, there is no provision for a rehearing. This may be conceded, but it does not therefore follow that such continuing jurisdiction may not properly be granted the commission when a rehearing is also provided for. In Colorado both are provided for and are made effective. Employers' Mut. Ins. Corp. v. Industrial Commission of Colorado, 78 Colo. 501, 242 P. 988; State Compensation Ins. Fund v. Industrial Commission of Colorado, 80 Colo. 130, 249 P. 653.

It is earnestly insisted by the petitioners that this court and the District Courts of Appeal, since the adoption of the 1917 Act, have adhered to the Georgia Casualty Company Case and have foreclosed the respondents herein as to their present contentions. The cases of McBride v. Industrial Acc. Com., 182 Cal. 407, 187 P. 1050; National Engineering Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 193 Cal. 422, 225 P. 2; Hogeburg v. Industrial Acc. Com., 73 Cal. Dec. 593; Northern Redwood Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 44 Cal. App. 61, 185 P. 991; Grand Union Hotel v. Industrial Acc. Com., 67 Cal. App. 123, 226 P. 76; and Benton v. Industrial Acc. Com., 74 Cal. App. 411, 240 P. 1021—are particularly referred to and relied upon.

In the foregoing cases varying situations of fact were presented. In the McBride Case the commission had reserved its award for medical, surgical, and hospital treatment pending the procuring of vouchers and necessary information for a supplemental award. In denying a petition for rehearing the application for writ of review, this court very correctly stated that the Georgia Casualty Case, which was relied on by the petitioner, was not in point on the question presented. The National Engineering Corporation Case was one involving a changed condition in the disability of the employee and this circumstance, it was held, distinguished the case from the Georgia Casualty Company Case. It it unnecessary to mention chronologically or otherwise the many orders of the commission in the Hogeburg Case which it was contended operated as res adjudicata and prevented a reopening of the case by the commission after the 20-day period. It is sufficient to say, as was pointed out in the opinion in that case, that the prior orders were not on the merits and therefore did not operate as a bar to a rehearing of the case on the ground of changed disability. The rule of the Georgia Casualty Company Case was referred to with apparent approval, but what was said on that subject was not necessary to the decision and the change in the statute after the decision in the Georgia Casualty Company Case was not commented upon. In the Northern Redwood Lumber Company Case the District Court of Appeal considered that it was bound by the Georgia Casualty Company Case in interpreting section 20 (d) of the 1917 Act without, however, noting the change in the language of the section. The Grand Union Hotel Case involved a change in the physical condition of the employee during the period between the submission of the case to the commission and the date of the award. The court held that the date of submission was controlling and not the date of the award, and that the Georgia Casualty Company Case would not govern because the point there decided was not involved. In the Benton Case the District Court of Appeal followed its own case in Hindes v. Industrial Accident Commission, 73 Cal. App. 726, 239 P. 339, which in turn was based on the Georgia Casualty Company Case with apparently no consideration given to the amended statute.

It is thus seen that of the seven cases which it is contended by petitioners finally establish the meaning to be given to the language of section 20 (d) of the 1917 Act, one, the Georgia Casualty Company Case, interpreted the provisions of the 1913 Act; and the only two in point of the other six cases, the Northern Redwood Lumber Company Case and the Benton Case, followed the interpretation of the 1913 Act in the Georgia Casualty Case without noting the change in phraseology in the 1917 Act nor considering what, if any, change of meaning it effected. In fact, no case cited or found in our research, with the exception of the Kennedy Case, has recognized that there has been a change in the wording of the section. When the conclusion is once reached that the 1917 Legislature accomplished a material change in the effect of the law governing the continuing jurisdiction of the commission, and such a conclusion cannot be avoided, the inappropriateness of following the Georgia Casualty Company Case as controlling authority in the construction of the later law is apparent. It is not contended by any party to this proceeding that the Georgia Casualty Company Case was not correctly decided on the then existing law. Nor do we now question the soundness of its conclusions. What we do hold is that that case and the other cases which follow it and rely upon it cannot serve as controlling precedents for the proper interpretation of the subsequent and different legislation.

The petitioners urge, as an additional reason why the award involved herein should be annulled, that the Liptak Case was wrongly decided and they suggest that, should it be deemed advisable now so to declare, it would then become unnecessary at this time to determine the broader question of the scope of the continuing jurisdiction of the commission under the 1917 statute. Whatever may be the arguments for and against the correctness in point of law or the wisdom of the decision in the Liptak Case, it is enough to say that the decision in that case is only collateral to the paramount question of jurisdiction in the case at bar. If the economic result of the law as declared in the Liptak Case has been to place one-eyed men in a disfavored class from the employer's standpoint, the remedy in their favor should be sought from the Legislature which has plenary power in the premises.

Finally, it is contended by petitioners that the effect of judicial approval of the extension of the continuing jurisdiction of the commission to questions of equitable and kindred cognizance would result in consequences to insurance carriers never heretofore contemplated. It is stated that the petitioner insurance carrier has set aside no reserve in anticipation of the exercise of such power by the commission and is therefore unprepared to meet such an unexpected emergency. It is further stated that, if the continuing jurisdiction contended for by the commission is recognized and exercised, it will be impossible to write insurance covering compensation hazards in this state. No difficulty seems to have been encountered in covering such hazards in the light of the long exercise by the commission of its continuing power to increase awards during the 245 weeks on account of change in the physical condition of the employee. Without investigating the subject we venture the assertion that in the many jurisdictions where the continuing jurisdiction of the commission extends as well to a consideration of equitable grounds in the modification of prior awards, insurance companies are engaged in assuming the hazards of industrial compensation. Furthermore, the petitioners would seem to assume that the exercise by the commission of its broader powers would necessarily result in the increase of such hazards. We think not. Without doubt the commission will be called upon in many cases by the employer and the insurance carrier as well as by the employee to alter, amend, or rescind an award for mistake, fraud, etc., as the right and justice of the case may require. It cannot be assumed that the mere possession of power to act would result in the exercise of that power in favor of one class of litigants as against another.

The net result of the recognition of the continuing jurisdiction of the commission over controversies pending before it for the full period provided by the Legislature will make for the final adjustment of such controversies by the tribunal established by the people of the state for that particular purpose and in a manner in harmony with the spirit and purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Law. The desirability of repose in controversies before the commission by lapse of time, so earnestly urged by the petitioners, is fully appreciated. But it is for the Legislature, and not for the courts, to say how long the determination of a controversy involving an industrial accident shall remain in the breast of the commission before the same shall be barred by lapse of time. Assuming the existence of the power in the commission, the period of 245 weeks is not now questioned as a proper legislative declaration of the time within which the power may be exercised.

The award is affirmed.

BROWN v. FEATHER RIVER LUMBER CO.
(Sac. 3902.)

Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1928.

1. Railroads ⚷282(15)—Complaint alleging conductor of logging train, with employer's knowledge, invited deceased to ride stated cause of action for death when train was wrecked, because showing deceased was invitee.

Allegations to effect that conductors of logging railroad were in habit of permitting persons to ride upon trains as a convenience, and that such acts and conduct on their part were known to defendant's managing agents, and that conductor acting in course of his authority expressly invited deceased to ride on train, which was wrecked, and deceased killed, held sufficient to submit to jury question as to whether defendant's managing agents had not expressly authorized or ratified conductor's conduct in extending invitation to deceased so as to raise an issue of fact for jury as to whether or not deceased was an implied invitee of defendant, and hence sustaining of demurrer to complaint was error.

2. Railroads ⚷276(2)—Railroad invitee is entitled only to degree of care commensurate with character of train.

Where one is riding railroad train as an invitee, he is entitled only to degree of care commensurate with character of train.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Belfield Brown against the Feather River Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Wm. C. Ring and Faucett & Ring, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, and Price & Hawkins, of Reno, Nev., for respondent.

PRESTON, J. [1] Plaintiff sues defendant for the death of his son, a minor of the age of 18 years, basing his cause of action upon allegations of negligence with respect to the management and operation of a logging railroad upon which deceased was riding at the time of his death. We are here concerned solely with the sufficiency as a pleading of the second amended complaint, to which the court below sustained a demurrer without leave to amend. Said second amended complaint, hereinafter referred to as "complaint," alleges:

"That on the 28th day of May, 1922, and long prior thereto, at the county of Plumas, state of California, defendant was engaged in the business of cutting timber and manufacturing lumber and, in this connection, was operating a sawmill and railroad, which said railroad was used by said defendant to haul or convey timber to said mill by means of a locomotive or engine, together with railroad cars, operated on said railroad.

"Said defendant maintained a camp, or small town, wherein employees working at said lumber business resided.

"That on said 28th day of May, 1922, and long prior thereto, those residing in said camp or town were permitted by the defendant's agents and servants, to wit, defendant's conductors in charge of and operating said train, to ride upon said train, as convenience in going up and down said tracks, and were so permitted to ride without hire.

"That defendant's said conductor's acts and conduct in permitting those residing in said camp or town to ride on said trains, as aforesaid, was well known to defendant's managing agents and superintendent, and said managing agents and superintendent ratified said act and conduct of defendant's said conductors in permitting those living in said camp or town to ride upon said trains, as aforesaid, and acquiesced therein.

"That on or about said 28th day of May, 1922, one Delmar Brown, a minor of the age of 18 years, the son of the plaintiff herein, was residing at said camp or town so maintained by said defendant and was an employee of said defendant, although said Delmar Brown, deceased, was not engaged in work on said 28th day of May, 1922, nor engaged in any line or scope of employment of defendant, but was walking along said track or railroad in pursuit of his own recreation or pleasure, and had reached a point about 5 miles distant from said camp or town, at which said time and place defendant's said train was standing on its said railroad, and was about to start up and proceed down said track in the direction of said camp or town, whereupon defendant's conductor in charge of and operating said train, while acting in the line and scope of his authority, invited said deceased to board said train for the purpose of riding down to said camp or town and directed the deceased to take a position on the rear of the tender of said engine of said train, pursuant to which directions of said conductor deceased took a position on the rear of said tender. Defendant's said engine was so connected with said train of cars as to be moving or proceeding backward in such manner as to place said tender in front of said engine and train, and the portion of said tender upon which deceased was riding under the direction of said conductor was directly in front of said moving train as it proceeded in the manner above alleged.

"Immediately after said deceased had taken his said position on said tender, said train started up and proceeded down said track to a point about 3½ miles from said camp or town and while rounding a curve on said railroad said engine ran off of said railroad and plunged down an embankment, whereupon deceased was hurled from said tender to the ground and instantly killed.

"Said deceased was a good and dutiful son, and with the exception of the short space of about 2 weeks, at which time said deceased was residing in defendant's said camp or town, was residing with the plaintiff herein, at Lindsay, Cal. * * *

"The roadbed from the point where said deceased boarded said train to the point of its destination, to wit, said camp or town, was soft, uneven, and unsecure; the iron track or rails along said roadbed and over which said train was passing on its way to said camp or town were loose and unsecure; the ties upon which said rails or track were laid were broken, weak, and unsecure and the rails were not securely fastened thereto and the train, while passing over and along said track, was liable to be overturned or derailed and the position occupied by the deceased at said time was a position of great danger and peril, all of which was known to defendant.

"Deceased was not familiar with said roadbed and the danger attending his position upon said tender and at the time the deceased believed his said position was a safe place to ride.

"That all of said injuries and damage aforesaid were caused by and were an approximate consequence of the negligence of defendant's said conductor in placing said deceased on the tender of said engine and starting and operating said train along said track while said plaintiff was occupying said position."

Count 2 of the complaint is predicated upon an allegation that the negligence pleaded in count 1 was willful and wanton, and count 3 upon an allegation of willful and wanton negligence in permitting the deceased to occupy a position on the tender of the engine of defendant's train.

It will thus be readily seen that the pleading before us presents the complex question of determining whether, under the allegations thereof, deceased was a passenger, invitee (express or implied), licensee, or trespasser upon defendant's logging train. It is clear that defendant was not at the time a common carrier of passengers in the ordinary acceptation of that term. It clearly appears also that enough is alleged to raise an issue of fact for the jury as to whether or not deceased was an implied invitee of defendant. In other words, the allegations to the effect that the conductors of defendant railroad were in the habit of permitting persons to ride upon the trains as a convenience in going up and down said tracks, and that such acts and conduct on their part were known to the managing agents of defendant, and that the conductor acting in the course of his authority expressly invited deceased to ride on said train, were sufficient to submit to the jury the question as to whether said managing agents of defendant had not expressly authorized or ratified the conduct of its said conductor in extending said invitation to deceased. Apparently the pleader in this case had studied closely the principles of law governing the situation, and the complaint was drawn by him in the light of these authorities.

After a careful review of the authorities, many of which are not cited in the briefs, we hold that the principles announced in the case of Lawrence v. Kaul Lumber Co., 171 Ala. 300, 55 So. 111, are applicable here. Inasmuch as that case is practically a parallel of the case at bar and discusses all principles here involved, we shall quote from it at length. Defendant there, as here, was not a common carrier of passengers, but had built and was operating from its logging camp to the main line a short railroad designed for use in its logging and lumber business. A custom had arisen of allowing its hands and employees to ride to and fro on its freight trains for their own convenience, which permission in time was extended apparently to all persons who sought the privilege. Deceased had been hired by defendant to cut ties on its lands at so much a tie and at his discretion. While riding on a logging train, following the above custom, he was killed by derailment of the train on account of the condition of the roadbed. In considering the various rulings on demurrers to the complaint and pleas, the court said:

> "To constitute one a 'passenger' who is riding on a train, it is well settled that it is not necessary that the carrier should be a common carrier, nor that the train or car should be used or adapted primarily for carrying passengers. Birmingham R., L. & P. Co. v. Adams, 146 Ala. 267, 272, 40 So. 385, 119 Am. St. Rep. 27. It is also well settled that the person transported is none the less a passenger, because he pays nothing for his carriage, or because he rides for his own convenience solely, by the courtesy of, and absolutely without profit to, the carrier. 5 A. & E. Ency. Law, 507; 1 Ann. Cas. 451, note; Indiana Traction Co. v. Klentschy, 167 Ind. 598, 79 N. E. 908, 10 Ann. Cas. 869; Harvey v. Deep River Logging Co. (1907) 49 Or. 583, 90 P. 501, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 131. The essential requirement seems to be only that the passenger is accepted as such—that is, for transportation by the carrier; the trust and confidence thereby induced, on considerations of public policy, imposing upon the carrier the duty to reasonably safeguard, and not negligently injure, the person so carried. In some of its applications, this rule is undoubtedly a harsh one, and the results sometimes seem scarcely consistent with reason and justice.
> "When, however, the passenger chooses to be transported on a train, not adapted to passenger service, such as a freight or a logging train, while he does not waive the carrier's duty of due care with respect to his safety, he does waive all such precautions, whether in equipment or operation, which are inconsistent with the ordinary use and conduct of such a train, and cannot expect the carrier to change or adapt his service to the extraordinary requirements of a common carrier of passengers. In other words, he assumes the risk of injury from such accidents as are incident to such trains when equipped and operated in the usual way. Southern Ry. Co. v. Crowder, 130 Ala. 256, 263, 30 So. 592; Harvey v. Deep River Logging Co., 49 Or. 583, 90 P. 501, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 131.
> "But, if the carrier is not a common carrier of passengers, and has not expressly contracted to carry in the particular case, a person entering upon its train and taking passage thereon might be, under various circumstances, either a passenger, a licensee, or a trespasser. If his presence is without the knowledge and consent of any one in charge of the train, he is but a trespasser. If on the invitation, or with the knowledge and acquiescense, of such an agent, not authorized nor shared in by his principal—the carrier itself, or its alter ego—such person would be but a licensee. McCauley v. Tenn. Co., 93 Ala. 360, 9 So. 611; Files v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 149 Mass. 204, 21 N. E. 311, 14 Am. St. Rep. 411. If on the invitation, express or implied, of the carrier or its alter ego manager, or of any authorized agent, such person would be a passenger. Id.; Harvey v. Deep River Logging Co. (1907) 49 Or. 583, 90 P. 501, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 131. * * *
> "It is to be noted that 'invitation,' in the sense in which it is here used in these pleas, and as commonly used and defined by law writers in this connection, is a term of considerable breadth, and includes, not only express invitation, but the invitation that may be implied from custom, usage, or conduct on the part of the carrier, or of its servants, if notorious or actually known to the carrier or its alter ego. A. G. S. Ry. Co. v. Godfrey, 156 Ala. 202, 218, 47 So. 185, 130 Am. St. Rep. 76; Brown v. Scarboro, 97 Ala. 316, 322, 323, 12 So. 289. Upon this question of implied invitation, based on the known custom or usage of the defendant or its agents, much pertinent testimony was introduced on the trial, and this issue as made by the pleadings was one of fact for the jury to determine."

A case also in point is Harvey v. Deep River Logging Co., 49 Or. 583, 90 P. 501, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 131, cited in the above quotations. There defendant, engaged in the logging business, operated, as part of its appliances, a logging steam railroad, but it was not engaged in the passenger business and neither charged nor received fares of persons carried. Yet the court held that if the carriage of a person on one of its trucks was with its implied consent, which might be found from evidence tending to show not only that defendant's manager had actual knowledge that the persons in charge of its trains were in the habit of permitting persons to ride thereon, but also that such practice was so open, notorious, and continuous that it was hardly probable that it could have been without his knowledge, defendant owed him the duty of not injuring him by its negligence, and so was liable for his injury from collision of the train with another train negligently permitted on the road at the time.

In the case of Hodge v. Sycamore Coal Co., 82 W. Va. 106, 95 S. E. 808, plaintiff was riding gratuitously on a truck or hand car maintained and operated by defendant coal mining company to haul its express matter over a spur track of a railway company, leading from the main line to its coal mine, with the consent of its general manager having control of the operation of such car. The court held that she was a passenger and not a trespasser or mere licensee, and that such company owed her the duty to use reasonable care for her safety, and affirmed the judgment awarding her damages for a personal injury caused by collision of defendant's said hand car or truck on which she was riding with a train of cars. The court said:

> "These facts and circumstances establish between plaintiff and defendant the relation of passenger and private carrier, and defendant was bound to exercise such reasonable care for plaintiff's safety as is usually employed by prudent persons engaged in the same business, or business similar in character. Shoemaker v. Kingsbury, 12 Wall. 369, 20 L. Ed. 432, and 4 R. C. L. § 593. The truck was not designed for the accommodation of passengers, and defendant did not solicit their patronage or hold itself out as a public carrier, and plaintiff assumed the ordinary risks incident to the mode of travel. * * * Even if no express agreement by the superintendent to carry her were proved, plain> tiff could not be regarded as a trespasser or mere licensee in view of other facts and circumstances clearly proved. Defendant, thru its acting agents, knew of the prevailing custom of carrying passengers to and from the junction, and there is no evidence of any rule of the company forbidding the practice. The existence of the custom, with knowledge thereof by defendant and no rule forbidding the practice, is sufficient to establish the relation of carrier and passenger. However, it is not denied that plaintiff was being carried pursuant to an understanding or agreement had with defendant's general superintendent the evening before the accident. Payment of fare or an agreement for compensation was not necessary in order to constitute plaintiff a passenger."

A case very similar and to the same effect is Whitehead v. St. L., etc., Ry. Co., 99 Mo. 363, 11 S. W. 751, 6 L. R. A. 409. See, also, a case similar in fact and holdings which arose in California, Albion Lumber Co. v. De Nobra (C. C. A.) 72 F. 739, 741. Many other cases could be cited supporting these views. Measuring the complaint in this action by the principles above announced, there can be no question that count one states a cause of action which, if sustained by the evidence, would warrant a jury in finding that deceased was on defendant's train as an invitee and not as a licensee or trespasser.

The case of Campbell v. Duluth & Northeastern, etc., Co., 107 Minn. 358, 120 N. W. 375, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 190, relied upon by respondent, is not at variance with the principles hereinabove announced. In fact, it is in complete harmony with them, to this effect:

> "All that is required of such roads is the exercise of the highest care under the circumstances. The passenger must take such roads as he finds them. A carrier having limited fitness and capacity to transport passengers, and whose primary business is to transport its logs, is not held to the standard of perfection of an ideal road, but must exercise the highest degree of care practicable under the circumstances."

The complaint in this action alleges that the defendant did not exercise the care that it should have exercised under the particular circumstances.

Purple v. Union Pacific (C. C. A.) 114 F. 123, 57 L. R. A. 700, and cases of that type are not in point because there plaintiff was riding on a train prohibited from carrying passengers by the rules of the company, and plaintiff knew or should have known of such rules. We have no such state of facts before us. The case of Lemasters v. Southern Pacific Co., 131 Cal. 105, 63 P. 128, is not applicable for the same reason, for there "it was against the rules of defendant for persons to ride upon this board, and deceased was acquainted with that fact."

[2] While deceased, if an invitee, was only entitled to the degree of care commensurate with the character of the railroad train on which he was riding, nevertheless, there is no allegation of the complaint from which contributory negligence as a matter of law appears. It does not appear that the position assumed by the deceased was necessarily more hazardous than other places on the train, nor that the assumption of this position, as distinguished from any other position he might have taken, in any way specially contributed to the accident. Nor does it appear that the assumption of this position at the invitation of the conductor was in excess of the conductor's express and implied authority. The most that can be said is that in accepting an invitation to ride upon said train he knew or should have known of the differences between such transportation and the ordinary passenger train, and the duty of defendant would thereby be correspondingly less. But there is no allegation that he did any act, after so taking the position thereon assigned to him, which in any way contributed proximately or otherwise to the accident causing his death. Cases, therefore, where the affirmative negligent act of deceased brought him in contact with a railroad train, are not in point and not applicable here. This observation applies to cases such as Lynn v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 113, 148 P. 927, L. R. A. 1915E, 588; Pope v. Halpern, 193 Cal. 176, 223 P. 470; and Young v. S. P. Co., 189 Cal. 746, 210 P. 259.

These views render it unnecessary to discuss the doctrine of last clear chance, nor is it necessary to discuss causes of action two and three predicated upon willful and wanton negligence, the rule in this respect not being in doubt. The complaint states a cause of action.

NEIL v. FEATHER RIVER LUMBER CO.
(Sac. 3903.)

Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1928.

Railroads ⚷282(1)—Complaint alleging conductor of logging train with employer's knowledge invited plaintiff to ride stated cause of action as showing plaintiff was invitee.

Allegations of complaint to effect that conductors of defendant logging railroad were in habit of permitting persons to ride upon trains of railroad as a convenience, that such acts and conduct on their part were known to defendant's managing agents, and that conductor acting in course of his authority expressly invited plaintiff to ride on his train, which was wrecked, and plaintiff injured, held sufficient to submit to jury question whether defendant's managing agents had not expressly authorized or ratified conduct of its conductor in extending such invitation to plaintiff so as to raise an issue of fact for jury whether plaintiff was riding as an express or implied invitee of defendant, and hence sustaining demurrer to complaint was error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Edward R. Neil against the Feather River Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

William C. Ring and Faucett & Ring, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, McLaughlin & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, and Price & Hawkins, of Reno, Nev., for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Plaintiff sues to recover damages for the alleged negligence of defendant with respect to the management and operation of a logging railroad upon which he was riding when the locomotive jumped the track, hurling him from the tender to the ground and severely injuring him. We are concerned solely with the sufficiency as a pleading of the second amended complaint, to which the court below sustained a demurrer without leave to amend.

This case was heard and considered with the companion case of Brown v. Feather River Lumber Co., a Corporation, this day decided, 265 P. 203, wherein plaintiff sought damages for the wrongful death of his son arising from the same accident here involved. The allegations of the second amended complaint in that case, except as to the extent of resultant bodily harm, are practically identical with the allegations of the second amended complaint in the instant case, and reference may be made to said decision for a statement in detail thereof.

We reiterate the holding there made, to-wit, that the allegations of the pleading are sufficient to raise an issue of fact for the jury as to whether or not plaintiff was riding as an express or implied invitee of defendant. In other words, the allegations to the effect that the conductors of defendant railroad were in the habit of permitting persons to ride upon the trains of said company as a convenience in going up and down said tracks, that such acts and conduct on their part were known to the managing agents of defendant, and that the conductor acting in the course of his authority expressly invited plaintiff to ride on said train, were sufficient to submit to the jury the question as to whether said managing agents of defendant had not expressly authorized or ratified the conduct of its said conductor in extending said invitation to plaintiff. Lawrence v. Kaul Lumber Co., 171 Ala. 300, 55 So. 111; Brown v. Feather River Lumber Co., supra, and cases therein cited. There can be no question that count 1 states a cause of action which, if sustained by the evidence, would warrant a jury in finding that plaintiff was on defendant's train as an invitee and not a licensee or trespasser, and it is unnecessary to discuss causes of action 2 and 3, predicated upon willful and wanton negligence, the rule in that respect not being in doubt.

In short, the complaint states a cause of action and upon the same grounds, and for all the reasons set forth in said case of Brown v. Feather River Lumber Co., supra, the judgment herein is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Fannie Moore against the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed. Superseding opinion in 258 P. 375.

Rehearing denied; WASTE, C. J., and SHENK, J., voting for a rehearing.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. C. Sharpsteen, and Hartley F. Peart, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action instituted by her for the recovery of the sum of $5,000 alleged by her to be due from the defendant upon a policy of accident insurance issued by it to one Mary Evelyn Moore, deceased, and of which policy the plaintiff, mother of said deceased, was the beneficiary. Mary Evelyn Moore was a graduate nurse, having graduated from the University of California Medical School and Hospital on February 11, 1919, and having practiced her profession as such nurse until the time of her death, on February 6, 1922. On November 17, 1920, there was issued to her by the defendant herein the accident insurance policy upon which the plaintiff seeks recovery. Said policy was in the form required by the statutes of California (Stats. 1917, p. 957), which prescribe a standard form for such policies and require a brief description of the nature of the policy to be clearly printed upon the first page thereof. The policy in question accordingly contained in clear type upon its first page the statement that it was a "Business Women's Disability Policy," and this was followed by a brief statement as to the bodily injuries the holder was to be insured against. It was therein provided that the holder of the policy was to be insured against "bodily injury sustained through accidental means and resulting in disability, dismemberment, loss of sight, or death." The body of the policy contained certain limitations upon the foregoing provision which are not necessary to be noted here. In her application for such policy, the assured was required to state and did state her occupation to be that of a "private nurse (graduate)" and also to set forth the place of her location and the duties of her occupation, as well as the facts relating to her age, habits of life, state of health, etc. In the body of the policy it is expressly stated that it is issued in consideration of the statements made in the said application, a copy of which is indorsed upon and made a part of the policy. The assured's occupation is also expressly stated in the policy as being that of a "private nurse (graduate)," and the duties of her occupation are described as being "nurse, not of the insane." The assured's occupation is also therein stated as being "classified by the company as 'preferred.'" The policy further provides that "blood poisoning resulting directly from a bodily injury shall be deemed to be included in said term 'bodily injury.'"

The meaning of the designation "graduate nurse" is to be found in the terms of the Statutes of 1913, p. 613, which is entitled:

> "An act to promote the better education of nurses and the better care of the sick in the state of California, to provide for and regulate the examination and registration of graduate nurses," etc.

In section 4 of said act a graduate nurse who is eligible for examination and registration as a registered nurse is one who shall—

> "furnish satisfactory evidence of having been graduated from an accredited training school for nurses. An accredited training school for nurses within the meaning of this act is hereby defined to be a school for the training of nurses attached to or operated in connection with a hospital or hospitals giving a general training and a systematic theoretical and practical course of instruction covering a period of at least three years."

In view of the foregoing terms of the assured's application for this policy and of the terms of the policy itself, which define it as a "Business Women's Disability Policy," and of the several designations of the assured's occupation as being that of a graduate nurse, and of the statutory definition of that term, it may not be here contended that the insurer in issuing to the insured said policy did not intend to insure her against the occupational risks of her profession as a graduate nurse and were not fully aware of the hazards of her particular calling.

The only limitation placed upon the liability of the insurer arising out of these occupational hazards was that the injuries occurring in the course of such occupation should be "bodily injuries" and that these should be sustained "through accidental means" in order to give rise to such liability. The foregoing are important considerations, for the reasons, first, that what are to be considered as "bodily injuries," as the term is used in said policy, must be interpreted in the light of the occupation of the assured, and, second, that what are "accidental means" must also be interpreted in the light of said occupation and of the peculiar risks or hazards which are the incidents of its exercise; and in the light also of the safeguards with which modern science has surrounded the care of the sick in hospitals through the use of the expert skill and precautionary knowledge of physicians and nurses in the present day and age. The insurer issuing this policy to the insured, knowing that her occupation was that of a graduate nurse, must be presumed to have known the nature, character, incidents, and hazard of such occupation, and to have had these in mind in the use of the terms employed in its policy, and, if there was any branch of such occupation which was considered extrahazardous, it should have been excluded from the coverage of the contract. Yoch v. Home Mutual Ins. Co., 111 Cal. 503, 44 P. 189, 34 L. R. A. 857; Sims v. State Ins. Co., 47 Mo. 54, 4 Am. Rep. 311; Dudley v. Preferred, etc., Ass'n, 102 Mich. 289, 57 N. W. 184, 26 L. R. A. 171; Interstate, etc., Ass'n v. Lester (C. C. A.) 257 F. 225.

The insurer in fact did exclude from the protection of its policy certain specific bodily injuries by the terms of article 18 thereof, reading as follows:

> "This policy does not cover any bodily injury fatal or nonfatal—(1) resulting from fighting or from any military or naval service; (2) received by the assured while or in consequence of being or having been under the influence of or affected by intoxicants; (3) intentionally inflicted upon the assured by herself; (4) inflicted upon the assured while participating in, or in consequence of having participated in aeronautics."

It also apparently excluded whatever duties the assured in her occupation as a graduate nurse should undertake in the way of nursing the insane. It must therefore be presumed that the insurer had in mind in the issuance of this policy the fact that one of the ordinary hazards to which a graduate nurse would be exposed in the exercise of her calling was that of exposure to the possibility of infection in the care of patients afflicted with communicable disorders, and that it intended that she should be insured against this hazard by its failure to include it among the risks against which it did not undertake to insure. It may be further said in this very connection that the insurer, after setting forth in its policy the foregoing exceptions, expressly classified the assured's occupation as "preferred," and by the fact of so doing indicated that it did not consider the ordinary hazards of her occupation other than those expressly excepted as being beyond the protection of its policy, since to hold otherwise would be practically to hold that the assured, while pursuing her vocation, was to be given no protection at all.

[1] With respect to the term "bodily injuries" as employed in this policy, we are somewhat enlightened as to the meaning which the parties thereto assigned to it by the clause therein which provides that "blood poisoning resulting from a bodily injury shall be deemed to be included in said term"; but, even without the aid of that provision, we are of the opinion that in the light of the authorities there can be little if any doubt that infection caused by contact with the germs of a communicable disease constitutes a "bodily injury" within the usual meaning of that term as the same is employed in compensation laws and insurance policies. In the case of San Francisco v. Industrial Accident Commission, 183 Cal. 273, 191 P. 26, it was held that influenza contracted by a hospital steward from patients in the course of his employment was a bodily injury. So also in the case of Horton v. Travelers, etc., Co., 45 Cal. App. 462, 187 P. 1070, it was decided that streptococcic germs introduced into the mouth of a patient by means of polluted dental instruments, causing blood poisoning, was a bodily injury within the meaning of that term as used in an accident insurance policy similar to that involved in the instant case. So also it has been held in not a few cases that typhoid fever germs introduced into the system through the drinking of polluted water constituted a bodily injury within the meaning generally of policies of accident insurance. Ætna, etc., Co. v. Portland, etc (C. C. A.) 229 F. 552, L. R. A. 1916D, 1027; Christ v. Pacific etc. Co., 312 Ill. 525, 144 N. E. 161, 35 A. L. R. 730. From the standpoint of pure reason, whether bodily injury which produces a weakening or disintegration of the physical system is caused by flying germs or by flying shrapnel or by a poisoned arrow or by the sting of an insect is only a matter of degree as to the size or quality of the missile or instrumentality inflicting the injury.

[2] As to the term "accidental means" as used in such policies, the authorities also shed light upon its signification. In the case of Horton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., supra, the term "accidental means" is held to be descriptive of "means which produce effects which are not their usual and probable consequences." In the case of Richards v. Travlers' Ins. Co., 89 Cal. 170, 26 P. 762, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455, the term "accident" is defined as "a casualty—something out of the usual course of events, and which happens suddenly and unexpectedly, and without any design on the part of the person injured." In the case of Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 172 Cal 462, 465, 156 P. 1029, 1030 (L. R. A. 1916E, 1196), it was pointed out by this court that the accident policy in that case did not insure against accidental death, but against death through accidental means; the court saying:

> "It is not enough that death or injury should be unexpected or unforeseen, but there must be some element of unexpectedness in the preceding act or occurrence which leads to the injury or death."

The case of State v. Allison (C. C. A.) 269 F. 93, 14 A. L. R. 412, while not identical with this one as to the nature of the bodily injury inflicted, is quite apposite in its discussion as to the meaning to be attributed to the term "accidental means." The assured in that case was killed in battle in France. His policy insured him against death resulting from bodily injury sustained and effected directly through external violent and accidental means. The only exceptions in the policy were "murder or suicide, sane or insane not included." The court, in holding that the assured came to his death by external and violent means which were to be regarded as "accidental means," as far as he was concerned, said:

> "Experience convincingly teaches that the hazards incident to many lawful employments other than war are such that it is to be expected that some of those engaged therein will be injured or killed. If an accident policy contains no provision excepting such hazards, and by chance, without the insured's design, consent, or co-operation, he is injured or killed as a result of a hazard incident to his occupation, his injury or death properly may be said to have been caused by accidental means. While it was to be expected that some of the soldiers engaged in the military operation in which the insured was engaged when he was killed would be injured or killed, it is not to be denied that it was by chance that Lieut. Allison's person was in the path of the piece of shrapnel which caused his death. He would not have been injured or killed by that missile, but for the accidental or fortuitous circumstance that his person happened to be in its path. It was chance which determined that he was the soldier who was the victim of that stray missile. * * * Whether the injury or death of a particular soldier is a consequence of his participation in a battle ordinarily depends on his happening to be or not to be in the path of a missile of war. It cannot well be said that the wounding or killing of any particular soldier belonging to a force going into battle is so far a natural and to be expected consequence of his so being exposed to danger as to prevent a casualty happening to him properly being regarded as within the category of accidents."

When these several but harmonious definitions of the foregoing phrase are considered, it will at once be apparent that the term "accidental means" depends for its application upon the facts of each particular case; since what would be an unusual or improbable consequence, an unexpected or unforeseen occurrence in one set of circumstances in which the assured might be placed, would be but the usual, the expected, and in all human probability the foreseen consequence affecting the assured in another set of circumstances. This reasoning has especial application to accident insurance, and particularly to the sort of occupational accident insurance with which we are concerned in the instant case; for it must be apparent that, while the result of the exposure of the ordinary or unsafeguarded individual to the infection of a virulent, communicable disorder would have as its usual and expected consequence infection and the contraction of the disorder, such would not be at all, or at most, the unusual, improbable and unexpected consequence of the exposure of the experienced and safeguarded physician or nurse in a modern hospital to the same disorder. The insurer in the instant case, in the acceptance of this risk and the issuance of this policy to the insured, knowing the occupation in which she was and was to be engaged, must be held to have contracted with the foregoing facts, grounded in human experience, in view; and hence to have contemplated as embraced within the phrase "accidental means" the possible hazard of infection from such contagious or communicable disorders as it might fall to the lot of this graduate nurse to treat in the usual course of her calling. In point of fact, were the rule of interpretation of this clause in accident policies, that insisted upon by the appellant herein, the elements of skill, watchfulness, and the use of preventives against contagion which in modern hospitals render infection, especially among physicians and nurses, a rare and unusual occurrence, would only serve to defeat a recovery upon such a policy by furnishing evidence that the hazard of infection was in every such case expected and foreseen. The result would inevitably be that physicians, hospital attendants, and nurses would be beyond the pale of protection under the terms of accident policies such as is presented in the case at bar.

[3] Having thus cleared the way for a review of the circumstances of the particular case as educed at the trial, we find the following to be the practically undisputed facts of the instant case: The assured, Mary Evelyn Moore, was, at the time of the issuance to her of this accident policy, a graduate nurse who, for the period of three years prior to February 4, 1922, had been actively engaged in the practice of her profession. At the time of her engagement on the above date to attend one Walter J. Hesse, a patient in the University of California Hospital, as a day nurse, she was, according to the testimony of the physicians and other persons who knew her, "a large, robust, and very healthy looking woman" of the age of 30 years, and was one who "made the impression of being exceptionally strong and having a good physique." She was thus exceptionally qualified to resist infection from communicable disorders. As to her habitudes as a nurse, with respect to precautions taken by her to avoid infection in the treatment of patients committed to her charge, her roommate, Mrs. Allen, who was also a nurse and was frequently associated with her in the nursing of patients, testified that—

> "She was extremely careful, and often on cases she didn't know even to be infectious she would go to the dressing room and gargle her throat every little while. She took these precautions more frequently than I would and many of the other nurses; more frequently than I thought was really necessary. It was her habit to do that."

Dr. Lisser testified:

> "She had nursed a number of my cases during this period of two years that I testified to that I knew her as a nurse. From my observation in the two years she nursed for me from time to time she certainly observed the usual precautions so as to protect her own health when in attendance upon patients where carelessness on her part might affect herself."

The foregoing testimony was uncontradicted, and would seem to be sufficient to justify the inference that, in the exercise of her duties in the care of the patients intrusted to her on that and the following days, she made use of those precautions to which she was habituated in order to avoid injury from infection to herself. The patient, as it later appeared, was suffering from a streptococcic infection scientifically known as streptococcus hemalyticus, and popularly known as blood poisoning. This infectious disorder according to the testimony of the physicians, is fairly common, and can be communicated from an infected person through inhalation by another of the infected organisms exhaled by the infected person. The attendance of the nurse upon her patient began in the morning of the day of her employment. There is no evidence as to just when she became informed of the dangerous nature of her patient's disorder, but there is evidence that the physician in charge of the case was not sure that it was a case of streptococcic infection until late in the afternoon of that day, when the laboratory reports were received. It cannot in reason be assumed that the nurse would know more or be informed earlier than the physician as to the dangerous nature of the case, or that she was or would have been put upon notice of the need of extraordinary precautions for her own safety prior to the time late in the afternoon of the first day when Dr. Berwick, upon receiving the laboratory tests and being thus for the first time definitely informed of the danger of infection, instructed her to take precautions to protect herself from becoming infected. There is evidence in the record that on the evening of that day the insured told her roommate that "she was afraid of this case that she was on, the Hesse case, and she was complaining of a chill, and she was afraid of it." This evidence only tends to show that at some time during this first day she had caught the infection, and the probabilities would seem to be that it was prior to the time late in the afternoon when she was for the first time informed by the physicians as to the dangerous and infectious nature of her patient's malady.

There is certain other evidence in the case which has an important bearing upon the question as to whether the insured's contraction of this infectious disease was the expected or unexpected, the usual or unusual, consequence of her exposure to infection. This evidence shows that during this first day of the patient's admission to the hospital numbers of persons came and went through the room in which he was lying, and that none of these, with the exception only of this nurse, contracted his disorder. The physicians in charge of the case, the relations and friends of the patient, his brother, the brother-in-law of his sister, her sister-in-law and her husband, a friend and her daughter, and last but not least the sister, and also the fiancee of the patient, who were with him day and night, the former of whom "sat close enough to him to hold his hand," and the latter of whom hung over him almost constantly, kissing and fondling him, until finally warned by the physician to desist—the fact that none of these persons who, with the exception of the physicians were safeguarded by no precautions, and who exercised none of the nurse's habitual and expert care in the avoidance of infection, did not become infected, furnishes cogent evidence tending to show that the danger of infection was not the usual or probable or expected consequence of exposure to the patient's communicable disorder, but was, especially in the case of this careful, skillful, experienced, and unusually cautious nurse an altogether unexpected and unusual consequence—a casualty in fact from the direct effect of which she came to her death. There is also present in the record the evidence of the physician in charge that the patient was subject to sudden, unexpected, and explosive fits of coughing during which the patient was delirious, and during which the germs of his disease would be propelled into the face of any one who might be bending over him. Both the patient and the nurse are dead, and we have no means of knowing under just what conditions or at what moment the faithful nurse received into her system the germs which caused her infection; but, since the only assault which the appellant herein makes upon the judgment of the trial court is that the findings upon which it is based are not supported by the evidence, we are entitled to indulge in every reasonable inference which may be drawn from the uncontradicted evidence in the case in support of the findings and judgment of the trial court; and from the facts as above set forth showing that the assured was an educated, experienced, skilled, and habitually an unusually careful nurse, and from the fact she was not informed by the physicians in charge as to the virulent nature of her patient's disorder until late in the afternoon of her first day's attendance upon him, and from the fact that the patient was subject to sudden, unexpected, spasmodic, and explosive fits of coughing, which would propel the germs of his disease into the face of one who might at the time be ministering to him in his delirious and semiconscious condition, we are of the opinion that the inference is a reasonable one to be drawn from such evidence that it was in some such unexpected paroxysm of the patient that the germs carrying infection were communicated to the assured, notwithstanding her professional and habitual precautions.

The appellant herein assails the doctrine declared in the case of Horton v. Travelers', etc., Co., supra, in so far as it is decided therein that the introduction into and action of disease-bearing bacteria upon, the tissues of the human system constitutes a bodily injury within the meaning of that term as used in accident insurance policies. We are, however, satisfied with the scientific and legal correctness of the doctrine declared in that case and of the exact application thereof to the facts of the case at bar. The appellant also makes the contention that the fact that the deceased nurse did not wear a gauze mask while in attendance upon her patient negatives the implied finding of the trial court that the nurse properly performed her functions as a careful and skillful nurse; but upon this matter the evidence is quite in conflict as to whether the wearing of a gauze mask affords any substantial protection to doctors and nurses in cases of communicable disorders; and, this, being so, the findings and judgment of the trial tribunal ought not for that reason be disturbed.

We have carefully examined the cases cited by the appellant in support of its contention that injuries sustained by physicians and nurses from contact with infectious diseases are not to be held to have been sustained by "accidental means," but we find among these no case wherein recovery upon facts at all similar to those herein presented was denied, unless it appeared as a basis for such denial, either that the policy expressly exempted the insurer from liability for bodily injuries happening either directly or indirectly in consequence of disease, or in which the terms "external" and "violent" as applied to injuries, and which are omitted from the present policy, were embraced in the policies there under review, and were not met by the proofs. An example of the first of the foregoing class of cases cited by the appellant is the case of Bacon v. United States etc. Ass'n, 123 N. Y. 304, 25 N. E. 399, 9 L. R. A. 617, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748; and an example of the other class which the appellant also relies upon are the cases of Smith v. Travelers', etc., Co., 219 Mass. 147, 106 N. E. 607, L. R. A. 1915B, 872, and Zack v. Fidelity, etc., Co. (Mo. App.) 272 S. W. 995. The only exception we have noted to these inapplicable citations is that of the case of Ramsey v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 143 Tenn. 42, 223 S. W. 842, 13 A. L. R 651, which it is conceded is in direct conflict with the Horton Case. While in the foregoing opinion we have not undertaken to expressly cite and comment upon all of the cases cited by respective counsel in their several briefs, we feel that we have fairly covered and considered the main and controlling questions at issue upon this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHENK, J. I dissent. The only question in this case is whether the insured came to her death as the result of bodily injury suffered through accidental means. The terms of the policy in this respect are plain and unambiguous. This policy, however, is dual in its engagements. It is a business women's disability policy, and as such is subject to the construction placed upon it by the main opinion as having been issued by the insurer with full knowledge of the hazards of the occupation of the insured. In its other aspect the policy is an ordinary contract for indemnity for death resulting from bodily injury suffered through accidental means. It is with this second aspect of the policy that the court is now concerned. Whether the insurance company knew or did not know of the hazards of the insured's employment is of no consequence (in the absence of fraud or concealment, which are not involved here), so long as the insured came to her death as a result of bodily injury suffered through accidental means. The main opinion, it seems to me, has confused these two plainly separable and independent phases of the policy.

I cannot agree that the entrance of a germ into the human body, unaccompanied by any abrasion or traumatic condition or physical interposition, and causing sickness and death, is a bodily injury as contemplated by the insurance policy involved in this case. The language of the policy is not unique, but follows generally the language of standard health and accident policies. The effect of the opinion in this respect is that a disease-bearing germ introduced into the respiratory tract by inhalation by any one while in a public conveyance, on a public street, in a place of public amusement, in his own home, in fact, in any place where human beings are closely enough in contact to be within the zone of contagion and unaccompanied by any abrasion or trauma or physical interposition, is a bodily injury. In my opinion this holding is introducing into the realm of accident insurance a false quantity not contemplated by the insurer or insured, and by judicial fiat has converted the accident insurance contract into one of health insurance if the insured survive, and into one of life insurance in case of death. If such had been the law during the days of the influenza epidemic following the close of the World War, it is not difficult to imagine what would have happened to accident insurance companies. Claims for indemnity on account of death from that and other contagious diseases under accident insurance policies have not been made for the reason that such an application of the term "bodily injury" was never intended. This novel application of the term has not been made in this state, nor, in my opinion, in any other jurisdiction where the point was directly involved.

The case of Horton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 462, 187 P. 1070, did not go to the length accredited to it in the main opinion. That case involved the sufficiency of the complaint on a policy almost identical with the present one, wherein it was alleged that by the unintentional use of infected dental instruments, virulent disease-bearing germs were introduced into the system of the insured. A natural and ordinary result of the use of dental instruments is an abrasion of some of the tissues of the oral cavity, and such use is always accompanied by some manual interposition. The allegations of the complaint in that case must have been considered in the light of a matter of such common experience.

Nor does the case of San Francisco v. Industrial Acc. Com., 183 Cal. 273, 191 P. 26, support the construction placed on the term "bodily injury" by the main opinion. In that case it was decided that the definition of the term "injury" by the Legislature in section 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as adopted in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 833), was a definition justifiable under the constitutional provision providing for workmen's compensation. The Legislature defined the term as follows:

> "The term 'injury,' as used in this act, shall include any injury or disease arising out of the employment."

To hold that the special statutory definition of the term "injury," made for the purpose of putting into effect the workmen's compensation provision of our Constitution, should be applied to the term "bodily injury" as used in accident policies, is, in my opinion, unwarranted.

Furthermore, as to the particular facts in this case, I am unable to agree that in the contraction of the disease by the insured there was that element of unexpectedness and surprise essential to prove death by "accidental means." The term "accident," as used in similar policies, has been given a definition in this state that is uniform and without substantial deviation. The term is defined as "a casualty—something out of the usual course of events, but which happens suddenly and unexpectedly and without any design of the person injured." Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 89 Cal. 170, 26 P. 762, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455; Price v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 169 Cal. 800, 147 P. 1175; Southwestern Surety Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 768, 158 P. 762; Olinsky v. Railway Mail Ass'n, 182 Cal. 669, 189 P. 835, 14 A. L. R. 784. It must be borne in mind that the policy here in question does not insure against accidental death, but against death through accidental means. "A differentiation is made, therefore, between the result to the insured and the means which is the operative cause in producing this result. It is not enough that death or injury should be unexpected or unforeseen, but there must be some element of unexpectedness in the preceding act or occurrence which leads to the injury or death." Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 172 Cal. 462, 465, 156 P. 1029, 1030 (L. R. A. 1916E, 1196). An unbroken line of cases to this same effect is found in this state.

In the present case the means through which the fatal malady was contracted by the insured was neither unusual nor unexpected. There was no element of surprise in coming in contact with the virulent organisms. In fact, such contact was foreseen and expected. The insured knew and realized the dangers incident to the performance of her duties as an attending nurse and by gargling, washing her hands, etc., took precautions to guard against the effect of the exposure. The fact that others similarly exposed did not contract the disease is not sufficient to prove that the insured contracted the same by accidental means. If the other persons present in the room from time to time had contracted the malady, there would have been no element of surprise or unexpectedness or of the unusual in so contracting the same, for they were all advised and warned of the danger to them by reason of their presence in the room. That such other persons did not fall a prey to what was all expected and anticipated contact with the germs would show no more than that their resistance was greater than that of the assured. Effect must be given to the plain language of the policy and a distinction made between the result to the insured and the means by which that result was brought about. It may be said that the result to the assured, namely, illness and death, was unexpected and unintentional; but that is far from saying that the means that produced the illness and subsequent death were unexpected, unusual, or not anticipated. If the insured had suffered an accident or disability by illness from any cause and had survived, indemnity for the same would have accrued under the disability terms of the policy. But to say that, because this disability was provided for in contemplation of her occupation as a nurse, therefore a death benefit would accrue when death was the result of an occupational hazard is entirely to disregard the separate and independent terms of the policy relating to indemnity for death as the result of bodily injury through accidental means.

In re KELPSCH'S ESTATE.

BECKNER et al. v. KELPSCH et al.

(L. A. 9713.)

Supreme Court of California. March 13, 1928.

1. Husband and wife 🔑264, 273(1)—Evidence held to support conclusion that property was community property, so that surviving husband was entitled to half (Civ. Code, § 164).

Evidence held sufficient to support conclusion that property in inventory of estate of deceased wife was community property, so that half belonged to surviving husband, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 164, where husband and wife at time of marriage each had a few hundred dollars with which first investments were made.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑507(1)—Probate court, on settlement of final accounts, may determine validity of claim of representative of estate made in individual capacity.

Where title to property is claimed by representative of an estate in his individual capacity, superior court, sitting in probate, is vested with jurisdiction of determining validity of such claim, on settlement of final accounts of such representative.

3. Husband and wife 🔑265½—Surviving husband held not estopped to claim that property reported in inventory was community property.

Surviving husband held not to have estopped himself to claim, in petition for probate, and in petition for distribution, interest in property reported in inventory of estate of deceased wife on theory that it was community property.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Christine M. Kelpsch, deceased, Joseph A. Kelpsch, executor, and Ellen C. Moline, formerly Ellen C. Johnson, executrix. From an order settling the account and directing distribution, Mrs. Inger A. Beckner and others appeal. Order affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 258 P. 118.

Henshaw, Black & Lyders and Eric Lyders, all of San Francisco, and Rush & McCormick, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal by certain legatees from the order settling final account and directing final distribution of the estate of Christine M. Kelpsch, deceased. There is no dispute as to the account itself. The dispute is as to the terms of the decree of distribution. The court held one-half of the estate to be community property and to belong to the husband, Joseph A. Kelpsch; he and Ellen C. Moline, née Johnson, being, respectively, executor and executrix under said will. The effect of this holding is to give appellants as legatees only one-half of what they would otherwise receive from said estate.

The issue presented, therefore, to the court below was as to the character of the property reported in the proceedings in said estate, and this appeal is controlled by the settlement of the single question as to whether sufficient evidence may be found to justify the conclusion of the trial court that the entire property reported by the personal representatives of the deceased was the community property of her husband and herself. Or it may be stated in another way: Is there sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion of the trial court that one half only of the property so reported belonged to said decedent, the other half being the property of the husband?

It may be said here that the only witnesses who testified upon this subject were the husband and the executrix, who was extremely favorable to his claims. But since counsel is so earnest in his presentation of the matter, some of the pertinent facts shown will be recited.

For about 27 years next prior to her death, the decedent and Joseph A. Kelpsch were wife and husband, and except during the last 4 or 5 years of her life they resided in Chicago. Decedent was about 10 years older than her spouse. She had been a dressmaker. About the time of their marriage he became an architect and builder. At that time she had $600 and he $400. They bought a city lot in Chicago, and in about six months he had erected a dwelling thereon in which they lived for about 2 years, when the property was sold. This process of buying, building, and selling in said city occurred three or four times, always on a profitable basis, until, when they removed to California they had outstanding on property formerly owned and improved by them several mortgages securing sums of money aggregating several thousand dollars. The deeds and mortgages, the husband states, were all in their joint names. The deeds were not introduced in evidence, and appellants strenuously objected to secondary evidence on this point, but enough appears to warrant the court in concluding that such was the fact.

It is true that deposits of money were always in the name of deceased, but the husband says that was because she was the best manager and not because the property was hers nor did he make a gift of his interest therein to her. She, so the testimony shows, spoke of their relation as a partnership, she managing in part and her husband doing the building and managing in other departments of their various enterprises. The Chicago property was all liquidated prior to death of the wife, and there remained only certain uncollected mortgages. In California, through their joint efforts, a contract of purchase was made of some real property, the husband paying part and the wife paying part of the down payment, and each contributing to the periodical installments to be met thereunder. The husband says this contract was in their joint names and such statement is not disproved.

There was some evidence that the husband and wife were living apart during the later years of her life, but the evidence showed that her ill health was a partial excuse at least for this. Their mutual respect continued, and they consulted with each other and worked together as before.

[1] Adding to this the testimony that the deposits were in her name for safe-keeping and because she was the better manager of the two, but that they were not intended as a present or gift to her, how can we say as a matter of law that the court was not warranted in concluding that the whole estate was community property? The fact that each of them had at their marriage a few hundred dollars as separate property is not controlling as by mere verbal agreement these sums could have been transmuted into community property. The interpretation contended for by appellants denies to the husband all interest of every kind in the property. No reasonable deduction of that kind would be warranted as it is certain that he intended to retain some kind of an interest in the property. It certainly cannot be supposed that a man would work a lifetime for one with whom he was living in strained relations. The fact that all the property was returned as a part of the estate of decedent is not controlling for as a part of said report is the contemporaneous claim that the whole of the estate is community property.

Neither do the presumptions under section 164 of the Civil Code create more than a situation which at most would but compel the conclusion that a conflict in the evidence, was present.

[2] Appellants assert that the court, sitting in probate, was not clothed with jurisdiction to hear and determine this issue. To uphold this assertion would produce a strange result for appellants invoked the jurisdiction of the court and several times during the trial conceded this to be the sole issue they desired to have determined. But since the decision in the case of Bauer v. Bauer (Cal. Sup.) 256 P. 820, this question is not in doubt. It is there stated:

> "It has, however, been held that when the title to property is claimed by a representative of an estate in his individual capacity the superior court, sitting in probate, is vested with the jurisdiction of determining the validity of such claim upon the settlement of the final accounts of such representative. Stevens v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 148, 99 P. 512; Estate of Fulton, 188 Cal. 489, 205 P. 681; 2 Woerner's American Law of Administration (3d Ed.) note, p. 1007; 3 Woerner's American Law of Administration, p. 1769."

The husband claims one-half the property, asserting a right in existence prior to his qualifications as executor. But if it were a right accruing after he became such representative that would be all the more reason why jurisdiction would lie in the probate court. The fact that in the Bauer Case the personal representative had possession of the property before appointment and in this case the property was in the possession of the decedent at her death constitutes no reason for declaring a distinction.

[3] Again it is proper to note that, although reporting the whole property in the inventory of said estate, nevertheless therein, and in the petition for probate and petition for distribution, the husband claimed it to be community property of the marriage, and in the latter document he expressly tendered the issue by appropriate allegations to which appellants joined issue. Thus there is no ground for the contention that the husband estopped himself to claim an interest in said property. The most that can be said of the situation here presented is that the wife may have thought she had the right to dispose of all the property, and from this it can be argued that one-half of the property was all she expected her husband to receive, but this observation does not change the legal effect of her act.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

STANLEY v. BEDFORD et al. (L. A. 9135.)*

Supreme Court of California. March 9, 1928.
Hearing granted in Bank. April 6, 1928.

1. Execution ⊂=222(1)—Judgment creditor levying on automobile was not required to serve 30 days' notice on conditional seller not filing third party claim (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 689, 689b).

Where, after sheriff's levy under execution on judgment debtor's automobile, seller of car holding lien under conditional sales contract failed to file third party claim as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 689, judgment creditor was not required, under section 689b, to cause sheriff to serve demand upon the conditional seller for a detailed statement of its claim and then wait 30 days before making sale under the levy.

2. Execution ⊂=184—Failure to file third party claim before execution sale relieves sheriff from liability to claimant for conversion (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 689–689b).

Failure to file third party claim under Code Civ. Proc. § 689, prior to sale under execution, excludes claimant from privilege of 30-day notice of claim provided for by sections 689a, 689b, and relieves sheriff from all liability for converting property, regardless of strength of title of claimant.

3. Estoppel ⊂=91(1)—Assignees of conditional seller, who instructed buyer's judgment creditor to proceed with execution, held estopped from attacking sale or claiming excess over balance due (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 689–689b).

Where judgment creditor levying on debtor's automobile offered to pay amount due to conditional seller thereof, but was told to pay it to the sheriff and proceed under execution, no third party claim being filed under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 689–689b, conditional seller and its assignees were estopped after sale to claim any excess over balance due on contract or to attack title and right to possession of purchaser at sale, where judgment creditor paid amount due to sheriff and amount was subsequently deposited with county treasurer to conditional seller's order.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by H. L. Stanley against Henry Bedford and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Paul C. Hill, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clark & Law and E. Llewellyn Overholt, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. Plaintiff, having previously obtained a judgment against one Laura C. Booth, sued out an execution thereon and the sheriff levied the same on July 9, 1925, upon a Cadillac victoria coupé in her possession. No third party claim was filed as provided for in section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor was there filed "a verified written claim containing a detailed statement thereof" as provided for in section 689b of said Code. However, upon learning elsewhere that a conditional sale contract existed between defendant Don Lee, Inc., a corporation, and the debtor, plaintiff, on July 21st, applied to said seller for information respecting it, and was told that said company held a claim for a balance of $172.16, $25 of which was on account of balance due on the purchase price and the remainder for interest and repairs. Plaintiff offered to pay this amount, but was told to pay it to the sheriff and to proceed in the regular way under the execution; that no third party claim would be filed, as the company was not interested in the question of who got the car; further, that the attorney for the judgment debtor had requested the company to demand possession of the car, which request had been refused. Accordingly, on said day, plaintiff, acting through his attorney, gave his check to the sheriff for said sum of $172.16, with instructions that it be delivered to Don Lee, Inc.

On the next day, no third party claim having been filed, the sale was held, and plaintiff became the purchaser thereat and received possession of the car. On that day also Don Lee, Inc., was informed of the deposit of the check and of the sale, whereupon plaintiff was told by said company that it had transferred the conditional sale contract to one Clausen and disclaimed any right to the money. Three days later, and on July 25, 1925, the money was deposited with the county treasurer and a warrant issued payable to Don Lee, Inc., for said amount, which check apparently has never been accepted by the company, although it seems that said warrant is still available to it or its assignee.

Following the judicial sale, the defendants Bedford and Moss, apparently acting for Clausen, who in turn was probably the agent of the judgment debtor, Laura C. Booth, forcibly deprived plaintiff of possession of the car and turned it over to Clausen. Plaintiff thereupon brought this action for possession of the car and damages for its detention and claimed delivery of the property which, upon the execution of a redelivery bond, was returned to the possession of the defendant Clausen. The court below, after announcing views favorable to plaintiff, later made findings in favor of defendants and gave judgment accordingly.

[1, 2] We can see no merit whatever in respondents' position. It is their claim that Don Lee, Inc., was not required to file a third party claim under section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but plaintiff, knowing of the contract held by said company retaining title to the car, was required under section 689b to cause the sheriff to serve a demand upon said company for a detailed statement of its claim and then wait 30 days, unless the company complied sooner with the request, before a sale of the property was made.

★ Appeal dismissed without costs April 9, 1928.

Respondents have not properly interpreted these sections of the Code. The sheriff is freed from liability to third parties unless prior to sale a third party claim is filed. This is a statutory requirement which, if not complied with, will effectually prevent a successful claim of conversion against the sheriff, whatever may be the strength of the title of such party to the property seized by the officer. Cortelyou v. Baker, 182 Cal. 168, 169, 187 P. 417; Arena v. Bank of Italy, 194 Cal. 195, 228 P. 441. The necessity for filing this claim in a case of conditional sale or any other contract retaining title, when possession of property is in another, is as imperative as a claim of title under any other state of facts.

Antedating the enactment of sections 689a and 689b, a case of a third party claim founded on a conditional sale contract may be found in the case of Vermont Marble Co. v. Brow, 109 Cal. 236, 41 P. 1031, 50 Am. St. Rep. 37. The evident purpose of enacting sections 689a and 689b was to provide a summary method of satisfying the claim of the party retaining the legal title, while subjecting the property right of the holder of the equitable title to the just claims of his judgment creditor. Said sections do not provide for dispensing with a third party claim, but require, as a part of such claim, the rendering of a detailed statement showing the exact debt due on such contract. The right to file a third party claim was expressly waived, yet respondents assert that Don Lee, Inc., or its assignee, was entitled to the benefit of section 689b as follows:

> "* * * In case the seller fails to render his claim for thirty days following the personal service upon him by the levying officer of a written demand therefor, which service must be attested [to] by the officer's certificate thereof, filed before the sale with the papers of the action wherein the attachment or execution was issued, then the title shall pass to the buyer and the property may be sold as in this chapter provided, free of all lien or claim of the seller."

This provision was intended to apply only in a case where a sufficient claim under section 689 was made, but was defective or otherwise insufficient to give the required or true amount necessary to be paid to unite the legal and equitable title in the judgment debtor.

Section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure is general in its application, and its integrity is left unimpaired by the two subsections, they being, as stated, only supplementary thereto to enable the interest of the equitable owner to be reached the more easily by the judgment creditor.

[3] Respondents claim that all these three Code sections are only for the protection of the sheriff against claims of third parties and have nothing to do with the rights of Don Lee, Inc., or its assignee against the plaintiff. There is merit in this suggestion, especially inasmuch as plaintiff is both the judgment creditor and the purchaser, but we cannot see that this observation will avail respondents anything under the facts of this case. For, with full knowledge of the levy and prior to assignment of the contract, Don Lee, Inc., was tendered the amount due it. The sum was later, and before the sale, deposited with the sheriff as directed by it. Still later the money was placed in the county treasury to its order, where it still remains. It declined to declare a forfeiture of the contract or to resume possession of the car or to make a third party claim. What right has Don Lee, Inc., or its assignee, under these facts to question the title or right of possession in plaintiff? The plainest rules of estoppel prevent it or its assignee from claiming more than the balance due upon its nonforfeited and nonforfeitable sales contract. This amount has been tendered and is now available for them.

The whole case would seem clearly to be an effort on the part of the judgment debtor, acting through secret agents, to get her car free of the claims of her judgment creditor and thus accomplish indirectly what she could not think of doing directly.

Contrary to the findings of fact and conclusions of law made by the court below, this court does now make herein its findings of fact and conclusions of law as follows:

(1) Defendant D. R. Roberts, served as John Doe herein, was duly served with process, but has failed to answer herein, and his default has been duly and regularly entered according to law.

(2) Neither the defendant Earl Moss, nor any of the other defendants known by fictitious names, have been served with summons.

(3) Defendants Henry Bedford, Walter B. Clausen, and Don Lee, Inc., a corporation, are the only defendants against whom any relief is sought herein.

(4) On the 24th day of July, 1925, at the county of Los Angeles, state of California, plaintiff was, and now is, the owner and entitled to the possession of the following described personal property, to wit: One Cadillac victoria coupé engine No. 61V16702, California 1925 license No. 932-830.

(5) Said property was on said day of the value of $1,500.

(6) Said defendants Henry Bedford, Walter B. Clausen, and Don Lee, Inc., a corporation, on said day, at the county of Los Angeles, state of California, without the consent of plaintiff, wrongfully took possession of said property from said plaintiff, and now retain possession of it, claiming to be the owners thereof.

(7) Before the commencement of this action, to wit, on the 28th day of July, 1925, at the place aforesaid, plaintiff demanded possession of said personal property, but to deliver the possession thereof the defendants refused and still refuse.

(8) Defendants still unlawfully withhold and detain the said property from the possession of plaintiff to his damage, which the complaint fixes at $2,500.

(9) The said property has not been taken for a tax, assessment, or fine, pursuant to a statute, or seized under an execution or an attachment against the property of the plaintiff.

As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact, the said cause of action should be dismissed as to all defendants other than the said defendants Henry Bedford, Walter B. Clausen, and Don Lee, Inc., a corporation; plaintiff should have and recover judgment against the said defendants last named, and each of them, for the return of said property or its value in the event a return thereof cannot be had, together with damages for its detention, not exceeding the amount sued for, which said damages shall include the depreciation on said property since the unlawful taking thereof.

The findings of fact of the court below, being as a matter of law contrary to the undisputed evidence, and the conclusions of law therefrom erroneous, the judgment of the court below is hereby reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to said court to enter judgment for the plaintiff against the defendants Henry Bedford, Walter B. Clausen, and Don Lee, Inc., a corporation, for the return of said property, or its value, in the event a return thereof cannot be had, together with damages for its detention and costs of suit in court below and on appeal; said undetermined issues to be disposed of upon the record as made, together with such further facts as the court may in its discretion lawfully admit in evidence to complete the findings of fact and conclusions of law necessary for the judgment herein directed.

In Bank.

WASTE, C. J. Good cause appearing, it is ordered that the judgment heretofore entered in the above-entitled cause is hereby vacated and set aside, and the cause is placed on the Los Angeles bank calendar for June 5, 1928, at 10 o'clock a. m., for argument as to the power of this court to make findings of fact contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court, and reverse the judgment, and upon such reversal to give or direct a different judgment.

Code, §§ 1635–1655, lessors were entitled to additional royalty of one-half of oil produced in paying quantities from first well, not to exceed $5,000, though well produced less than $10,000.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1033(8)—Trusts 🔑265—Judgment for lessors against trustees for additional royalties due under oil lease, limiting trustees' liability to corpus of trust, held proper (Civ. Code, § 2267).

Where oil lease entitled lessors to additional royalties derived from one-half of oil produced in paying quantities from first well, not exceeding $5,000, and lessees assigned lease to trustees for syndicate, held, that, under Civ. Code, § 2267, court had jurisdiction to enter judgment for lessors against trustees, limited to property of trust estate, and trustees could not attack provision limiting liability since it was for their protection.

3. Mines and minerals 🔑74—Lessors entitled to additional royalties could sue assignees of lease therefor, though not parties to assignment.

Where under lease of oil properties lessors were entitled to an additional royalty or bonus payable from first oil produced, lessors could maintain action therefor against trustees of syndicate to which leases were assigned with full knowledge on part of trustees of lessors' claims, though lessors were not parties to assignment.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Milton B. Irvine and others against D. G. MacGregor and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. E. Garten and Joseph M. Maltby, both of Long Beach, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover an alleged sum of money due them as an additional royalty or bonus under the provisions of an oil lease.

[1] Plaintiffs, owners of certain real property, entered into a written agreement with defendants MacGregor and Simmel, leasing their land to these parties for oil drilling purposes. About two weeks later said lease was assigned by the last-mentioned defendants to defendants Lewis, Underwood, and MacGregor as trustees for "MacGregor Syndicate No. 1."

The provision of the lease under which recovery is sought reads as follows:

> "Additional Rental: In addition to the said royalty of one-sixth to be paid by the said lessees to the said lessors in the manner aforesaid, the lessees shall pay and deliver to the lessors the sum of $5,000 * * * derived from the sale of one-half of the first oil produced from the well first completed upon said described premises. That the payment of the said sum of $5,000 is wholly contingent upon the discovery and production of oil in paying quantities from the first well drilled to completion and production on said premises."

In this connection the court found, and such finding is accepted as correct for the purposes of this appeal:

> "That there was produced and sold from an oil well on said premises oil in the sum of $8,421.62, one-half of which, or $4,210.81, is due plaintiffs as bonus, to which must be added the one-sixth landowners' royalty, or $1,408.60, a total due plaintiffs of $5,619.41; that plaintiffs have received on account $1,091; * * * that defendants are entitled to further credits * * * in the total sum of $782.38, leaving a balance due and owing plaintiffs $3,847.03."

Accordingly judgment in the sum stated went for plaintiffs, and defendants have appealed therefrom.

It is the contention of appellants that the above-quoted paragraph of the lease is sufficiently clear to admit of but one construction; namely, that if the lessees obtained a first well that produced at least $10,000 worth of oil, but not otherwise, they would share such production with the lessors to the extent of paying them $5,000 from the proceeds of sale thereof. This, however, is not what the clause states. It states that the $5,000 payment shall be wholly contingent, not upon the production of at least $10,000 worth of oil, but "upon the discovery and production of oil in paying quantities." It cannot be denied that under the evidence and findings there was sufficient proof of production of oil in paying quantities from said first well. In other words, the limitation in the provision is in favor of the lessees, making them liable, in addition to the one-sixth royalty, for only half of the first oil produced up to the sum of $5,000, and no more. Inasmuch as half of the first oil produced amounted to less than said maximum figure of $5,000, they were liable only for such sum as it did amount to, to wit, the sum of $4,210.81. In accord with familiar principles of interpretation, oil leases are construed according to their reasonable common-sense meaning. Sections 1635-1655, Civ. Code. The above construction receives strong support in testimony given to the effect that the $1,091 was paid plaintiffs on account of said one-half bonus, or additional rental, thus clearly indicating that appellants recognized their obligation to make this payment.

[2] The evidence showed that such sums as were claimed by the lessors were on deposit to the credit of MacGregor Syndicate No. 1. The trial court accordingly found:

> "That plaintiff is entitled to judgment in said sum against D. G. MacGregor, L. C. Simmel, and against D. G. MacGregor, R. C. Lewis, and S. H. Underwood, as trustees of the MacGregor Syndicate No. 1, and against their successors as trustees of said syndicate, and liability of said trustees is limited to the property of the trust estate."

Pursuant to this finding, the judgment limited the liability of said trustees to the corpus of the trust estate.

Appellants urge that the court was without jurisdiction to enter judgment against the trust estate, limiting the liability of the trustees to the corpus of the trust, for, they contend, trustees are liable directly and personally for their acts, and they, and not the trust estate or beneficiaries, are bound by a judgment.

Numerous cases uphold the right to follow money into a trust fund or any other fund into which it may have fallen. Noble v. Noble, 198 Cal. 129, 43 A. L. R. 1235, and cases there cited; Smith v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 2 Cal. App. 377, 84 P. 348. Trust property is bound by the acts of the trustees within the scope of their authority. Civ. Code, § 2267.

Furthermore, appellants are in no position to attack the provision of the judgment limiting their liability to the corpus of the trust estate, for such provision plainly has for its purpose their protection. They may not now take advantage of it and attempt to hide behind the trusteeship, avoiding liability on the plea that MacGregor Syndicate, as a trust, is not a party to or capable of being a party to this action. Said trustees could not accept the benefits of the original lease for the trust estate and yet deny their authority to meet this obligation from funds of the trust.

[3] The assignment of lease was executed and accepted by them subject to all conditions, rights, and privileges of the original instrument, and subject to the provisions of the trust, and said money was received and deposited to the account of MacGregor Syndicate with full knowledge on the part of said trustees of plaintiffs' claims thereto. Therefore the fact that plaintiffs were not parties to the assignment of lease or to the instrument of trust cannot avail appellants. An action of this character "may be successfully maintained even though not founded upon allegations showing an express privity of contract between the parties. This is so upon the theory that if one of the parties has received money due and owing to the other under circumstances which make it his duty to surrender the money to the rightful owner, the law will imply the promise to do so, and thereby create the requisite contractual privity." Freitas v. Freitas, 31 Cal. App. 19, 20, 159 P. 613. See, also, to the same effect, Kreutz v. Livingston, 15 Cal. 344.

Judgment affirmed.

THOMPSON et al. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. et al. (L. A. 9249.)

Supreme Court of California. March 9, 1928.

1. Life estates 🔑8—Statute of limitations against ejectment action by reversioners against railroad claiming under life tenant began to run at death of life tenant (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 2).

Where railroad acquired land from life tenant in deed, making no mention of life estate, statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 2), against action in ejectment by reversioners against railroad, began to run at death of life tenant, and not at date of railway's entry, since claim is founded on right of possession.

2. Ejectment 🔑86(1)—Railway's entry by consent of life tenant raises no presumption that it intends to despoil estate of remainderman.

Where entry of railway company on land is by consent of life tenant, no presumption can arise that it intends to despoil estate of remainderman.

3. Life estates 🔑23—Railway, making entry with tracks by consent of life tenant, acquires no greater estate than life tenant could convey.

Entry of railway company with its tracks by consent of life tenant does not constitute permanent taking of lands so occupied, since railway is limited to estate which life tenant could convey.

4. Remainders 🔑17(2)—Statute, authorizing remainderman's action for injury to inheritance, held inapplicable to action against railroad entering land by consent of life tenant (Civ. Code, § 826).

Civ. Code, § 826, authorizing remainderman to maintain action for injury to inheritance, is inapplicable to action of ejectment against railroad entering land by consent of life tenant, since there is no conclusive presumption that, if tracks were removed on falling in of life estate, injury would result to inheritance.

5. Remainders 🔑17(2)—Remainderman's statutory right to maintain action for injury to inheritance is permissive only (Civ. Code, § 826).

Assertion by remainderman under Civ. Code, § 826, of right to maintain action for injury to inheritance, notwithstanding intervening estate, is permissive only, and not compulsory.

Department One.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Martha Porter Thompson and husband against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and others. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank Karr, C. W. Cornell, and R. E. Wedekind, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment of nonsuit entered after both sides had concluded the introduction of their evidence. The single issue presented is the plea of the statute of limitations, subdivision 2 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] Respondents' statement of the facts and of the question involved is accurate and as follows:

"September 22, 1917—Eloise Wright Porter was granted a life estate in the property in question, with the reversion in plaintiffs' predecessors.

"November 4, 1919—Eloise Wright Porter deeded parcel 1 to the defendant. This deed made no mention of any life estate.

"November 7, 1919—Eloise Wright Porter deeded parcel 2 to the defendant. This deed made no mention of any life estate.

"January, February, and March, 1920—The defendant constructed and put into operation a railroad line over parcels 1 and 2, and has continuously operated said line, carrying freight and passengers thereover, as part of its system, in interstate and intrastate commerce, since said date.

"August 1, 1922—Eloise Wright Porter died.

"August 14, 1924—The plaintiffs began this action.

"The plaintiffs are reversioners and the owners of the fee-simple title to parcels 1 and 2, the property here in litigation.

"The sole question in this case is whether the statute of limitations began to run against the reversioners at the date of the entry by the railroad or at the date of the death of the life tenant."

Appellants state their position in these words:

"Plaintiffs' right to the possession of parcels 1 and 2 matured only upon the termination of Eloise Wright Porter's life estate, and with it ripened into maturity their cause of action against the railroad company for continuing to use and occupy parcels 1 and 2 beyond the period limited by their grant."

Respondents counter with this statement of their position:

"But appellants' action here did not depend on the right to possession. Therein is the distinction. Appellants had no right to possession after the railroad was constructed. The only action they ever had was for damages."

Again respondents assert:

"True, the life tenant had given her assent to the use contemplated, but in going in under that assent the railroad necessarily trespassed on the rights of the reversioners and necessarily injured at that time their inheritance. * * * It took the life estate rightfully under the deeds from the life tenant, but it occupied the fee without right. It appropriated the inheritance at that time, and permanently ousted the reversioners from their possibility of a reversion. * * * The railway got only the life estate by the deeds from the life tenant, but it took the inheritance of these reversioners outright."

We think appellants are clearly right, and that respondents overcapitalize the rule of public policy operating to shield the railway from an action in ejectment and continue it in possession of the property of another. Appellants' claims are founded upon the right of possession, and they are denied that specific relief, and relegated to compensation in damages only by reason of the public convenience, but this is far from giving respondents the right to antedate the falling in of the life estate with the claim of trespass or waste. This case is ruled by such cases as Pryor v. Winter, 147 Cal. 554, 559, 82 P. 202, 204 (109 Am. St. Rep. 162), where it is said:

> "It would be strange, indeed, if during the life of the particular tenant a remainderman could be compelled to lose his estate on account of another's possession which he would be utterly helpless to interrupt."

And Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. 625, 643, 209 P. 576, 583, where it is said:

> "It is true that the possession of respondent's father, the tenant for life, was not adverse to her as remainderman. Such life tenant could not, by his dealings with the life estate, make his, or his grantee's possession, adverse to respondent, so as to start the statute of limitations against her during the life estate (Pryor v. Winter, 147 Cal. 554, 559, 82 P. 202, 109 Am. St. Rep. 162; McMurtry v. Fairley, 194 Mo. 502, 510, 91 S. W. 902); but, after such life estate terminated, the possession, unless in some way qualified, did become adverse and the statute of limitations began to run at that time (Mann v. Mann, 141 Cal. 326, 330, 74 P. 995)."

Also the recent case of Newport v. Hatton. 195 Cal. 132, 144, 231 P. 987, 991, where it is said:

> "Mrs. Newport, as life tenant, could not, by her dealings with the life estate, make her own or a grantee's possession adverse to that of the remaindermen so as to start the statute of limitations against them during the life estate."

Unlimited authority may also be found in other states supporting these views. In the case of Bartlow v. Chicago, etc., Co., 243 Ill. 332, 90 N. E. 721, a condemnation proceeding and payment to the holder of the life estate in the land involved vested in the railway company a right of way as against the holder of the life estate, and the company thereby acquired right to possession of a right of way during her life. Appellant railway company, in suit for partition of the land, relied upon statutes of limitation of 20 and 7 years. The court held that, until death of the holder of the life estate, appellees had no right to possession of the premises, and could not maintain an action therefor; that the statute of limitations, therefore, did not run against them.

This question is discussed at length in the case of Webster v. Pittsburgh, etc., Co., 78 Ohio St. 87, 84 N. E. 592, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1154. The court held that action not to be barred by the statute of limitations of 21 years, as said statute did not begin to run until death of the life tenant, and further held that ejectment proceedings were proper.

Holding that the plaintiff and his representatives could institute proceedings to recover possession of the property involved at any time after the death of the life tenant and before the running of the statute of limitations, the court in the case of Cassem v. Prindle, 258 Ill. 11, 101 N. E. 241, said:

> "The remainderman has no right of action for the possession until the death of the life tenant, and the statute of limitations will not begin to run until the right of action accrues."

To the same effect see Westcott v. Meeker, 144 Iowa, 311, 122 N. W. 964, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 947; also Bohrer v. Davis, 94 Neb. 367, 143 N. W. 209, L. R. A. 1918D, 430, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 992, where it is said:

> "The universal rule of law is that the statute of limitations does not begin to run against a right of action until that right exists. The party who has the right of action has the full period of the statute in which to enforce it. The remainderman has no right of possession until the particular estate is terminated. He has no right of action which depends upon the right of possession until he is entitled to the possession."

In the case of Hauser v. Murray, 256 Mo. 58, 85, 165 S. W. 376, 384, it is said:

> "The plea of the statute of limitations is interposed as a defense. * * * We are of the opinion that the general rule is applicable, and that neither she (holding as a life tenant) nor any grantee of the estate could claim adversely to the remaindermen, and that the statute of limitations did not begin to run against them until her death."

See, to the same effect, Rogers v. Ogburn, 116 Ark. 233, 172 S. W. 867; Ratterman v. Apperson, 141 Ky. 821, 133 S. W. 1005; Rich v. Victoria, etc., Co. (C. C. A.) 147 F. 380.

[2, 3] We see no force in the statement found as dictum in the case of Gordon v. Cadwalader, 172 Cal. 254, 156 P. 471. While the unauthorized or forcible entry of a railway company might possibly be trespass upon the remainder interest as well as upon the life tenancy, yet, where the entry is by consent of the life tenant, no presumption can arise that the railway company intends to despoil the estate of the remainderman. To so hold in this case would be to impute bad faith to respondents and knowledge thereof to appellants. This observation also disposes of the cases holding that entry of a railway company with its tracks constitutes a permanent taking of the lands so occupied. This cannot apply to an independent estate to be subsequently enjoyed where the entry is by consent of the life tenant, whose authority, being limited, limits the railway company to the estate which the life tenant could convey.

[4, 5] Neither is there any applicability here of section 826 of the Civil Code to the effect that a remainderman, notwithstanding the intervening estate, may maintain an action for injury to the inheritance. There is no conclusive presumption that, if the tracks are removed or abandoned on the falling in of the life estate, and injury has resulted to the inheritance. Besides, the asserting of this right of action is permissive only and not compulsory.

Appellants' right of action arose on the death of the life tenant, and the suit was instituted within the time allowed by statute reckoned from this event.

The judgment is reversed.

PATTERSON et ux. v. MARCUS.
(S. F. 12091.)

Supreme Court of California. March 7, 1928.

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑15—Mistake in diagnosis renders physician liable only where due to his failure to exercise ordinary care, diligence, and skill.

Mere proof that physician made wrong diagnosis does not support recovery for malpractice, unless mistake was due to failure to exercise ordinary care, diligence, and skill; physician's responsibility in making diagnosis being no greater than in prescribing treatment.

2. Physicians and surgeons 🔑14(4)—Physician impliedly contracts that he possesses learning and skill possessed by others of his profession, and will apply it in exercise of ordinary care.

Physician impliedly contracts with patient that he possesses that reasonable degree of learning and skill possessed by other members of his profession, and that he will exercise reasonable and ordinary care and skill in the application of that learning.

3. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(8)—What constitutes proper practice by physician is solely question for expert testimony.

Question as to what is or is not proper practice for a physician is uniformly a question for expert testimony, and can only be so established in malpractice suit.

4. Physicians and surgeons 🔑15—Physician's mistaken diagnosis of enlarged condition in abdominal region of woman as pregnancy held not actionable negligence, where proper means of determining pregnancy was not shown.

Physician's mistake in diagnosis of enlarged condition in woman's abdominal region as pregnancy, on account of which he advised against extraction of ulcerated wisdom tooth, held not actionable negligence, rendering physician liable in malpractice suit, on ground that true condition was abdominal tumor, where it was not shown by expert testimony what method or means, in exercise of ordinary care, should have been employed to determine presence or absence of pregnancy.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Andrew Patterson and wife against Herman Marcus. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Charles F. Hanlon and Walter H. Robinson, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. The trial court granted a motion for a nonsuit and entered judgment accordingly. The plaintiffs, husband and wife, have appealed. The plaintiff husband is joined because of the marital relationship.

The defendant is a regularly licensed and practicing physician and surgeon. On March 4, 1921, the plaintiff, Rose Patterson, was suffering from a swelling in her face. She consulted the defendant for medical examination and treatment. The defendant correctly diagnosed the cause of the swelling as an ulcerated wisdom tooth, which, under ordinary conditions, could be removed and relief thereby afforded. If, however, the patient be a pregnant woman, it was in evidence and undisputed that the extraction of an ulcerated tooth is dangerous to both mother and child, and this was known to the defendant when he was so consulted. The enlarged condition of Mrs. Patterson in the abdominal region aroused the suspicions of the defendant, and he inquired of her if she were pregnant. She replied that she did not know. She was 34 years of age at the time, had been married for several years to her present husband, and had two children by a former husband. Upon further inquiry by the defendant, she stated that her menstrual flow had been scant, and that on several mornings shortly theretofore she had experienced nausea. The defendant examined her with a speculum, pronounced her four or five months pregnant, and advised against the extraction of the tooth. He sought to relieve his patient by an incision and draining the abscessed area. Numerous treatments failed to afford the necessary relief, and the patient suffered much pain. Upon the advice of the defendant, she consulted his own dentist, who refused to extract the tooth when he learned that defendant had pronounced the patient pregnant. She remained under the care of the defendant and received frequent examinations. Measurements disclosed a gradual enlargement of the abdominal swelling. By listening, the defendant thought at times that he discerned life in the supposed fœtus, and at times he was doubtful. Examinations continued, usually once a week, and sometimes oftener. Mrs. Patterson finally consulted another dentist, who extracted the tooth. About June 20th, after a more extended examination, the defendant concluded that his patient was not pregnant, but was suffering from an ovarian cyst or abdominal tumor. When so advised by the defendant, with an offer of treatment for that trouble, Mrs. Patterson refused to proceed under the further care of the defendant, consulted another physician, who administered treatment and drained a gallon of liquid from the abdominal swelling. This physician testified that the distention of the abdomen made internal examination difficult. The deposition of a nurse who attended Mrs. Patterson during a portion of the time in question was introduced in evidence. The nurse testified that, when she was in attendance on Mrs. Patterson, the latter had all the symptoms of pregnancy; that she had pain in the abdominal region, had a nauseated feeling, and was unable to walk without aid; and that she gave the witness the impression that she was pregnant and about to become a mother.

[1, 2] This action was brought on the theory of negligent diagnosis and care on the part of the defendant, resulting in loss of time, expense, and suffering on the part of the plaintiffs from March until June. The record presents a case of mistaken diagnosis by a reputable physician, without the incidents of carelessness or unskillfulness necessary to constitute actionable negligence. There is an entire absence of evidence that the treatment prescribed on the original diagnosis was improper. A physician is not held to a higher degree of responsibility in making a diagnosis than in prescribing treatment. See Brewer v. Ring, 177 N. C. 476, 99 S. E. 358, 364. When due care, diligence, judgment, and skill are exercised, a mere failure to diagnose correctly does not render a physician liable. Jaeger v. Stratton, 170 Wis. 579, 176 N. W. 61. A mistake in diagnosis in the present case was alleged and proved, and is conceded to have taken place. But it was not only necessary for the plaintiffs to prove such mistake, but also that the mistake was due to failure to exercise ordinary care, diligence, and skill in making the diagnosis. Schumacher v. Murray Hospital, 58 Mont. 447, 193 P. 397, 403. Mere proof that the diagnosis was wrong would not support a verdict. Edwards v. Uland, 193 Ind. 376, 140 N. E. 546, 548. It has been held in this state that the implied contract on the part of the physician is that he possesses that reasonable degree of learning and skill possessed by others of his profession, and that he will exercise reasonable and ordinary care and skill in the application of that learning to accomplish the purpose for which he is employed. Houghton v. Dickson, 29 Cal. App. 321, 155 P. 128.

[3, 4] As to what is or is not the proper practice is uniformly a question for experts, and can be established only by their testimony. Perkins v. Trueblood, 180 Cal. 437, 443, 181 P. 642; Houghton v. Dickson, supra. There was in the present case no expert evidence as to what method or means, in the exercise of ordinary care and skill, should have been employed to determine the presence or absence of pregnancy. On the record presented, it is reasonable to conclude, in harmony with the holding of the trial court, that there was no showing of negligence on the part of the defendant in making the mistaken diagnosis, having in mind the standards of proof required.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., Deputy Co. Counsel, J. H. O'Connor, Asst. Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The questions involved in this proceeding are presented upon the application of the petitioner herein for the issuance of a writ of mandate directing the respondents herein to desist from doing a certain series of official acts looking to the preparation, printing, and procuring of certain statements and other printed forms and blanks which are to issue preparatory to the assessment and collection of taxes for the current year upon certain kinds of taxable property to be hereinafter described, and which acts it is alleged the respondents are preparing and threatening to do in conformity with the terms of a certain statute which the petitioner avers to be unconstitutional and void; and that by said writ this court shall further command the respondents in their several official capacities to do and perform said official acts in conformity with another statute which the petition avers to be in full force and effect. The respondents rest their opposition to the issuance of said writ upon their return, which only puts in question the sufficiency of the applicant's petition. An intervention has been presented herein on behalf of the city of Pasadena, which sets forth no new or issuable facts, but supports the position of the applicant herein. Certain amici curiæ have also filed briefs in support of the position taken by the respondents herein, as to which of said statutory enactments is in operation; while, on the other hand, the Attorney General of the state of California has appeared herein to present views both orally, and by briefs hereinafter to be commented upon. The constitutional amendment thus referred to is the amendment to section 12½ of article 13 of the state Constitution, which was adopted by the people at the general election in 1924, and which reads as follows:

> "The Legislature, subject to section one of article four shall have power to provide for the assessment, levy and collection of taxes upon all notes, debentures, shares of capital stock, bonds, solvent credits or mortgages, not exempt from taxation under the provisions of this Constitution, in a manner, at a rate or rates or in proportion to value different from any other property in this state subject to taxation; taxes imposed by any act of the Legislature adopted pursuant to the powers hereby conferred shall be in lieu of all other property taxes, state, county, municipal or district, upon such property. The Legislature shall provide for an equitable distribution of such taxes to the county, municipality or district in which such property is taxed; provided, that the rate or rates of taxation of such securities, and penalties, shall not exceed those assessed or imposed upon other property in this state not exempt from taxation, and that when the same shall have been fixed by the Legislature, they shall not be altered except by vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to each of the two houses voting in favor thereof."

The Legislature of 1925, purporting to act in compliance with the mandate of the foregoing amendment to the Constitution, added to the Political Code section 3627a thereof, which reads as follows:

> "The assessor of each county, city and county, city, district, or other political subdivision, shall assess notes, debentures, shares of capital stock, bonds, solvent credits, and mortgages or deeds of trust, which are taxable to the owner thereof under provisions of the laws of this state other than this section and section three thousand six hundred twenty-seven of this Code, at seven per cent. of the full cash value thereof; provided, that the taxpayer shall have included such property in the annual statement, under oath, made and delivered to the assessor as required by law; provided, however, that as to such property so included in such annual statement that may be made as of the first Monday of March, 1926, if any such property so disclosed shall have escaped assessment for the last preceding year and shall have been then in the ownership or under the control of the same person so including such property in such annual statement, the provisions of section three thousand six hundred forty-nine of the Political Code shall not apply; and provided, further, that in the event of failure or refusal to file such annual statement such property shall be assessed at its full cash value, except as provided in section three thousand six hundred twenty-seven of this Code. In determining the full cash value of the properties hereinbefore enumerated in this section, the assessor shall not take into account the existence of any custom or common method, if any, of assessing any other class or classes of property at less than the full cash value thereof." Stats. 1925, p. 13, § 3.

In the year 1927 the Legislature undertook to amend the foregoing section of the Political Code by an enactment (Stats. 1927, p. 399, § 2), which reads as follows:

> "Each county or city and county shall tax notes, debentures, shares of capital stock, bonds, solvent credits and mortgages or deeds of trust, which are taxable to the owner thereof under the provisions of the laws of the state, at a rate of one and forty-five hundredths per centum of the full cash value thereof; provided, that the taxpayer shall have included such property in the annual statement under oath made and delivered to the assessor as required by law; provided, that in the event of failure or refusal to file such annual statement such property shall be assessed at double its full cash value. The taxes so collected shall be deposited in the general fund of the county or city and county in which such property is taxed."

It is the contention of the petitioner herein that the foregoing amendment to section 3627a of the Political Code is a valid enactment, but that the respondents herein are proceeding to ignore the same, and to do, or threaten to do, the official acts above referred to in conformity with the terms of the original section enacted in 1925, and which the applicant alleges has been superseded by the amendment of 1927. The respondents, the intervener, and their supporting amici curiæ insist that the enactment of 1925 is valid, and its attempted amendment in 1927 void.

[1] This would seem to be a case calling in a peculiar sense for the application of that cardinal cannon of interpretation which requires courts in the course of construing laws to consider: (1) The former law; (2) the evil to be remedied; and (3) the proposed remedy. We shall accordingly first consider the state of the former law governing the assessment and collection of taxes upon these forms of personal property, which are referred to both in the constitutional amendment above quoted and in each of the statutory enactments which have been passed since its adoption.

The Constitution of 1879, in section 1, art. 13 thereof, provided that:

> "All property in the state * * * not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. * * * The word 'property,' as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership."

This section of the Constitution was amended from time to time, either internally or by the incorporation of subsections into the article itself, the purpose of such amendments being chiefly to create certain exemptions from the general terms of the section up to the year 1910, during which period all property subject to taxation was assessed, and the local, as well as state, taxes, collected thereon in the several counties, cities and counties, municipalities, and districts wherein such property was situated. The state board of equalization and the boards of supervisors of the several counties of the state, in the capacity of county boards of equalization provided for in section 9 of article 13 of the Constitution, equalized the valuation of taxable property, the former for state, and the latter for local, taxation. The state Legislature during the same period, in various enactments not necessary here to be enumerated, provided for the details of the plan of assessment and taxation thus in vogue during that time. The Constitution also contained the provisions (Const. art. 1, § 11) that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." In the year 1910, however, a radical change of policy was adopted by the people and engrafted on the Constitution, by the terms of which embodied in section 14 of article 13 thereof certain enumerated properties, such as railroads, street railways, express companies, gas and electric companies, insurance companies, telegraph and telephone companies, banks, and numerous other forms of property not practicably subjectable to local evaluation were to be assessed, and the taxes collected thereon by the state directly and at rates or bases of taxation different from that provided for in ad valorem taxation; and the taxes derived therefrom paid into the state treasury, and applied to the expenses incident to the operation and activities of the state government.

All other property, excepting what had thus been taken out of the sphere of local taxation, continued to be assessed and taxed as before this change became effective, and the moneys derived from such local taxation were distributed to the local and subordinate subdivisions of the state permitted to assess, levy, and collect such taxes under the statutes which remained in force. In the meantime experience had shown that whatever the difficulties, obstacles, and inequalities encountered by tax officials in the assessment, levy, and collection of taxes upon property in proportion to its value, these were accentuated in the endeavor of these officials to discover and adequately subject to taxation certain kinds of personal property which, from its nature, was susceptible of being sequestered and concealed by the owners thereof with a view to escaping taxation, or of which the assessable value, also, from the nature thereof, was difficult of ascertainment. These forms of elusive property were, generally speaking, notes, solvent credits, bonds, debentures, shares of stock, and like properties sometimes characterized as "intangibles." Of recent years, the amount and variety of forms of these so-called intangible properties have vastly increased, with the result that the extent to which properties of the foregoing classes were either evading taxation or, when found, were being subjected to inordinate and unjust burdens, had grown to be a real evil in the structure and operation of our state laws affecting and providing for local taxation. It was precisely this evil which required remedial legislation, but it was an evil which legislation could not fully reach and remedy without a change in the state Constitution, and in those provisions thereof above referred to which provided for the uniform taxation of all property in proportion to its value. It was, in order to invest the state Legislature with powers elastic enough to reach and remedy both phases of this growing inequality in the taxation of these so-called intangibles, that the amendment embodied in section 12½ of article 13 of the Constitution was finally adopted by the people in 1924, and in which it was undertaken to enumerate the classes of such properties over which the Legislature was to exercise the elastic control with which by said constitutional amendment it was sought to be invested. When we therefore read this amendment to the Constitution in the light of the history of state and local taxation which preceded it, its objects and its limitations appear plain. In the matter of the method to be by it selected for the assessment, levy, and collection of taxes upon the kinds of property enumerated in said amendment, the Legislature was to be given a free hand. It could provide for the assessment, levy, and collection of such taxes by the state, or by any subordinate branch or agency thereof it might see fit to select. It might invest the same state officials and agencies with the power and the machinery for the assessment, levy, and collection of the taxes upon these particular properties which had already been intrusted with the collection of taxes from properties directly and solely subjected to state taxation under the provisions of section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution already in full operation and effect. It might commit the assessment, levy, and collection of these taxes to counties and cities and counties. It might even call into being a special form of commission or agency for the assessment, levy, and collection of these taxes, if the Legislature in its wisdom saw fit so to do. There were, however, certain important limitations imposed upon the Legislature in its exercise of the foregoing powers.
